Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Three months have passed, and hot July with burning suns, sultry breath, and cooling showers has come, and on her death-bed is lying the beautiful, the sweet, and the gentle Minnie Darwin, while all around her stand weeping friends and mourning relatives. At a little distance from the bed sits good old Dr. Scott, who, having done all that human skill could do to mitigate the sufferings of one whom even his great and acknowledged ability was unable to cure; is now looking across the grassy lawn to the blue mountains in the far distance, and pondering upon the many scenes of sickness, sorrow, and death through which he had passed while practicing his profession as physician during the many long pears of his life. How much he had accomplished only himself knew, and yet how little it all seemed, when he reflected upon the paths that yet remained untrod and unknown. The cureless cases, the victims that death claimed in spite of his skill, were so many, that he felt sad and sick for poor, ignorant, helpless humanity.

The thought of the days, in the not so far off past, when he believed in a wise and beneficent Providence, and had so often prayed for added skill and increased knowledge that he might be enabled to save one whom God had apparently doomed, and he remembered how he had thought, impiously thought, that were he the all-powerful what a joy it would be to become a ministering angel to all the sick and suffering, and how he wondered that a "good father" could be so hard and unsympathetic. 'Tis true he now found Nature was still more relentless than any god was ever thought to be, but he also knew that a right knowledge of her powers and of physiology and hygiene would give in reality a greater healing gift to the well-taught and investigating physician than he had once fancied could be won by prayers to the fetish of his imagination.

Death under any circumstances is a sad occurrence, but to be suddenly stricken down while in the proud consciousness of full health and strength, and to realize that in all the wide universe there is no power competent to save, no chance for life; to realize that no skill, no tender loving care, can arrest or check the swift coming steps of the relentless destroyer is terrible indeed.

Only a few days ago and our Minnie was the picture of youth, health, and happiness, and now a few hours was all that remained to her of life. She had quit work early on Saturday afternoon, and gone to Grove Hill to get some wild flowers. It was only half a mile from home, so she started off alone and in the highest spirits, for it was so nice to enjoy the glad, free out-of-doors, and breathe the pure, clean, fresh air after being cooped up all the week in the dusty factory.

She had just climbed the hill, and was passing over its brow to the other side, where a small spring ran out from under a mossy rock, when on going by a little negro cabin near the spring, out from the door sprang a Spitz dog, and before she realized its intention its sharp teeth were fastened in her leg.

Minnie gave one scream and fainted. She was subject to fainting fits, having inherited the weakness from her paternal grandmother.

There was no one in the hut but two small children, who, when they saw the dog bite Minnie, hurriedly shut the door, lest it might bite them. The dog had been found a few weeks before by the negro who owned the hut, and he insisted on keeping it, even against the protestations of the town people, who were all afraid of it, having heard so much of the danger of rabbies from the bite of the Spitz dog. Only that very afternoon had good Dr. Scott offered the man ten dollars for the dog, prefering to pay that much for the privilege of killing the venomous little beast, rather than have human life put in jeopardy by his presence in their midst.

It was a long time ere Minnie came to, and it was dark when she got home. She met her father coming to search for her. She hated to tell the family what had happened, but she knew the danger was imminent, and if help was to be had it must be quickly given. Mrs. Darwin, shocked, frightened, and alarmed as she was, applied all the remedies she could think of, while Mr. Darwin hurried off for the doctor.

The good old man soon arrived, and did everything he could, but the bite was a bad one, and just where the virus could enter at once into the circulation, and he therefore knew that if the dog was really mad there was but little hope for the poor girl's life.

We pass over all the anxiety of the next few days, and the terrible sufferings poor Minnie endured when the dreadful paroxysms set in that generally occur in such cases towards the last of the disease.

The dog was found to be really mad, and was shot at once, as well as were two hogs and a cow which it had also bitten.

All that medical skill could do to relieve Minnie, and dull the keen edge of her suffering, by giving her anodynes, was done, and sympathy, love, and care surrounded her on all sides. She was gentle, patient, and uncomplaining whenever she had control of her faculties, and said all she could to soothe the grief of her dear friends and beloved relatives. Great was the anguish of them all to think she must suffer and die there, before their eyes, and all of them so utterly powerless to aid or help her in her dire need, or prolong even for one brief day the beautiful, sweet life which they felt to be doubly precious to them now that it was passing so swiftly away.

Minnie was her father's pet, and what he suffered during her illness no pen can tell. His baby, as he called her—his bright, beautiful, gentle darling, who had never given him a moment's real sorrow during all the pleasant years of her young life!—she was so good, so tender, loving, and affectionate!—how could he give her up? And Mrs. Darwin, always sympathizing, gentle and consoling to others who had need of her ministrations in sorrow, sickness or trouble—how her loving heart was wrung, and her affectionate soul tortured with anguish, no one knew, no one dreamed. Mindful always of others, she carefully repressed all outward show of grief whenever it was possible to do so, and strove with all her loving woman's nature to do her duty in this solemn hour of her supremest anguish. Oh! the depths of a mother's holy, self-sacrificing love! It is fathomless, boundless, and immeasurable. To see the child she has nourished at her breast, who has slept for years in her bosom, whose every breath she has watched, whose every ailment she has tried to soothe, whose steps she has tenderly guided, whose tongue she has fondly taught to lisp sweet, loving words, and whose mind she has fashioned and formed, so that its every thought is as clear to her comprehension as the noonday sun—can any one save a mother who has thus loved and lost conceive of the bitter woe and almost hopeless misery of such a mother as Mrs. Darwin, when she saw her darling thus slowly but surely passing away from her forever? Calm, thoughtful, and considerate as she was, or as she forced herself to appear, there were times when she would steal away from all the sorrow-stricken household, and, entering her chamber, would lock the door and throw herself upon the floor in a perfect abandonment of grief and anguish. Suppressed sobs and convulsive shudders racked her frame, while tears poured in torrents from her eyes. Sometimes she would return from these ebulitions of pent-up agony, looking so patient, calm, and resigned, so apparently rested and refreshed, that they all supposed she had indulged in a short sleep, and had awoke with the burden partly lifted from her spirit. At other times the overwhelming, surging waves of sorrow would sweep across her soul, and burn and sear into her brain, till she would think she must go raging mad, loose all control of her mind, and become a fit subject for the lunatic asylum. Long months afterwards she told her husband how she had often ran off in some corner by herself, and made faces, and jeered, mocked, and jibed, till realizing that her mind was tottering upon its brink, she would, by a strong effort of the will, call back reason, philosophy, and common sense, and once more return to duty and the beloved ones who awaited the presence of the mother—she who was first in all hearts, and who alone was the real main-spring of home.

"What is home without a mother?" are light words, and lightly spoken, but oh! so vividly real when Mother is mother no more, and Death claims her as his prey. Love your mothers, ye who have them, for of all loves, the mother-love is the strongest, faithfulest, and most self-sacrificing, and all enduring, the most patient and forgiving, the most sure and reliable.

It was hard—oh! so hard—but nobly, bravely, and earnestly she battled with her grief—she fought the good fight, and came out conquerer over herself. She felt how utterly useless it was to "kick against the pricks." She knew how impotent is man when he attempts to rebel against fate—against the must be. But oh! none realized more than she did how hard it was to say, Not my will, thou unrelenting spirit of Nature, but thine be done. Thou art a gentle, loving mother, but a severe, cruel, pitiless mistress. Thou givest life, and fillest the world with bliss unutterable, but just as freely dost thou shower upon us want, woe, misery, and pain; yet have I that within me which outrides the wind and the storm, and surmounts every obstacle which thou placest in my path. My idols thou mayst shatter, if thou must; I will build for myself new shrines, where my soul shall find rest, and my heart meet its requirements. So long as life shall last, Hope shall be my guiding star, and Despair shall not dwell within me. I will be good, and do good, and these two things always bring peace and quiet to the weary and way-worn!

A METHOD of keeping fish perfectly fresh for several days without the use of ice has been invented by J. Eckart, of Munich. It consists in impregnating the fish by means of hydraulic pressure with a weak solution of salicylic acid and then packing the fish in casks where gelatine is poured over them.

In opposition to these three states of density of anorgana, the living body of all organisms—animals as well as plants—is in an altogether peculiar fourth state of aggregation. It is neither solid like stone, nor liquid like water, but presents rather a medium between these two states, which may therefore be designated as the firm-fluid or swollen state of aggregation (viscid). In all living bodies, without exception, there is a certain quantity of water combined in a peculiar way with solid matter, and owing to this characteristic combination of water with solid matter we have that soft state of aggregation, neither solid nor liquid, which is of great importance in the mechanical explanation of the phenomena of life. Its cause lies essentially in the physical and chemical properties of a simple, indivisible, elementary substance, namely, carbon (Gen. Morph., i. 122-130).

Of all elements, carbon is to us by far the most important and interesting, because this simple substance plays the largest part in all animal and vegetable bodies known to us. It is that element which, by its peculiar tendency to form complicated combinations with the other elements, produces the greatest variety of chemical compounds, and among them the forms and living substance of animal and vegetable bodies. Carbon is especially distinguished by the fact that it can unite with the other elements in infinitely manifold relations of number and weight. By the combination of carbon with three other elements, with oxygen, hydrogen, and nitrogen (to which generally sulphur, and frequently, also, phosphorous is added), there arise those exceedingly important compounds which we have become acquainted with as the first and most indispensable substratum of all vital phenomena, the albuminous combinations, or albuminous bodies (protean matter).

We have before this become acquainted with the simplest of all species of organisms in the Monera, whose entire bodies when completely developed consist of nothing but a semi-fluid albuminous lump; they are organisms which are of the utmost importance for the theory of the first origin of life. But most other organisms, also, at a certain period of their existence—at least, in the first period of their life—in the shape of egg-cells or germ-cells, are essentially nothing but simple little lumps of such albuminous formative matter, known as plasma, or protoplasma. They then differ from the Monera only by the fact that in the interior of the albuminous corpuscle the cell-kernel, or nucleus, has separated itself from the surrounding cell-substance (protoplasma). As we have already pointed out, the cells, with their simple attributes, are so many citizens, who by co-operation and differentiation build up the body of even the most perfect organism; this being, as it were, a cell republic. The fully developed form and the vital phenomena of such an organism are determined solely by the activities of these small albuminous corpuscles.

It may be considered as one of the greatest triumphs of recent biology, especially of the theory of tissues, that we are now able to trace the wonder of the phenomena of life to these substances, and that we can demonstrate the infinitely manifold and complicated physical and chemical properties of the albuminous bodies to be the real cause of organic or vital phenomena. All the different forms of organisms are simply and directly the result of the combination of the different forms of cells. The infinitely manifold varieties of form, size, and combination of the cells have arisen only gradually by the division of labor, and by the gradual adaptation of the simple homogeneous lumps of plasma, which originally were the only constituents of the cell-mass. From this it follows of necessity that the fundamental phenomena of life—nutrition and generation—in their highest manifestations, as well as in their simplest expressions, must also be traced to the material nature of that albuminous formative substance. The other vital activities are gradually evolved from these two. Thus, then, the general explanation of life is now no more difficult to us than the explanation of the physical properties of inorganic bodies. All vital phenomena and formative processes of organisms are as directly dependent upon the chemical composition and the physical forces of organic matter as the vital phenomena of inorganic crystals—that is, the process of their growth and their specific formation—are the direct results of their chemical composition and of their physical condition. The ultimate causes, it is true, remain in both cases concealed from us. When gold and copper crystallize in a cubical, bismuth and antimony in a hexagonal, iodine, and sulphur in a rhombic form of crystal, the occurrence is in reality neither more nor less mysterious to us than is every elementary process of organic formation, every self-formation of the organic cell. In this respect we can no longer draw a fundamental distinction between organisms and anorgana, a distinction of which, formerly, naturalists were generally convinced.

Let us secondly examine the agreements and differences which are presented to us in the formation of organic and inorganic natural bodies (Gen. Morph. i. 130). Formerly the simple structure of the latter and the composite structure of the former were looked upon as the principal distinction. The body of all organisms was supposed to consist of dissimilar or heterogeneous parts, of instruments or organs which worked together for the purposes of life. On the other hand, the most perfect anorgana, that is to say, crystals, were supposed to consist entirely of continuous or homogeneous matter. This distinction appears very essential. But it loses all importance through the fact that in late years we have become acquainted with the exceedingly remarkable and important Monera. The whole body of these most simple of all organisms—a semi-fluid, formless, and single lump of albumen—consists, in fact, of only a single chemical combination, and is as perfectly simple in its structure as any crystal, which consists of a single inorganic combination, for example, of a metallic salt or of a silicate of the earths and alkalies.

As naturalists believed in differences in the inner structure or composition, so they supposed themselves able to find complete differences in the external forms of organisms and anorgana, especially in the mathematically determinable crystalline forms of the latter. Certainly crystallization is pre-eminently a quality of the so-called anorgana. Crystals are limited by plane surfaces, which meet in straight lines and at certain measurable angles. Animal and vegetable forms, on the contrary, seem at first sight to admit of no such gepmetrical determination. They are for the most part limited by curved surfaces and crooked lines, which meet at variable angles. But in recent times we have become acquainted, among Radiolaria and among many other Protista, with a large number of lower organisms, whose body, in the same way as crystals, may be traced to a mathematically determinable fundamental form, and whose form in its whole, as well as in its parts, is bounded by definite geometrically determinable planes and angles. In my general doctrine of Fundamental Forms, or Promorphology, I have given detailed proofs of this, and at the same time established a general system of forms, the ideal stereometrical type forms, which explain the real forms of inorganic crystals, as well as of organic individuals (Gen. Morph. i. 375–574). Moreover, there are also perfectly amorphous organisms, like the Monera, Amœba, etc., which change their forms every moment, and in which we are as little able to point out a definite fundamental form as in the case of the shapeless or amorphous anorgana, such as non-crystallized stones, deposits, etc. We are consequently unable to find any essential difference in the external forms or the inner structure of anorgana and organisms.

Thirdly, let us turn to the forces or the phenomena of motion of these two different groups of bodies (Gen. Morph. i. 140). Here we meet with the greatest difficulties. The vital phenomena, known as a rule only in the highly developed organisms, in the more perfect animals and plants, seem there so mysterious, so wonderful, so peculiar, that most persons are decidedly of opinion that in inorganic nature there occurs nothing at all similar, or in the least degree comparable to them. Organisms are for this very reason called animate, and the anorgana, inanimate natural bodies. Hence, even so late as the commencement of the present century, the science which investigates the phenomena of life, namely physiology, retained the erroneous idea that the physical and chemical properties of matter were not sufficient for explaining these phenomena. In our own day, especially during the last ten years, this idea may be regarded as having been completely refuted. In physiology, at least, it has now no place. It now never occurs to a physiologist to consider any of the vital phenomena as the result of a mysterious vital force, of an active power working for a definite purpose, standing outside of matter, and, so to speak, taking only the physico-chemical forces into its service. Modern physiology has arrived at the strictly monistic conviction that all of the vital phenomena, and, above all, the two fundamental phenomena of nutrition and propagation are purely physico-chemical processes, and directly dependent on the material nature of the organism, just as all the physical and chemical qualities of every crystal are determined solely by its material composition. Now, as the elementary substance which determines the peculiar material composition of organisms is carbon, we must ultimately reduce all vital phenomena, and, above all, the two fundamental phenomena of nutrition and propagation, to the properties of the carbon. The peculiar-chemico-physical properties, and especially the semi-fluid state of aggregation, and the easy decomposibility of the exceedingly composite albuminous combinations of carbon, are the mechanical causes of those peculiar phenomena of motion which distinguish organisms from anorgana, and which in a narrow sense are usually called "life."

In order to understand this "carbon theory," which I have established in detail in the second book of my General Morphology, it is necessary, above all things, closely to examine those phenomena of motion which are common to both groups of natural bodies. First among them is the process of growth. If we cause any inorganic solution of salt slowly to evaporate, crystals are formed in it, which slowly increase in size during the continued evaporation of the water. This process of growth arises from the fact that new particles continually pass over from the fluid state of aggregation into the solid, and, according to certain laws, deposit themselves upon the firm kernel of the crystal already formed. From such an apposition of particles arise the mathematically definite crystalline shapes. In like manner the growth of organisms takes place by the accession of new particles. The only difference is that in the growth of organisms, in consequence of their semi-fluid state of aggregation, the newly-added particles penetrate into the interior of the organisms (inter-susception), whereas anorgana receive homogeneous matter from without only by apposition or an addition of new particles to the surface. This important difference of growth by inter-susception and by apposition is obviously only the necessary and direct result of the different conditions of density or state of aggregation in organisms and anorgana.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The advocates of Christianity commonly represent, and the masses under the influence of their teachings sincerely believe, that to the influence of their system is justly ascribable the civilization of the nineteenth century. But for the enlightenment which has come from this faith, they tell us, we would to-day be in a state of darkness and degradation, but little, if any, superior to that of the savages whose condition we so much pity and deplore. Let the light of this religion be extinguished, and, we are assured, nothing but another intervention of God could prevent the relapse of the civilized nations of the world into a state of barbarism. Only where Christianity has shed its benign influence, it is said, have nations attained to real greatness, or individuals been able to discover the true principles of moral duty. A contrast between the nations of the world in which the blessings of this faith are enjoyed, and those to which Christianity has never extended, or in which it has been replaced by some other religion, should, we are told, satisfy any candid mind, of its elevating and enlightening power. And, say its defenders farther, in view of the manifold evidences which attest its beneficent tendency, opposition to it, or denial of its divine character, can proceed only from a perverted mind or a depraved heart. These are common representations. If the most able and distinguished advocates of Christianity do not set them forth in the manner I have stated them; if some of them qualify their claims so as to somewhat weaken their force, and give the opponents of their faith less cause to question their fairness, they yet generally allow these popular assumptions to remain uncontradicted—fearing, perhaps, that by destroying belief in them they might weaken confidence in the system itself, so intimately are they associated in the popular mind—while the majority of the Christian clergymen who speak directly to the people, and of Christian writers who fill up the orthodox papers, and whose writings constitute the cheap and popular religious literature of the land, take essentially the position I have stated, and in language not much unlike that which I have used. So familiar are the people with these representations, so frequently are they repeated by men respected for their supposed learning and candor, that to raise a question concerning them is to incur the charge of ignorance, of a disposition to cavil, or even of downright dishonesty.

I propose to examine in this lecture some of these assumptions of the advocates of Christianity, and to inquire whether its influence has been altogether good, and whether the world is largely indebted to it for its present advanced condition.

In the first place, the Christian who affirms that intellectual and moral greatness is incompatible with the absence of Christianity, forgets, in his zeal for his faith, that civilizations of a high type preceded, many centuries, the advent of the Christian religion. Not to speak of other nations, ancient Greece may be referred to as a familiar illustration of the fact that man has been able to attain to a very high degree of advancement independently of any revealed system of faith. The Greeks were certainly a great people. To them historians trace the beginnings of our intellectual civilization. "Like their own goddess, Athenae, the people of Athens," says Max Müller, "seem to spring full-armed into the arena of history, and we look in vain to Egypt, Syria, and India, for more than a few seeds that burst into such marvelous growth on the soil of Attica" (Science of Language, 2 series, p. 404).

The Greeks found the world in a state of comparative darkness, with despotic governments, with the oriental form of society, with hereditary and powerful priesthoods, with art graceless and grotesque, with a literature only of the poorest kind, with but little science, no drama, no oratory, no history worthy the name; and yet they were able to lay the foundations of the intellectual culture of all the succeeding ages, and even to carry some of the higher arts to a degree of perfection which has never been surpassed and hardly equaled in the ages that have followed. Five centuries before the Christian religion appeared, there was a glory in Greece, lit up by the rays of the arts of peace and war converging there, which shone through all the nations and made it the brightest spot on earth. The greatest and noblest minds of every succeeding age have looked back upon that period with wonder and admiration. During the 2,300 years that have followed, literature in its most flourishing period, has rekindled her torch at the altars of Greece, and art has gone back to the age of Pericles for her purest and noblest models. Of all the epic poems ever written, the Iliad of Homer, composed far back in the twilight of history, is probably the greatest. The heroic odes of Pindar are to-day regarded as models of their kind. Demosthenes' orations are regarded as the finest specimens of eloquence extant. The works of Plato are yet carefully studied by the profoundest and most philosophic minds. The old Greek plays are still valued for their many excellencies. The histories of Herodotus, Xenophon and Thucydides possess great merits as compositions, and are prized for the light which they throw upon the past. The statues of Greece still stand forth, after the lapse of ages, in unrivaled beauty. Modern architects have not improved on the proportions of Athenian architecture, and some of the pictures of Athens have been pronounced by competent judges, equal in excellence to the Venus de Medicis, the Appollo Belvedere, or the Dying Gladiator.

We go back to ancient Greece not only for the beginnings of our intellectual culture, but for our ideas of personal liberty and individual rights. The government of Athens was a democracy, under which the free inhabitants were voters, as they are to-day in our own republic. No people ever had a more passionate love of liberty than the ancient Greeks. "The popular legislator or the successful soldier might dare to encroach upon their liberties in the moment when the nation was intoxicated and dazzled with their genius, their prowess and success; but a sudden revulsion of popular feeling, and an explosion of popular indignation would overturn the one and ostracism expel the other. Thus while inconstancy and turbulence and faction seem to have been inseparable from the democratic spirit, the Athenians were certainly constant in their love of liberty, faithful in their affections for their country, and invariable in their sympathy and admiration for that genius which shed glory upon their native land" (Cocker's Christianity and Greek Philosophy, p. 46).

"In their private life the Athenians were courteous, generous and humane. Whilst bold and free in the expression of their opinions, they paid the greatest attention to rules of politeness, and were nicely delicate on points of decorum. They had a natural sense of what was becoming and appropriate, and an innate aversion to all extravagance. A graceful demeanor and a quiet dignity were distinguishing traits of Athenian character. They were temperate and frugal in their habits, and little addicted to ostentation and display. . . All their sumptuousness and magnificence were reserved for and lavished on their public edifices and monuments of art which made Athens the pride of Greece and the wonder of the world. Intellectually, the Athenians were remarkable for their quickness of apprehension, their nice and delicate preception, their intuitional power and their versatile genius" (I bid, p. 46-48).

Such was the character of the people of Athens—as described by a candid Christian scholar—a people that the clergy are accustomed to represent as destitute of all the elements of true greatness.

I may add, we go back to the same heathen land and pre-Christian times, for characters from whom the most zealous Christian cannot withhold a hearty admiration—men in whom "greatness of mind seem but second to greatness to virtue," who are referred to to-day, after Christianity has had centuries in which to show its powers in the development of character, as models of moral excellence. The disinterestedness of Timoleon, the stern justice and exalted purity of Aristides, the patriotic and self-sacrificing spirit of Leonidas and his immortal Three Hundred, the fortitude and moral courage of Socrates have never been surpassed in any Christian land, and will ever challenge the admiration of mankind. The models of Greece were pagans, and they are the models of the civilized world to-day.

Surely a people like the ancient Greeks, a people that spoke and wrote a language remarkable for its affluence and finish, with a literature of marvelous richness and beauty, works of art never surpassed and systems of philosophy which this age alone has been able to add to and advance beyond, a people that gave to the world great models of moral excellence, whose national history is replete with accounts of patriotic devotion, moral heroism, disinterestedness, and self-sacrifice as well as great achievements of an intellectual character which have left "a lingering glory on the historic page which centuries have not been able to eclipse or dim,"—surely such a people were not devoid of the essential elements of greatness, and although they were "heathens," but few modern nations have attained to so high a civilization. When such a people flourished ages before Christianity had its birth, can it be truthfully or candidly maintained that this religion is necessary to national greatness or personal virtue, that the absence of Christianity among us would be followed by the destruction of everything which makes life desirable, or that distinguishes the civilized man from the brutal savage?

We would not intimate that antiquity was free from great evils, that Greece herself, or even Athens did not have her full share; nor would we intimate that great progress has not been made, in many respects, since the age of Pericles.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE ancients, whose genius was less limited, and whose philosophy was more extended, wondered less than we do at facts which they could not explain. They had a better view of Nature, such as she is; a sympathy, a singular correspondence, was to them only a phenomenon, while to us it is a paradox when we cannot refer it to our pretended laws of motion.—Buffon.

Letters from the Devil.

NO. XXIII.

THE GLACIAL PERIOD.

MY DEAR READERS: Two weeks of very hot weather have passed by since my last letter to you, and while hundreds over your land have sunk beneath the fierce rays of the sun, I am pleased that so many of you survive and are in a condition to read and enjoy my letters to you. As a change from my prosy letters on botany, and to divert your minds, if possible, from the heated term through which you are now passing, let me talk to you in this letter on the subject of the Glacial Period, when your portion of the globe was submerged under almost perpetual snow and ice from 100 to 1,000 feet in thickness.

You must know that immense changes have taken place, not only upon the surface of your globe, but also in its climate. In the vast eras in which the earth has revolved aroundits superior orb,the northern hemisphere and even the polar regions have experienced immense changes in temperature. This has been the result of different causes, but principally from the almost imperceptible change of the poles of the earth. What is now the north frigid zone, once had a temperature high enough to produce the most luxuriant vegetation, which has been proved by the coal deposits which have been found there, the same as I have before told you being the product of the growth called the coal plants. Animals also existed in former ages in those regions, which could only live in a warm climate. Among these may be named the elephant, the rhinoceros, the mammoth, the mastadon, and other animals of immense size which have long since passed out of existence. Let me tell you, this era goes back hundreds of thousands of years in the history of your world.

That period, however, was succeeded by one of intense frigidity, which was destructive of nearly all forms of life. The snow which fell during long periods of time, did not melt, but continued to accumulate until in many places it was hundreds of feet in depth. This, by pressure and other influences, gradually became compact as ice. From the mountains and hills, glaciers descended to the valleys below, with great force if not rapidity, carrying rocks and everything before them. Next, the vast areas of snow and ice moved slowly but surely to the south, the descent of the land being in that direction. They moved in bodies containing thousands of square feet, and often a thousand feet in thickness. Immense rocks, often weighing thousands of tons, were imbedded in, and carried by these moving bodies of ice, and many of them hundreds of miles from points whence they started. The grooves or furrows thus produced by protruding corners of the rocks were so deep as to remain visible for the vast era that has since passed, and are still plainly to be seen in thousands of places, both in Northern Europe and Asia, also in the northern part of your own hemisphere.

This attrition of the traveling rocks grinding upon the surface below, changed them to a rounded and smooth form called boulders, and which are found in large numbers in all that portion of the globe alluded to. Some of these boulders are fifty feet across, but generally of considerably smaller size, as many of you have had opportunity to see.

It may be well understood that these glaciers traveled slowly, the rate of travel being governed by the grade of declivity down which they passed. The force of the propelling bodies, however, was often so great as to force vast thicknesses of ice up a rising grade of considerable altitude. A large proportion of these glaciers were forced into the sea and became icebergs, many of them of immense magnitude, and by the water were borne away hundreds of miles, and sometimes thousands. As they melted, the boulders, and clay, and sand thus transported, were deposited in the bottom of the ocean, or upon shoals and islands.

Other vast bodies of the glaciers when reaching the lower latitudes—as low as the 40th degree—gradually yielded to the increasing heat and melted, leaving their deposits of sand, and clay, and boulders upon the surface of the earth, where they remain to this day. Few or none of these boulders are found south of the 40th degree of latitude. The amount of drift thus transported from the northern regions to those more southern, and deposited in the ocean and on the land, was of such magnitude and proportions as would utterly startle you could you appreciate the same in its entirety.

Beside the rocks, and other material named, which were thus transported by the glaciers, the carcasses of huge animals were also sometimes thus transported for great distances. Specimens of the animals, mastadons, mammoth, megaceros, megatheriums, etc., have been found as the ice slowly melted hundreds of miles whence they started their journey. This is especially true of northern Asia, or Siberia.

Glaciers are still forming at the present time in nearly all countries where the mountains rise fifteen thousand feet and over above the sea level. Above that altitude, snow does not melt, even in the torrid zone. The snow, then, that falls upon these high altitudes, after accumulating in immense quantities, either descends in the form of avalanches, in great rapidity and destructive force, or after having assumed the compact form of ice, slowly but surely descend to the valleys below. This takes place on an extensive scale on the Swiss Alps, where the snow ceases to melt at an altitude of 9,000 feet. There are 1,500 square miles of ice in the Alpine range, from 80 to 600 feet in thickness. These rivers of ice, or glaciers, move at various rates, according to the nature of ground over which they pass, and the condition of the weather; from eight to twelve inches a day is an ordinary rate of advance.

These moving glaciers of ice possess a certain plasticity which causes them to conform to considerable extent to the nature of the ground over which they pass. Large fissures or crevices not unfrequently occur, from thirty to fifty feet in width, and much more in depth. Some of the glaciers of the Alps are as much as twenty miles long, and often a mile in width, with a thickness of several hundred feet.

As these immense bodies of ice slowly but irresistibly move down the mountain side, they break off masses of the rock over which they pass, and these become imbedded in the bottom, and act as so many plows and groovers, scoring the rocks over which they pass in parallel lines, while the ice that contains none of these rocks acts merely as a polisher of the rocky surface beneath.

Where the temperature of a country is so low that snow cannot melt, the whole face of it becomes covered with snow, which, as I have told you, consolidates into ice, forming one grand mass, and this moves toward the sea, as the land usually slopes in that direction, and when it reaches the water it breaks in immense bodies, and goes floating off as icebergs, carrying frequently rocks upon their surface, which, when the ice melts, is strewed on the floor of the ocean. This process is constantly taking place, both in the northern and southern polar regions.

The country you call Greenland may be divided into two regions, exterior and interior. The inland, which is 800 miles from west to east, and a much greater length from north to south, is a vast unknown continent, buried under one continuous and colossal mass of permanent ice, which is always moving seaward. On reaching the coast it presents a perpendicular wall of ice two thousand feet high, and slopes gradually towards the interior, to unknown heights as far as the eye can reach. Although the ice is moving seaward the greatest quantity is discharged at the heads of large friths four or five miles in width. Through these the ice has protruded in large blocks several miles wide, and from ten to fifteen hundred feet in thickness. When these masses reach the friths, they do not melt or break up into fragments, but continue their course in a solid form under the salt water, grating along upon the rocky bottom, which they groove and polish at depths of hundreds and even many thousands of feet.

At length, when there is water enough to float them, huge portions, having broken off, fill Baffin's Bay with icebergs of a size exceeding any which could be produced by ordinary valley glaciers. Stone, sand, and mud, are often included in these icebergs which float southward from their northern starting point.

A large portion of the northern hemisphere, including your own country, was during the drift period in a similar condition to that here described. An immense sheet of ice often thousands of feet in thickness covered the land at the 40th degree of latitude. Its general direction as I have said, was towards the south, where it could melt, and room be found for the accumulating mass, transporting as I have told you, masses of rock for hundreds of miles. There are now found in the states of Ohio and Indiana, boulders of granite which were thus transported from Canada; and the northorn shores of Long Island are strewn with boulders of red sandstone and granite from Connecticut.

Thus, over thousands of square miles lay the great ice-field, rising in terrace beyond terrace to the north, slowly moving to the south. Like an enormous rasp or file, it rounded the mountains on its march, partially filling great cavities below with the debris worn from the rocks.

This state of things continued for a prolonged term of years, during the prevalence of the cold era. Later, the temperate zones became warm dura part of the year at least, and it was only the frigid zone that was subject to perpetual frost. Genial springs and summers supervened in the latitudes where you now reside, and vegetable and animal life in all its varied forms spread over it, from the more southern region where the cold had not penetrated.

Were it not for the grooves and furrows cut into the rocks and surface of the earth by the vast masses of moving ice, studded with rock and boulders, and were it not for the vast numbers of these boulders and the accompanying drift that are found in many portions of the country, there would be no proofs of the glacial period remaining behind. Life now flourishes as vigorously, and nature smiles as sweetly as though the portion of the earth's surface which you inhabit had never been covered over with vast seas of ice.

I may state to you, that the southern hemisphere has also had its cold era, and its glacial experience has not been unlike that of the northern hemisphere.

Now kind friends, hoping that what I have said to you about the vast bodies of ice and snow may serve to partially cool your fevered brows and heated blood at this season when Old Sol is pouring his hottest rays upon you, allow me to take my leave of you, for another week, wishing you in the meantime, a rich fund of health and happiness, which a peaceful mind and a good life never fail to afford.

Believe me still your sincere friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called, "Splitfoot."

The question as to how the Sun is constituted was considered by the most distinguished of astronomers long before the discovery of the spectrum analysis enabled the inquirer, seated in his study, to ascertain what was taking place millions and milliards of miles away, and the result naturally was that many diverse theories were propounded.

Herschel, Laplace, and several other astronomers of mark, held that the Sun consisted of an obscure body, surrounded by an atmosphere in which floated a deep stratum of clouds, and only the upper part of which was in ignition; whence it would follow that the Sun might be inhabited. This ingenious theory takes account of the various appearances presented by the spots with which the solar body is often studded, and acquires great probability from the polarizing experiments made by Arago. It has, however, been called in question of late years, chiefly owing to the results obtained from the spectrum analysis. If a flame containing metallic vapors is submitted to this analysis, their presence is denoted by characteristic colored rays; but if behind this flame is a second luminous source more intense than the first, and containing the same metallic vapors, instead of the superposed rays receiving an accretion of brilliancy, the rays of the fainter focus will absorb those emanating from the more ardent one, and in the place of luminous there will be obscure rays. And, as the solar rays emit precisely similar beams, and give what is technically termed an inverse or reversed spectrum, Kirchoff has concluded that the body of the Sun must be more incandescent than its atmosphere.

But M. Petit, a former director of the Toulouse Observatory, in a memoir communicated to the Académie des Sciences, points out that this theory takes no account either of the spots penumbræ, faculæ or luculæ, or of the absence of polarization. And as the eclipses of the Sun have recently revealed that the photosphere is surrounded by a second aeriform envelope, luminous like the first, though in a minor degree, he very justly says that the inverse spectrum of the sun is easily to be explained, if we suppose that the second atmosphere contains metallic vapors of the same nature as those in the first. He concludes, therefore, that it is not necessary to admit that the solar nucleus is in a state of fusion, and Herschel's opinion as to the possibility of the Sun being inhabited need not be called in question. He adds, "Instead of an incandescent body, which must in the nature of things become cool and die out, we might thus imagine an incessant revivifying of the combustible properties, by organized beings inhabiting the surface of the solar nucleus, and maintaining the equilibrium, just as the plants and animals do in our own atmosphere."

Arago says, "If were asked the simple question, 'Is the Sun inhabited?' I should reply that I did not know. But if I were asked whether the Sun is habitable for beings organized like ourselves, I should have no hesitation in answering in the affirmative. The existence in the Sun of an obscure central nucleus, enveloped in an opaque atmosphere, separated by a considerable space from a luminous atmosphere, is by no means inconsistent with such a supposition. Herschel believed that the Sun was inhabited. He maintained that if the solar atmosphere, in which the luminous chemical reaction takes place, is a million leagues deep, there is no reason why the brilliancy should anywhere exceed that of an ordinary Aurora Borealis. The arguments upon which he relied as proof that the solar nucleus is not necessarily very hot, notwithstanding the incandescence of the atmosphere, are neither the only nor the most powerful ones that might be adduced. The direct observation, taken by Father Secchi, as to the lessened temperature of those points on the solar disc where the spots are noticed, is, in regard to this fact, of more importance than all the theoretical arguments put together. Dr. Elliott asserted, as early as 1787, that the sunlight was given by what he called a dense and universal Aurora Borealis, and he held, with the ancient philosophers, that the Sun might be inhabited. When he was tried at the Old Bailey for the murder of Miss Boydell, his friends—Dr. Simon amongst others—declared that he was out of his mind, and cited as a clear proof of his insanity the pages in which the opinions just quoted were embodied. The ideas of a madman are nearly always adopted. This anecdote seems fitted to figure in the annals of science, and I have taken it from 'Brewster's Encyclopædia.'"

X.

The astronomers of the present day are less unanimous than they were in Arago's time as to the possibility of the Sun being inhabited; but M. Vicaire, in a communication to the Académie des Sciences, endeavors to show that we must go back to the theory of Wilson, Herschel, and Arago, as to the existence, within the photosphere, of a nucleus comparatively cool and obscure.

To use his own language: "The principal objection that has been advanced against the hypothesis is that this nucleus, subject to the radiation of the photosphere, would long since have acquired the same temperature. This objection falls to the ground if the heat received by this nucleus is employed in waporizing the liquid of which it is formed. Moreover, this heat may and must be only a trifling fraction of what is emitted by the photosphere, absorbed as it is by the intermediate stratum, which is incessantly re-conducting it into the photosphere. As to the length of time that the nucleus has been subject to this volatilization, there is nothing to prove that it is to be measured by the total duration of the earth. I believe, on the contrary, that the sun, as at present constituted, has only shone upon this globe since the most recent geological periods."

Many astronomers, Father Secchi and M. Faye among them, believe that the whole mass of the Sun is gaseous, and that the speed of its various strata increases from the surface to the centre. The former says: "When the Sun at the epoch of its formation had reached a volume about equivalent to that which it now possesses, its temperature would have been at least five hundred million degrees, and moreover, we know by experiments that even now its surface temperature amounts to several million degrees; that of the interior is probably higher still. We must conclude from these facts that the Sun cannot be composed of a solid mass; nor, enormous as may be the pressure existent in this mass, it cannot possibly, so to speak, be in a liquid state. Whence we are necessarily led to the supposition that it is gaseous, notwithstanding its extreme condensation."

M. Delaunay, of the Institute, says: "The enormous temperature which the Sun must possess, renders very probable the existence in its atmosphere of the various bodies just mentioned (different metals). Upon the other hand, as the volume of the Sun is 1,260,000 times that of the terrestrial globe, and as its mass is only 314,760 times that of the Earth, the mean density of the Sun is only a quarter that of the Earth, and consequently not much greater than that of water. Such being the case, it is difficult to believe that the Sun is a solid body enveloped in a covering of brilliant clouds, constituting what is termed the photosphere. I am inclined, rather, to agree with M. Faye, that the Sun is a gaseous mass with a very elevated temperature, which prevents the elementary substances that enter into its composition from consolidating; while their decrease in heat superficially, brought about by the radiation into the celestial spaces beyond, would facilitate the production of combinations, which in turn, owing to the formation of solid and pulverulent precipitates, disseminated in the outer strata of the gaseous mass, would produce the brilliant light of the photosphere. These solid precipitates would, by reason of their greater density, gradually descend into the inner portion of the mass, where they would be decomposed by the high temperature and again become gaseous. Moreover, these descending currents would cause the formation of ascending currents, by means of which the matters in the inner part would be brought to the surface, so that the whole gaseous mass would in this way contribute to sustain the vast production of heat and light upon the Sun's surface. The spots, varying in number, position, shape, and size, which are generally visible in the Sun, would merely be gaps accidentally made, amidst the refulgent clouds of the photosphere, by the currents alluded to above."

For my own part, after comparing the various solutions that have been proposed, I must pronounce for the gaseous nature of the Sun.

MR. W. J. R. HARGRAVE will be present at the Watkins Convention. He says in his Freethought Journal, "Let every Canadian Freethinker who can possibly do so attend at Watkins."

MR. T. C. LELAND, of this city, will speak on the "Organization of the Liberal Forces" at the Watkins Convention.

The Society of Humanity on the Death of Mr. Bryant.

The following, touching the death of the great poet and man, William Cullen Bryant, should have appeared in these columns earlier. Although he was not fully an Infidel or Freethinker, we have just grounds for claiming him as one of ourselves. He was a man of humanitarian and progressive views and had little faith in dogma or sectarianism. He was truly one of Nature's noblemen and should be fondly cherished in every American heart.

At the regular meeting of the Society of Humanity, for June, Mr. T. B. Wakeman moved the following resolutions, which were unanimously approved and ordered to be sent to the family of Mr. Bryant and to be published:

WHEREAS, one of the truest and most useful ways of serving the Religion of Humanity is to recognize and appreciate its fruits in the lives of those who have illustrated it—all the more beautifully, because simply and unconsciously: therefore,

Resolved: That the close of the long and illustrious career of the poet, William Cullen Bryant, prompts an expression of gratitude, not only for the heritage he has left his countrymen in a life of singular usefulness, goodness, and purity, but also and especially for his consecrating influence as an unpretending but true priest of Nature and Humanity. In this regard, we rejoice that through his poetry our natural American landscape has been interpreted to the human heart; that through his soul it has been infused with meaning and incorporated into the love and recognition of our people, until all within the framework of "old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste"—the mountains and vales, rivers and brooks, forests and flowers, even to the dropping leaf and the rabbit's tread—have become the sacred symbols of the deep unity which binds Man to Earth, his Mother.

Resolved: That we are still more grateful that his deep appreciation and sympathy with the processes of Nature were crowned by a higher and never failing love and confidence in Mankind, inspiring faith in their liberty, progress, and ultimate triumph, when the Flood of Years shall have widened out into the ocean of the universally True and Good on earth. That in this light we regard his last eloquent words, in dedicating among us the statue and memory of Joseph Mazzini, the Humanitarian Liberal, as the fitting conclusion of his own life, and the voice of the aspiration that has insured his own immortality.

Resolved: That we regret to hear any of his works referred to as "Pagan" or "Christian;" for we feel that, from his youth up, from "Thanatopsis" to "The Flood of Years," he had risen above past stages of thought and feeling into a higher and broader realm, wherein all creeds are but relative symbols of the higher life of Man; that only in the light of that realm can he be judged, and the incalculable blessings of his earthly days have their full meaning and influence. CORTLANDT PALMER, President.

E. F. ERVING, Secretary.

Harmonious Co-operation.

To all persons, and especially those who are seeking and imparting truth and teaching the liberty of expression, we cordially extend an invitation to attend our Freethinkers' Association meeting, to be held at Watkins, N. Y., August 22d, 23d, 24th, and 25th, 1878. Our object in calling attention to our first annual gathering is to have it early understood that so far as we can, in word and deed, we shall give all civil classes, sects, or parties, an equal opportunity to declare their views of right and wrong, for the good of all. To hear all sides is the only safe way to fairly glean the facts so necessary to the formation of a wise conclusion. Christians, Spiritualists, Materialists, and all sincere lovers of the known, or the unknown, shall be welcome to our platform.

We invite and protect universal expression of thought in the name of human liberty. It is unfair to dictate and command when it is better to make plain all experience and observation. We are to meet as earnest investigators and thinkers, not like egotists and fierce disputants. Ignorance and superstition seem the greatest enemies of individual development.

The blighting influence of fable, myth, miracle, and morbid fear, born of theology and its various religions, must meet the tests of reason and logic. Justice and honesty as a rule and basis of action, with the evolution of thought, will elevate our race to the religion of science. Come as seekers of knowledge, which will make better fathers, better mothers, better teachers, and better citizens. Support mental liberty by knowledge, love, and intellect. Equality should be ruled by individual rights and privileges; charity perpetuated by our experience in doing as we desire to be done by. It is acknowledged that the strength of a chain is its weakest link; and superstition, not science, is the weak link in the great chain of human thought. Useful culture will take its place in just the degree we mete out to each individual equal education in the immediate wants of body and mind. Perfect the body and mind to safely civilize and save the individual. T. L. BROWN,

Binghampton, N. Y., July 5, 1878.

COL. JOHN C. BUNDY, of Chicago, we are pleased to announce, has promised to be present at Watkins. Hundreds of his readers, and many others, will be pleased to meet him at the great Liberal gathering.

The opinions of men are received according to the ancient belief, and upon trust, as if they were religion and law. Another religion, other witnesses, and like promises and threats, might by the same way imprint quite a contrary belief.—Montaigne.

IN the republic of mind, one is a majority. There, all are monarchs, and all are equals. The tyranny of a majority even is unknown. Each one is crowned, sceptered, and throned. Upon every brow is the tiara, and around every form is the imperial purple. Only those are good citizens who express their honest thoughts, and those who persecute for opinion's sake are the only traitors. There, nothing is considered infamous except an appeal to brute force, and nothing sacred but love, liberty, and joy. The Church contemplates this republic with a sneer. From the teeth of hatred she draws back the lips of scorn. She is filled with the spite and spleen born of intellectual weakness. Once she was egotistic; now she is envious. Once she wore upon her hollow breast false gems, supposing them to be real. They have been shown to be false, but she wears them still. She has the malice of the caught, the hatred of the exposed. —Ingersoll.

Answers to Inquirers.

A. A.—Do the Council of Ten and the Three State Inquisitors at present constitute a part of the Venetian Government. Ans.—We think not. Since Italy has become a consolidated government, the local governments are done away with. Venice now has not an independent government, but is subservient to the government of the State.

A. C. McD.—Is Man a free moral agent according to the Bible? If not, tell why? Ans.—To a certain extent we are free moral agents; that is to say, no superior intelligence or deity controls us against our wills. We can act according as our tastes and wishes dictate, unless prevented by surrounding circumstances. We are all subject to the laws of our being, of the universe, and to the conditions that surround us, and we cannot be free enough to rise superior to them.

SAME.—Which are the best books to read to refute the Bible with? Ans.—"Paine's Age of Reason," Cooper's "Enquirer's Text Book," Wright's "Errors of the Bible," "An Eye Opener," and "Christianity and Infidelity"—all well adapted to the business.

S. W. J.—Johnny Wright announces to Jenny Bright (both of lawful age) that he is in deep love, and will marry Jenny, who assents. Then Johnny says: "Please give me your right hand"—repeating the common form of marriage—promising before God and the holy angels as witnesses that he now takes the lady whose hand he holds as his loving, wedded wife—promising to provide for, shield and protect her through life, till death shall separate them both. Then she also repeats a similar promise, of her own free will and accord, in the presence of God and angel witnesses, to be from henceforth wedded to Johnny Wright for life, promising him to love and obey so long as life endures between them both. To all of this, both give their unqualified assent, sealing with kisses. Is this truly marriage per se, or only an engagement, or what? If this ceremony fails, then what effect would a mutual writing, signed by both parties, confirming their marriage, have? What God hath joined, have disinterested parties any more right to rend asunder than if two loving birds had formed a mutual alliance? Ans.—According to the laws of New York and several other States, the ceremony the correspondent propounds would be legal marriage. One form is here equally as binding as another. Even a man and woman living together as man and wife, and giving it out that they are, even when no ceremony has been performed, constitutes them legally man and wife. This is not, however, the case in all the States. In several of the States a license has to be procured from the clerk of the county court and the ceremony performed by a regular clergyman or a justice of the peace. In States where the ceremony above given would be insufficient to constitute legal marriage, any written form without the services of a clergyman or magistrate would be no better. Morally and in fact, marriage is only a civil contract, and any competent witness should be sufficient to make it legal. But the laws of the several States have to be observed by the citizens thereof.

J. L. F.—Is not the fact that we receive a mind from some source which matter is not capable of giving us conclusive evidence of the truth of the assertion that there exists a mind superior to and independent of matter or nature? Ans.—We do not receive our minds from a source independent of matter or nature. We get our minds from the same source and at the same time we do our bodies. Both exist at first in a rudimental state, and both grow and develop together. The mind is wholly the result of matter or nature, precisely as the body is. There can be no mind without a brain and other material mental organization. We obtain our minds and our bodies by the same laws of nature that all the animals obtain theirs. They all have bodies and minds, but their minds are not as perfect or of as high a grade as ours, because their organizations for generating minds are not as perfect as ours. Many of the animals have bodies superior, in point of strength and activity, to ours. That is, their physical organizations are, in some respects, better organized. Thus, the character of the organization, both physical and mental, governs the result produced; and it is the same throughout all nature. So, as we do not obtain our minds outside of nature, we see in it all no proof of an independent, supernatural mind or deity.

MEN are oaks, women are vines, children are flowers.—Ingersoll.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Consolations of Rationalism.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

Not with sad hearts would we come into this place this morning, but with minds clear, with hope high, with souls open to all sweet and noble influences, as we think of the Supreme Power, of the mystery that envelops our life, of the stately march of the universe that we cannot explore. And we would feel a great awe in our hearts as we think that we are all brothers in a vast world; that we, too, are parts of the boundless creation, that we are struggling in the waves of the ocean of Time, taking our little gleam of sunshine and our drop of dew among our fellows; if our lot is small and weak, that there is that within us capable of using every opportunity, of enjoying every privilege, and of making the most of every occasion. We would, in these hours, deplore the imperfections of mankind, the sluggishness of our wish, the feebleness of our thought and desire. How shadowy our vision of good! how halting our purpose and determination! And yet the world goes on, and life grows richer, and man has more and more power over his circumstances. We would rejoice, not only in our hours of meditation and aspiring hope, but in hours of darkness, and loneliness, and weakness, and pain, that we have that within us that struggles and strives, and perseveres, and endures; that seeks and finds, that will not be crushed, that will not be bowed down, that will hope on, and hope ever. We rejoice in the widening thought that marks this age of ours, in the broadening and sweetening sympathy that extends itself further and further where grace and compassion are needed; in the increasing fortitude and courage, in the growing determination to hold evil at bay and compel the world to give up its long hidden secret of knowledge and beneficence. We rejoice in all the spread of truth, in the deepening love of liberty, in the higher respect for order, and harmony, and peace, and in that great vision of the nobler and better time coming that floods with light all higher spirit, and touches with its beams of radiance even the dark and stubborn ground where poverty and misery have their abode. Be it ours to feel that we live in a world full of light, and grandeur, and glory; full of promise, full of coming joy. May it be the wish and purpose of our hearts to live in such a world, not basely or meanly, but worthily of men and women, lifting up our song of praise to that which is true, and beautiful, and good.

The consolations of Rationalism. Are there any? And if there are, how shall we express them?

I took up a sermon by Theodore Parker on "Conscious Religion as a Source of Joy." In that discourse he described in glowing language the joy that gladdened, and blessed, and warmed the heart of man, making one feel as if the world was saturated with joyfulness down to its very roots. He was a joyous man: warm, elastic, earnest, vigorous, always ready to laugh with those who laughed, and at the same time he was a keen observer of human life, of warm and active sympathy, and one of the most tender-hearted men I ever knew. His daily walk led him into the haunts of poverty, of wretchedness, of disappointment and sorrow, of crime and sin, where misery poured its complaint into his listening ear. With open hand and ready speech he ministered as he could to the evils of his kind. What a grand faith he had; a faith in Providence and a faith in the hereafter. The deepest conviction in the breast of Thedore Parker was the conviction of the existence of an absolutely wise, just, good, and kindly being, who ordered the world according to a perfect law, in the interest of perfect goodness, and he believed in a hereafter where everything was to be set right, where all questions were to be answered, every problem solved, and where humanity would come to the fullest enjoyment of its rights. Consequently, when Theodore Parker saw pain, he saw a purpose behind it; when he saw misery, he saw the wisdom that guided it; when he saw sorrow and sin, he saw the divine thought that sweetened the one and sanctified the other.

There was sent to me the other day, through the mail, a little pamphlet bearing this title: "Why was the Universe Created? and is the Universe Governed by a Divine Power?" It was evidently written by a calm and even-minded man, sympathetic, but not exuberantly so, a man of earnest moral sense and profound moral feeling. He felt laid upon himself the responsibility of facing the facts of the world and looking Faith in the eye; not, I should say, a deeply religious man, certainly not a sentimental man, not a dreamer, not a man of high or elastic hope, but a man who grimly and resolutely pushed on his way and looked at things as they were. The conclusion he came to evidently was, that to escape from the conviction that the universe was governed by a devil we must take recourse to the thought that it was not governed at all. He saw no guiding Author, no clue that pointed towards a heavenly Jerusalem. He saw poverty, misery, crime, suffering, and sin; a redeeming grace and purpose he saw not; and, with sturdy blow and inexorable will, he beat down all the guards which faith, and feeling, and hope, and trust, throw up to shield the head of the victim, man, from the blows that nature rains upon him. It is certain, he says, that for most human creatures life is no boon, but the reverse. They go to sleep at night with a secret wish in their hearts that they may never see another morning; they wake not to welcome a new day, but to meet it as well as they can. They look back upon a childhood of hereditary infirmities, of want, pain, and neglect, and think with bitterness of the limitations, and restraints, and repressions upon manhood, with a cry of weary disappointments and defeat; and there they are now, perhaps, with wrinkled faces and gray hairs sitting in the ashes with their piece of sackcloth which is ever laid upon their shrinking forms. The aspect of life is not hopeful as one looks at it with clear, undimned, and unflinching eyes. The surface of life, except here and there in a little spot, is not grand. The mass of mankind all over the world, in the most favored spots, are poor. Their lives are spent in hardship, and trial, and struggle. They have a little margin, perhaps, of enjoyment, but no privileges, scarcely an hour of the day when they can lie down in peace and sleep. They have no literature, no art, no pleasure, no nature, no joy, no society; their children want bread, their wives needing the care, and nursing, and comforts that they are unable to bestow. All their days are spent in just laying up a few dollars that bribe the gaunt wolf want to stay away from the door; nothing laid up for a rainy day, and only a low moaning that the rainy day may never come. That is the lot of all but a few here and there, in the choice spots of civilization, who have more than they can use of money, of time, of privilege, of opportunity; and these few are oppressed by their own surplus. They are not capable of completing their own lives; they cannot fill out their own capabilities. They can eat so much, drink so much, spend so much on clothing, on amusements, on recreation; but they lack the education, the trained skill, the commanding and consuming interest in affairs, to enable them to do full justice to their lives. They are oppressed with cares and beset with trouble, they must guard themselves against losing what they have, they must watch their investments and their income. And so their lives pass away, and, in the mean time, here are these millions of men and women holding their little homes by such a precarious tenure that they may be taken away any moment. An unlucky season, the failure of a single crop, an unfortunate investment, a time of war, or of famine, or of pestilence, desolating their homes, stopping their supplies, and cutting off their income, sends them back to the ground. They are just able in prosperous times to keep their heads above water. A Russian czar, a Turkish sultan, a German emperor, an English prime minister, an American congress—they have their thousands at their beck and call. There is a war, and these are the people who suffer; the poor are poorer, and the wretched are more wretched. Their houses are burned and their farms are desolated; husbands, brothers, bread-winners of every kind are buried in the bloody ground. The widow and the sister, the bride and the mother, mourn and lament and break their hearts; and the orphan children struggle up again into the light; and so the endless round goes on. And it is doubtful whether the time will ever come when the majority of mankind will be anything but poor. We do not see these things as we pass along the street, the superficial observer does not, but who that has an observing eye and feeling heart and watchful mind fails to see that life is not a joy, or a consolation, or a boon to the multitude of his kind?

What then are the consolations? Death is universal. Rich and poor, young and old, happy and sad, all go down before it and ask no questions. It does not wait upon your convenience or mine; it does not ask whether it is conferring a boon or whether it is wrecking a life: it goes on, and all the arts of thousands of years have not disarmed that old foe.

We speak of poverty, who have not felt it, and we say life is a school, experience is an educator, existence is a discipline. Yes, but it is a school where the lessons are taught in an unknown tongue, and where the school books are written in a Sanscrit that nobody can read. It is a lesson where the teacher does not seem to understand us and we do not understand the teacher.

If we could ever be sure that there is a superintending power of wisdom that looks after the individual interest—the individual interest, that is the thing. Not the interest of the ages, not the welfare of man, but your interest and mine, my brother and sister, then we could look with a calm and tranquil eye upon the world. Can it be true? You may believe it, you may hope for it, you may have an absolute conviction of it, but can you prove it? Have you never seen the righteous forsaken and his seed begging bread? I see it every day of my life. You may never have known it; the psalmist may never have met with it in his experience, but there is no man who walks the streets of New York on any day of any week of any month of any year who does not see a hundred instances. Yet the education of the race goes on; mankind in the long run get trained, and educated, and disciplined, and are the better for their sorrows, and the wiser for their beating; but how is it with you and me? Is the individual perfected by suffering? Now and then he is. There are few of us, perhaps, who cannot think of somebody who is better, much better, is even transformed and transfigured, perhaps, by the hardship, the toil, the struggle, the disappointment, and the bitter sorrow of life. I know men and women who have been made saintly by it, who have been glorified by it, who are examples of courage, and fortitude, and patience, and sweetness in consequence of it; but for every one of those I know ten who have been crushed by it, soured, embittered, made utterly dejected and completely prostrated by it.

Now the argument if it goes for anything must go so far as to show that Providence takes care of the individual. A Providence that does not take care of the individual is no Providence for me.

Then there is a faith in the hereafter. Can it be proved? Before the faith in the hereafter can be truly consoling it must be familiar, close, near, vital; so familiar as to be a part of the mind, so that we believe it as a matter of course. How many who believe it, believe it so? I have been a clergyman more than thirty years, I have attended death-beds, I have waited upon funerals, I have seen people in all stages of disappointment, despondency, and grief; I have attended the funerals of old men and women, of men and women in middle life, of children who sat upon life's threshold.

It was always the same thing. I have never yet found people who welcomed death because it sprung open the golden door. I have never stood in a chamber of sorrow or before any company of mourners at a funeral where there was the least gleam of joy. The silent face of death, calm and placid as if gone to sleep on a pleasant journey, was a rebuke to the mourners draped in solemn and heavy crape, wiping the tears from their eyes and choking the sobs in their bosoms. Yet they believed in the hereafter. If I had breathed a misgiving of the hereafter in their presence they would have been horrified and shocked. And yet their faith, all faith, rests as a hazy tradition upon the mind. It is accepted as sufficient in our glad hours, it is praised when we are talking upon theological questions; but when the hour comes when this faith is to be the reed we lean on, then this faith, this orthodox belief, the Christian belief, we feel to bend and break under the lightest pressure that we trust to it.

Then again before we can make this faith in the hereafter a perfect consolation, we must assume a great deal. Suppose that it is true that we live again; is it true that a perfect compensation will prevail in the hereafter? Are we sure that there justice will be rendered to everybody, that there the crooked will be made straight and the rough smooth? The same Providence must rule the next life that rules this. Is that the rule here? The same love must govern the world to come that governs the world in which we live. Is the world as we see it full of love? What right have you to assume that there everything will be changed, that there Lazarus will rest sweetly in Abraham's bosom, while here to the very last day of his death he is a miserable begger, grateful to the dogs who lapped his wounds? Is it not then an assumption? are we not asking too much? Everything in the way of consolation depends upon the reunion of those who are sundered, that we shall find our own again. Have we reason for thinking so? Suppose we do live again. Can we be perfectly sure that the heart's desire shall be gratified there? Then these misgivings will come. Feel as certain of the hereafter as we may in our hours of calm thought, when the mind is disturbed and the heart is racked, and the conscience is agonized, then come examinations and speculations like these to keep us still in fear. And how few, after all, are really consoled! Men forget, or they think of something else, or they become interested in other methods, or their attention is called away to some accidental circumstance in their lives, or they fall back upon the society of their friends or their kindred, or they become materialists.

Why do men live? We say, why are there not more suicides? Is it because of a dread of something after death that deters the will and makes us "rather bear the ills we have than fly to others we know not of"? Undoubtedly that is the case in a great many instances. I have myself known instances in which it was the case, and yet the numbers that have been restrained from suicide by considerations of this sort are very few. They are not perceptible in the tables of statistics, but hope a faith, that fate may bring a better day, that the rainstorm will pass off, that a door will be opened, that something will happen, an instinctive clinging to life, a determination to fight it out—this is what keeps men alive. The city of London is the largest, richest, most luxurious city in the world. Vicissitudes of fortune are greater there than anywhere else ; the struggle, and toil, and agony of life are probably more intense in London than they are in any city of the world, and twenty years ago the number of suicides in London was 240 It varies from 260 on the one side, to 213 on the other ; that was all the difference, and this difference was caused by modifications in the social system. In the year of their railway panic in London, when fortunes were shattered, and them that had had much had little or nothing, the rate touched its highest point. The next year it was a little better, and there are perhaps twenty suicides less. The next year things were more comfortable still, and the suicide rate decreased; and it got down in good years, when prosperity returned, to 213, the lowest point. Then there came another convulsion, and it rose again to 250 ; and so it alternates, not at the bidding of men's convictions, but according to the price of their bread. And the question was, is the burden of life tolerable, or is it not? If it is not, we go ; if it is, we stay.

WHAT A CHINESE PRIEST THINKS OF PROPHETS AND THEOLOGICAL MATTERS IN GENERAL.

While in California I visited a joss house or rather a heathen church. In it were several ugly idols. These idols were all gaudily painted. They were made of paper puffed out with wire. Some of them had many eyes, several hands, and now and then one had a double head. They had eyes in their knees, eyes in their stomachs, and eyes in the tops of their heads. Some had hands all around them, and all had long, fierce-looking beards. A little child in our party was too frightened to look at these idols. She kept saying—

"Oh, mamma, it is so ugly! Take it away!"

The heathen priest, was a very clever man. I found afterward that he had been a great reader. In this joss house he stood in front of the gods with his people, and they all worshiped and prayed together. They were thoroughly in earnest, and I believe every Chinaman believed his eternal salvation depended on his worship.

I found the priest Chang Wau Ho, I say, to be a man of great learning. After the service I went in behind the gods with a young interpreter—a young Chinese graduate from Yale, and had a long talk with him.

"I see you have many gods?" I commenced.

"No," he replied; through the interpreter, "we only worship one God."

"Then these are idols," I remarked.

"No," the Chinese do not worship idols, These are images to represent God—one God. We have many images, so that all the people can see at once, but each image represents the same God."

"Then you do not worship the images ?"

"Oh, no, They are only to remind us of God. You Christians pray before the crucifix, and the Catholics even have an image of Christ and the Virgin Mary just as we have these images. We do not worship the images."

"Why do you have such ugly, deformed images ?" I asked. "Why do they have double heads, many ears, and many eyes ?"

"Well, God, you know, is omniscient, potential, and omnipresent. We represent these attributes by the images. The many hands denote that God is omnipresent. The many eyes denote that he is omniscient—that he sees everything.

"But why do you make such ugly looking images ?" I asked.

"Oh! that is the Chinese antique. They are not ugly to us. They made them so in the time of Confucius, and our people don't like to change. It is our religious form. I see you Christians preserve religious forms, too. You have religious architecture—the Gothic. You have stiff angels after Fra Angelico, and angels quite deformed, after Sassaferato and the old religious artists. Why can't we Chinamen preserve our antique religious art, even if it is ugly, as well as you ?"

I found Chang Wau Ho, the Chinese priest, very radical. He defended himself and his faith splendidly. Sometimes he was dreadfully irreligious, and often, to me, sacrilegious. Once he replied:

"Heathen ! who do you call heathen ? To me" he said, "every one is a heathen who does not believe in our religion."

When I told him that I thought Mohammed and Confucius and Buddha were impostors, his eyes snapped, the crimson came to his cheeks, and he exclaimed:

"So was your Christ an imposter!"

"Do you call all the prophets impostors—every one since Moses ?" I asked.

"Yes, all who claim to be prophets—all who claim a spiritual connection with God. Zoroaster, the Persian prophet, was an imposter, and so was Buddha, who lived in Mecca. Confucius and Moses and Socrates were not prophets; they were simply wise men. They were great writers—great leaders. The prophets have all been ignorant men—adventurers."

"What do you say of Brigham Young ? they have just declared him to be the only living prophet, seer, and interpreter in the world !" I remarked.

"Let two thousand years go by, and Brigham Young will be just as much respected as a prophet as is Zoroaster, Buddha or Mohammed. He is just as much a prophet as they. But they are all imposters. God is too great to need a religious broker on earth, and every man who sets himself up a partner of God is a fraud."

Chang Wau Ho's language made me shudder. Still I determined to draw him out. I wanted to hear just what this heathen had to say.

"Do you not believe in religion, Wau Ho ?" I commenced.

"Yes," he said; "we are all alike. We all have the same God. We all pray to him the same—the Chinamen, Turk, Englishmen, and South American. He is the same God all over the world, only each nation spells his name differently. We call him Joss, the Hindoos call him Bramola, the Greeks call him Theos; the Italian, Deus; the American Indian, Great Spirit; the Frenchmen, Dieu; the German, Gott; the American, God; and so on. Every nation has the same God, only they spell it different. The same God in twenty-six different nations has the same attributes—omniscience, omnipresence, potentiality. Every nation prays to him the same. You and I, though you call me a heathen, worship the same God. We believe precisely alike, except when we come to the prophets, and then all the nations disagree."

"What do you argue from that ?" I asked.

"I argue this—the prophets are all imposters. They cause all the trouble."

"All imposters—every one of them?" I exclaimed.

"Yes, all human imposters. They make all the trouble. The world is cosmopolite as to God—we only differ when we come to the prophets. The prophets make all the wars—cause all the bloodshed. The Turk and Russian would not be fighting now were it not for Christ and Mohammed. Who ever heard of two nations fighting about God? It is these human impostors which they hitch on to God that cause all the wrangling and bloodshed."

"But how about Confucius ?" I asked.

"Confucius," said Chang Wau Ho, "was not a prophet. He did not claim to be a prophet. He was a teacher like Moses. They both expounded the laws, they both claimed to be human. Moses was a thief, a murderer and a liar—he stole the Egyptian jewels, murdered an Egyptian, and laid him in the sand. When Pharaoh found it out, Moses lied and fled the country. Such a man a prophet of God! Moses and Confucius did not have miraculous births. They were born regularly like Brigham Young, and were teachers and philosophers like Socrates. The fraudulent prophets Zoroaster, Buddha, Mohammed, and Christ, all pretended to have miraculous births."

"Who was the first prophet ?" I asked.

"The first great prophet was Zoroaster, the founder of the Persian religion. He was born supernaturally, 600 years before your Christ. Then followed our Confucius, forty-three years afterward, and fourteen years later came Buddha; 543 years after Buddha came your Christ, in Syria. So you see Zoroaster, Confucius, and Buddha, came almost together—within fifty-seven years, and then, 570 years after Christ, came Mohammed."

"How were each of the prophets born ?"

"They were all born miraculously except Moses and Confucius. Zoroaster brought fire from heaven, and had a personal interview with God himself, who gave him his religion. There are 250,000 of his followers in Bombay and Yezd—a few more than the Mormons."

"How about Buddha ?"

"Buddha was born in the seventh heaven. His mother was Maya, a virgin. After his birth he descended to the earth as a white elephant. Seven days after his birth his virgin mother died, and Buddha declared his mission. He won his wife, Gopa, by showing pluck in a public game, had five pupils, and performed miracles and withstood temptation. When he died they couldn't light a fire to burn him; but a miraculous flames burst out of his bosom and consumed him. Buddha has 350,000,000 followers in Asia to-day."

"What do you think of Christ ?"

"We Chinese think the same of him as we do of Zoroaster, Buddha, and Mohammed. He had the same miraculous birth 1,500 years after Moses. He was born of a virgin, like Buddha, and this woman is the mother of her own creator—her own God! He taught indolence and shiftlessness. He never worked a day in his life. He was a law-breaker and rebelled against the Government of Pontius Pilate. He made Judas believe that he was God. Judas said to the policeman when he came to arrest Jesus for blasphemy, 'There he is—arrest God if you can !' When he saw that he, too, was deceived, and that the imposter was only a man, subject to arrest and trial like other law-breakers, Judas, broken-hearted, went out and hanged himself. Christ claimed to be the son of God as did Buddha, Zoroaster, and Mohammed. He claimed to do miracles, but there is no evidence outside of the Bible that he did them. In the same way Mohammed did miracles, and proves it by the Koran. There are now about 300,000,000 believers in Christ, as follows: 180,000,000 Catholics, 75,000,000 Russian or Greek Catholics, and 45,000,000 Protestants.

"Was Mohammed's birth peculiar, too ?"

"Yes, Mohammed also had a miraculous birth. He was born at Mecca 570 years after Christ. When he was born, the sacred fires of the Parsees were extinguished and the great palace was shaken. He retired to a cave, saw miraculous visions, and had convulsions. He married nine wives, and was expelled from Mecca, and went to heaven, where God made him his most beloved messenger. He called the followers of Zoroaster heathen infidels, and the Christians in turn called him an imposter. Mohammed stole much of his religion from Christ. He stole polygamy from Moses and Solomon, that is, he indorsed the religion of Noah, Abraham, Moses and the prophets, but he fought the Father-Son-and-Holy-Ghost trinity of Christ. He pronounced Christ an impostor. He said God was a unit, that he could not have a son, but that he could have a prophet, and that he, Mohammed, was appointed that prophet by the Angel Gabriel, the same angel that appeared to Moses 2,000 years before. There are now in the world 300,000,000 followers of Mohammed."

"Have the teachings of the prophets Moses, Buddha, and Mohammed been similiar ?"

"They have all taught about the same code of morals. For instance, Confucius, who came 577 years before Christ, gives this rule for all men:

"'Do not unto others what you would not have others do unto you.'

"Christ plagiarized this into the Golden Rule:

"'Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you.'

"Buddha stole it again and ground it through into this form:

"'The hat that hurts thine own head, force it not upon the head of thy neighbor.'

"All the prophets forbid murder, theft, lying, stealing, swearing, adultery, covetousness, parental disobedience, and command everybody to love the Lord. Christ said, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself,' while Buddha said, 'Love all men.' Again, Buddha stole from Moses. Moses said 'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor;' Buddha said a thousand years afterwards, 'Thou shalt not lie to man.'"

"Well, what do you argue from all this ?" I asked.

"I argue this, that God is great, but that all the prophets from Moses down, through Buddha, Mohammed and Christ, to Joseph Smith, who have pretended to inspiration, who have pretended to work miracles, or who have pretended to have any communication with God, were frauds and impostors. They were human like you and I, and only pretended inspiration to dupe their followers. Confucius, Socrates, Humboldt, Huxley—no honest philosopher—would pretend inspiration."

"Do our great men generally reject the prophets who wrought miracles ?"

"In China they do. So I find they do throughout the world. In Italy, Galileo, Dante, Raphael, and Boccacio denied all the prophets."

"What Germans deny all the prophets ?"

"Schiller, Humboldt, Goethe, and Bismarck."

"In France ?"

"Mirabeau, Danton, Voltaire, Rousseau, Roland."

"In England?"

"Ben Jonson, Shakspere, Bacon, Goldsmith, Hume, Gibbon, Disraeli, Reynolds, Huxley, Tyndall," etc.

"In America ?"

"Franklin, all the signers of the declaration of Independence, Tom Paine, Jackson, Jefferson, Robert Ingersoll, James Monroe, John Q. Adams," etc.

"Then what do you propose to do, there being such widespread doubt about the prophets and such a unanimity of belief in God ?"

"Just this: 1,400,000,000 believe in God and love and worship him; of these 300,000,000 believe in Christ; 300,000,000 believe in Mohammed ; 350,000,000 believe in Buddha: 7,000,000 (Jews) believe in Moses; 150,000 believe in Joe Smith ; 350,000,000 believe in Confucius ; 150,000 believe in Zoroaster, leaving 9,720,000 falsely called pagans, who love and believe in the same God, but they never had any prophet to believe in.

"Then you would throw out all the prophets and have all the world united in one, would you ?"

"Precisely. How absurd for 300,000,000 Christians to damn 1,000,000,000 outsiders who believe in the Christian's God, but reject his prophets. And how absurd for 350,000,000 God-loving, God-fearing, God-worshiping partisans of Confucius to damn 650,000,000 God-fearing and God-worshiping Christians and Buddhists because they do not believe in the inspiration of the great Chinese lawgiver.

"What the world should have," said Chang Wau Ho, "is a complete religion ; a religion that all the world can unite on—a religion based on reason and good, sound, practical, common sense. I don't want a religion where you've got to believe unnatural stories about prophets coming into the world on white elephants, or where a young woman has got to be the mother of her own Redeemer."

"I see the savants are all talking about a cosmopolite currency and a cosmopolite language," I suggested.

"Yes; and what we want more than anything else is a cosmopolite religion—a religion that all can indorse. Why should a little priest-ridden town of 5,000 people have ten churches and pay ten ministers to pull against each other ? Rather let us have one church and one minister in each town—a grand temple like King Solomon's where all the people can gather together and listen to the words of instruction, and pray straight up to God without any prophets or mediators to make us wrangle over their ritualism and antagonistic dogmas."

Will Scholasticus Explain ?

MR. EDITOR: I have been interested in reading "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu," translated by Scholasticus, as it appeared in your columns, and think it is a very important addition to our literature, if the claim as to its antiquity can be substantiated. Infidels don't like to be fooled; and when they use a big gun, as this is, against their enemies, they don't want it to explode. If this book was in existence before the evangelists wrote their little stories, the probabilities are good that they were acquainted with it. Which was first, Jeschu or Jesus ? Kephas or Petros ? Give us proof.

Prophecies Concerning Christ.

PARKERVILLE, N. J., April 9, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Is there any such a thing in the Old Testament as a prediction of a Christ? Are the passages in the New Testament that are quoted from the Old, and claimed to be prophecies of the person called Jesus, to be relied on as predictions of a real personage.

There are some good Liberal people here who think it a very strange thing that the monody in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah can be used almost word for word to describe the martyrdom of Jesus. But I would ask you, would not this lamentation compare favorably with the sufferings of many other prophets, martyrs, as well as it is applied to the rejected mission and martyrdom of Jesus Christ? I will be extremely happy to hear your opinion on the subject.

Respectfully yours, T. M. WHITE.

REPLY.—There are of course, several passages and places in the Old Testament which our Christian friends insist are prophecies of the advent of the Messiah into the world, but when these several passages are closely examined it is found that it is a forced construction that makes them prophecies referring to the appearance of Jesus among men. Thomas Paine effectually disposed of these claims, and showed that not one of the so-called prophecies was truthfully susceptible of the application claimed for it. A few of the most prominent and pretentious may be alluded to.

1. The passage more frequently alluded to than almost any other as a prophecy of Christ is in Isaiah vii, 14-16. "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good: for before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings."

It does not require a very sound scholar to see that this prediction has no application to Christ. The term that a virgin shall conceive and bear a son is the only point that has any application, and that is only apparent. The word translated virgin, does not mean virgin in the strict sense of the word but simply a young woman. The points of disagreement are: Jesus was not named Immanuel; we have no account that his diet consisted of milk and honey any more than any other child of his time, and if he had eaten of them, they would not necessarily have enabled him to refuse the evil and choose the good. The part that refers to two kings is utterly irrelevant to Jesus and his time.

The facts pertaining to the matter seem to be just these: Ahaz, King of Judah was beset by Rezin, King of Assyria, and Pekah, King of Israel, and Isaiah delivered a message to him assuring him he should be delivered from his enemies. Ahaz asked for a sign, when Isaiah repeated the two verses quoted. If his words alluded to the birth of the Son of God to be born into the world seven hundred years afterwards, how obscure and ridiculous it was in Isaiah to mislead Ahaz in that way; and if the child alluded to meant Jesus to be born of Mary, how wrong to give it to Ahaz as a sign and guidance relative to the danger then besetting him. It would be trifling with his troubles and anxieties. In the language of Paine, "It would have been mocking and insulting nonsense for Isaiah to have assured Ahaz as a sign that those two kings should not prevail against him, that a child should be born seven hundred years after his death; and that before the child so born should know to refuse the evil and choose the good, he, Ahaz, should be delivered from the danger which immediately threatened him."

The following chapter in Isaiah discloses the fact that it was his own child that he alluded to, for his own wife or mistress was at that time pregnant by him. He says: "And I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest and Zechariah son of Jeberechiah. And I went unto the prophetess and she conceived and bare a son. . . . . Behold I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel" (Isa. viii. 2, 3, 18). Thus one of the remarkably specious prophecies upon examination resolves itself into very thin air. It had no more allusion to Jesus Christ than it had to Joseph Smith or Joseph Cook.

The next passages most frequently alluded to as a prophecy of Christ is the monody spoken of by our friend, found in Isaiah (chap. liii). It is usually regarded as a prophecy; but if the language is noticed, it will be seen that it is mostly in the past tense, and applied to a person who had lived, and not to one who should come into existence seven hundred years later. If the monody on some person who had died was meant for a prophecy of some one who, centuries afterward, should live, it was badly written, and calculated to deceive any reader. If a prophecy is so obscurely written that no person could tell that it was meant for a prophecy, it might just as well have never been written. But, waving this objection, it cannot be seen that the language bears any special reference to the son of Mary, any more than to thousands of others who have lived in the world before and since the words were uttered. They certainly do not closely apply to Jesus, the Jewish reformer. Whoever Isaiah was speaking of was said to have opened not his mouth, that he was taken from prison and judgment, and that he made his grave with the wicked and with the rich. Now, Jesus did open his mouth; he was not taken from prison; he did not make his grave with the wicked nor with the rich. So the language does not fit his case with much accuracy.

It has been thought by some Bible students that Jeremiah was the person Isaiah was bemoaning, and it would seem to be far more probable that it was he than that it was Jesus. Matthew was the first to claim that the language of Isaiah applied to Jesus. His language is this: "When the evening was come, they brought unto him [Jesus] many that were possessed of devils, and he cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esais the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." But in the language of Isaiah, not a word is said about devils or casting them out. The business of casting out devils seems not to have been followed or known except about the time of Jesus. Previous to that time devils had not been heard of, Matthew being the first of the Bible writers who mentioned them. About the time Jesus was said to have lived in Palestine it must have been a pretty devilish time, for they were cast out of people in great numbers. One woman had seven, and two thousand were cast out of one man, or at least devils enough were driven from him to enter into that number of swine and cause them to rush into the sea and be destroyed. Each of the swine must have had a devil, or else a single devil had to divide himself up between several of the hogs, which would seem to be a difficult feat even for a devil to perform. At all events, Matthew did not make a happy agreement between Isaiah's words and the devils that Jesus busied himself in driving out.

There are several other passages in the Old Testament held to be prophecies, referring to Christ, but they are not quoted as often or with as much confidence as those alluded to. We will hardly take the time now to repeat them, or to show that they actually had no more allusion to Jesus than to any other person. That there was a Messianic idea long entertained by the Jewish people, must be admitted, but it was of a temporal prince who should reign in Jerusalem in great splendor, and who would restore the prosperity and happiness that once prevailed over their unhappy country. If ever so much is claimed for the prophets, and the correctness of what they said, their utterances entirely failed to convey to the people the least correct idea of what the coming of the Messiah would be like. In this view, though the prophecies are admitted to be genuine, they must be set down as total failures.

At It Again.

The cultured editor, in his issue of the 25th ult., again holds us up in an unfavorable light, and uses his best efforts—or rather his worst—to place us in a false position before the Liberal public. With a feeling almost amounting to loathing, we once more recur to the subject of these misrepresentations—it having become as odious to us as it has to our readers. So long, however, as these efforts are made to misrepresent and malign us, we know no other way than to truthfully defend ourselves. Justice to all parties concerned, including our readers, seems to demand this much. We will endeavor to be as brief as possible.

The editor of The Index again refers to the McKesson & Robbins matter. It appears to be a godsend to him, which he cannot refer to too often. He says we tried to escape the disgrace he proved upon us by pleading cowardice. That is about as near the truth as he has come in any of the statements he has made about us. If he had said that it was good-nature instead of cowardice that induced us to give D. C. Robbins the statement we did, he would have been far more truthful. If we had done Mr. Robbins an unintended injustice, and he wished us to place him right before his Christian friends, we were easily persuaded to accede to his wishes. We repeat, this arose more from an accommodating spirit than from cowardice. But it suits the cultured man best to have it the latter. As to the forgery, we showed by two reliable witnesses—and this can be increased by a third—that we said to Mr. Robbins that we felt that we had his tacit consent, at least, for the use of his name to the circular, and that we omitted the explanation to which we were entitled at his urgent request. He repeated the opposition he felt to the Comstock laws, as well as showed that he had done more to expose them than we at that time had done.

The troublesome editor says that we "wince under his exposure of our mendacity." Very false. There has been no "mendacity" on our part, and no "wincing." We have simply been under the necessity of exposing his falsehoods and misrepresentations.

The querulous editor refers to our publishing a part of Mr. Frothingham's sworn affidavit, which showed that the editor had used Mr. F.'s name not only without Mr. Frothingham's consent, but in spite of his positive injunctions to the contrary; also to our declining to publish Mr. Frothingham's apology for Mr. Abbot. In this matter the cultured gentleman purposely does us injustice, as he has in nearly every instance where he has referred to us. He endeavors to induce his readers to believe that we objected to the publication of Mr. Frothingham's letter from a desire to injure him. Hear his language:

"His [our] motive was evident enough; he had got hold of a useful calumny, and meant to make the most of it. But Mr. Frothingham, knowing the villainous injustice done by it, and not choosing to be used as its instrument, sent a third letter in full vindication of our course respecting his name. Mr. Bennett did not dare to make a third refusal, but printed the letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 20th."

This entire statement—a part of which only is here given—is a misrepresentation, and Mr. Abbot well knows it. The facts of the case are just these: Mr. Abbot, in January last, quoted from a Tribune advertisement to show that we had committed forgery. We felt that we had not committed forgery, and, to show that Mr. Abbot himself had done quite as much in that direction, we quoted from a sworn affidavit of Mr. O. B. Frothingham, stating positively and unequivocally that the use Mr. Abbot had made of his (Frothingham's) name was without authority. The language of the affidavit is in this wise:

"And this defendant alleges that he was not the author of said circular, or any part thereof, and that he did not direct nor take any part in the publication of said words, and that this defendant did not compose, sign, or publish, concerning the plaintiff [A. K. Butts], or at all, the said words alleged to be a libel, nor did he authorize, cause, or consent to the composition, signing, or publication thereof, or any part thereof, but, on the contrary, protested against the insertion of said words in said circular, and requested the person proposing said publication [F. E. Abbot] not to publish said words, and that the same were published without his knowledge and contrary to his request.

"O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

"Subscribed and sworn to, Feb. 9, 1875, before Thomas Pruden, notary public, city of New York."

We deemed this positive, sworn statement of Mr. Frothingham as to the use of his name quite as conclusive as to Mr. Abbot's using the name of another without authority as the mere unsworn and unsupported statement of Mr. D. C. Robbins. But this placed Mr. Abbot in a very unpleasant position. He began to realize how pleasant a thing it was to be accused of forgery. The charge was brought home to his own door, and he needs must do something to remove the odium resting upon him. He requested Mr. Frothingham to say something to relieve him from the very unpleasant predicament in which he was placed. Mr. Frothingham is a very kind-hearted man, and his generous impulses prompted him to write a letter saying that Mr. Abbot had permission to use his name to certain documents. Mr. Abbot, on March 16th, sent us a copy of this letter, and requested us to publish it. We saw at a glance that it made Mr. Frothingham deny his sworn affidavit, and we very much disliked to have him placed in that attitude before the public. We at once wrote to Mr. Abbot, expressing these views, and giving them as a reason why it would be better not to publish the letter. Our only objection to publishing it was the contradictory attitude in which it would place Mr. Frothingham, for whom we entertain the highest respect. At the same time we wrote to Mr. Frothingham, giving him our view of the matter and inclosing to him Mr. Abbot's communication. We received the following note in reply:

50 WEST 36TH STREET, March 21, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: I am greatly obliged to you for submitting to me Mr. Abbot's communication. I have written to him taking the responsibility of its non-appearance in THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is in an inflamed state of mind in consequence of Mr. Butts' letter and will probably insist on some form of reply; and that I do not object to, for the matter is quite simple and may be made intelligible to any candid mind. But the method of vindicating himself that he chooses seems to me likely to do more harm than good, for it will not only revive an old dispute, but will revive it under aspects of peculiar bitterness and fury. My own desire is for honorable peace; but neither peace nor honor are to be obtained by printing criminations and recriminations, partial statements and partisan declarations. It is hard enough to get at the truth with all the advantages of candor and calmness; it is simply impossible to get at it by the method of personal controversy. Your own fairness and soberness of judgment make me confident that you will not lend your paper to reckless assertions on either side.

Yours sincerely, O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

This letter breathes the spirit of candor and goodness, but how different the spirit manifested by Mr. Abbot. Although we wrote him the only reason we had for postponing the publication of his communication and Mr. Frothingham's letter, saying that we had submitted the matter to Mr. F. and would do as he directed, and though Mr. F. wrote him that he took the responsibility of its non-appearance, Mr. Abbot now, with the most obvious dishonesty and unfairness, endeavors to make his readers believe that we hesitated to publish the letter from malicious motives, and that we might use a calumny to his injury. This is a very fair sample of Mr. Abbot's entire treatment of us, and we think no candid person can fail to see the falseness of the man's motives and representations.

Well, the "inflamed state" of the man's mind would not allow him to suffer the unpleasant matter to rest. He again importuned Mr. Frothingham to write something that would place the cultured editor in a better light before the public. Mr. F. again tried to accommodate the cultured editor aforesaid, and sent us a somewhat modified statement for the purpose of screening Mr. Abbot. We still thought he was too generous in placing himself in a very unenviable position for the sake of doing a kindness to Mr. Abbot, and we again addressed him a note suggesting the propriety of deferring the publication for a time at least. In response to which we received a note from him thus:

DEAR SIR: Though differing from you entirely in regard to the probable effect of printing my note—for I cannot conceive how Mr. Butts can make my conduct appear in an unfavorable light—I am quite willing to postpone it. Please withhold it for the present. If, as you tell me, matters are quiet and likely to remain so. I certainly, though absolutely free from self-reproach and fearless of any consequences, shall not re-awaken strife. Please therefore retain this letter till you hear again from me. Yours truly,

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

In addition to the two notes we wrote to Mr. Frothingham, we sent a confidential friend up to see him, and to present our views upon the subject, and to more fully learn his wishes as to whether we should publish that which seemed a flat contradiction to his affidavit. The friend was very courteously received. Mr. F. expressed himself as much obliged to us for the interest we had taken in the matter, and for hesitating to publish the letters alluded to. He was satisfied our motives were of the kindest nature, etc. He again requested that we should withhold the letter. This action of his further shows the falsity of Mr. Abbot's representations. We were actuated by the best motives toward Mr. Frothingham, and not by ill-will toward Mr. Abbot.

Again, the inflamed and sore condition of the Index man's mind would not willingly let the matter rest—he has a restless mind at best—and again he importuned Mr. Frothingham to do and say something to relieve him.

The kindness of Mr. Frothingham's nature again prompted him to do what he could to appease Mr. Abbot's troubled mind. He wrote the third letter to screen Mr. Abbot, in which he stated he had authorized Mr. Abbot to affix his name to an appeal in behalf of the Index, but he did not say that he had authorized Mr. Abbot to use his name to injure Mr. Butts. This letter we readily published, it appearing in our issue for April 20, 1878. It partially exonerated Mr. Abbot, but only in part. When Mr. Frothingham made a sworn statement that "he did not compose, sign, or publish concerning Mr. Butts the words contained in that circular, nor did he ever authorize, cause or consent to the composition, signing, or publication thereof, or any part thereof, but on the contrary, protested against the insertion of said words in said circular, and requested Mr. Abbot not to publish said words in said circular, and that they were published without his knowledge, and contrary to his request," he undoubtedly swore to the simple truth; and on the strength of that sworn affidavit, Mr. Butts withdrew the suit he had commenced in the Superior Court of this city. When Mr. Frothingham, in his letter in April last, admitted that he had authorized Mr. Abbot to append his name to an appeal in behalf of the Index, he by no means meant that he had authorized Mr. Abbot to append his name to a note of hand, or to a libel against Mr. Butts, and most assuredly did he not intend to say his sworn affidavit contained a word of falsehold. Mr. Abbot's talk about the affidavit being drawn by an attorney, and in legal phraseology, is simply pitiful. Does he mean to say that Mr. Frothingham is so simple as to employ an attorney to draw up an affidavit according to dictation, and then sign it and make oath to it, when it was false? No, Mr. Frothingham is not that kind of man. It is much like Abbot's making a plea of ignorance and imbecility for Ingersoll in signing the petition which has been hitherto alluded to. These are only illustrations of Abbot's untruthfulness. Neither Ingersoll nor Frothingham are men so weak or ignorant as not to know what kind of documents they sign or make oath to; but Abbot is the man, when he thinks he can injure us by so doing, to place them in that position. The facts in the case are these: Mr. Frothingham authorized Abbot to append his name to an appeal in behalf of the Index, but did not authorize him to malign or libel Mr. Butts, which Mr. Abbot did. The reason Mr. Butts did not proceed against Mr. Abbot was because of his impecuniosity. Mr. Butts thought a judgment against Abbot would be valueless. Not so with Frothingham—a judgment against him would be good, and Butts considered that he had a good case for recovering damages. But, upon Mr. Frothingham's oath that his name was appended to those libelous words without his authority, and in opposition to his protest, Butts, as we said, withdrew the suit. Here is the whole truth, and we leave it with our readers to decide which is the most guilty of forgery—F. E. Abbot or D. M. Bennett—and whether Mr. Abbot does not live in such a kind of glass house as renders throwing stones dangerous amusement?

Mr. Abbot's fling—"Mr. Bennett did not dare to make a third refusal"—is eminently worthy of the man. What was there that made us "not dare"? We had clearly made our views known, and when Mr. Frothingham wrote us the third letter—modified as it was—requesting that it be published, we of course cheerfully complied. We published it, not because we "did not dare" to do otherwise, but because we had no wish to do otherwise. We wished to accommodate Mr. Frothingham. We withheld the other letter, as we have fully shown, upon his express authority and by his request. Our "dare" was as great in one instance as the other. We always dare do the right thing.

The cultured editor superciliously asks: "Who is this D. M. Bennett, forsooth?" We will inform the gentleman that the party inquired about is one not without faults and imperfections, but one who aims to do his duty, so far as he perceives it, and does not pretend to be cultured, nor highly respectable. He claims to be moral, to act from honorable motives, and to be able to tell the truth quite as correctly as the cultured editor himself.

Mr. Abbot applies to our course the mean epithet, "deliberate scoundrelism of the most transparent kind," which is too contemptible to deserve notice. His insulting and abusive allusion to T. C. Leland as "a dupe, an accomplice, a defamer and a doer of dirty work," etc., is characteristic of the man who uses such epithets, and of the ease with which a person with bad motives can asperse and bespatter one far superior to himself. But Mr. Leland is quite able to speak in his own behalf, and our defense of him is quite unnecessary.

Three persons have stepped out of their way to damage us, and, as it seemed to us, with insufficient cause. These are Anthony Comstock, Seth Wilbur Payne, and Francis Ellingwood Abbot. Each one seemed determined to injure us all in his power. Were we compelled to trust ourselves to the tender mercies of either, we are sure we should not select the last one named.

Mr. Abbot began these personalities, and without adequate cause. As we have before said, we never uttered an uncomplimentary word against him until he began to revile and misrepresent us. The quarrel has been forced upon us against our wishes. We have by no means wished to continue these disgraceful personalities, but have felt compelled to defend ourselves against vile attacks in the way we have. We formerly felt a high degree of respect for the editor of The Index, but his course towards us for the last eight months, his malicious misrepresentations, his mawkish fawning to popular prejudices, his servility to the ultra element of pseudo-respectability, his readiness to surrender the personal, individual rights guaranteed by the Constitution of our country and the principles of American liberty in order to appear respectable in the eyes of our orthodox opponents, but, most of all, his envy, jealousy, enmity, malignity, contentiousness, fault-finding, effrontery, restlessness, fussiness, flaw-picking, carping, perverting hypercriticism, meanness, prevarication, falsehood, a relentless, stubborn, persistent effort to injure others—all these have gradually but surely changed that feeling of respect to one of utter contempt.

We hope we shall not again be under the necessity of noticing the gentleman or his unfriendly attacks.

What I Don't Believe—No. 34.

299. I fail to see perfect harmony between those passages relative to God's tempting his creatures; on the one hand—"Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man" (James i, 13); on the other hand, "And it came to pass after these things that God did tempt Abraham" (Gen. xxii, 1); "And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go number Israel and Judah" (2 Sam. xxiv, 1); "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived" [marginal reading, enticed] (Jer. xx, 7); "Lead us not into temptation" (Matt. vi, 13).

300. On the possibility of God's lying there is equal disagreement. First, "God is not man that he should lie" (Num. xxiii, 19); "It was impossible for God to lie" (Heb. vi, 18). Second, "Ah, Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people" (Jer. iv, 10); "Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar?" (Jer. xiv, 18); "For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie" (2 Thess. ii, 11); "Now therefore the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee" (1 Kings xxii, 23); "Then God sent an evil spirit" (Judges ix, 23); "And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I, the Lord, deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9).

301. On the unity of God an equal disagreement is found: First, "The Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. vi, 4); There is none other God but one" (1 Cor. viii, 4). Second, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost" (1 John v, 7).

301. On the subject of human sacrifice there is an evident want of harmony. On the one hand we have, "Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them [the Gentiles] . . . for every abomination to the Lord which he hateth have they done to their gods: for even their sons and their daughters have they burnt in the fire of their gods" (Deut. xii, 30, 31). On the other hand, we have such passages as these: "And he [God] said, take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering" (Gen. xxii, 2). "The king [David] took the two sons of Rizpah . . . and the five sons of Michal . . . and he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and hanged them in the hill before the Lord. . . . And after that God was entreated for the land" (2 Sam. xxi, 8, 9, 14).

303 By the following contradictory passages it is seen that God both approves and commands burnt offerings, and disapproves and condemns the same. In the first place we have the following: "Thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin-offering for atonement" (Ex. xxix, 36); "On the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement; it shall be a holy convocation unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls and offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord" (Lev. xxiii, 27); "And thou shall burn the whole ram upon the altar. . . . it is a sweet savor; an offering made by fire unto the Lord" (Ex. xxix, 18); "And the priest shall burn all on the altar to be a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savor unto the Lord" (Lev. i, 9). Per contra, we find passages like these: "For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices" (Jer. vii, 22); "Your burnt offerings are not acceptable, nor your sacrifices sweet unto me" (Jer. vi, 20); "Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? Offer unto God thanksgiving and pay thy vows unto the Most High" (Ps. l, 13, 14); "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with: it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. . . . To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the Lord. I am full of the burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fed beasts, and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hands" (Is. i, 13, 11, 12).

304. I fail to see a divine agreement between these passages in relation to blood shedding; on the one side, "At the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man! Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. ix, 5, 6). On the other: "And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him" (Gen. iv, 15).

305. There is no more unison on the subject of making images, thus: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath" (Ex. xx, 4); on the one hand, and on the other this: "Thou shalt make two cherubims of gold. . . . and the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another" (Ex. xxv, 18, 20).

306. It is much the same on the subject of improvidence, thus: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin. . . . If God so clothes the grass of the field, . . . shall he not much more clothe you? . . . Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? . . . Take therefore no thought for the morrow" (Matt. vi, 28, 30, 31, 36). "Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again. . . . And lend, hoping for nothing again, and your reward shall be great" (Luke vi, 30, 35). "Sell that ye have, and give alms" (Luke xii, 33); while on the opposite side we have: "But if any provide not for his own, especially those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel" (1 Tim. v, 8). "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children" (Prov. xiii, 22); and others of similar character.

The Watkins Convention.

Forty speakers have already promised to be present at the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention.

Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, writes: "I will come and 'boil down' into due brevity what I may have to say, as you will have a good many speakers there. I hope hearers may be plentiful in proportion, and that all may learn how to make wise use of their freedom of thought, and how best to guard and keep sacred liberty of conscience for each and all, unfettered by partial or unjust laws."

Hon. E. P. Hurlburt, late Judge of the Supreme Court, who has been for over fifty years an outspoken Freethinker, writes that he shall attend the Convention.

There will be a number of speakers from a distance at the Convention, who should be invited to speak at various places in our State before they return home. Arrangements should at once be made for a Liberal meeting in every town where there are a dozen Liberals. The following are some of the speakers who can remain and work in the State for a short time if desired: Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit; Wm. Ellery Copeland, Nebraska; Ella E. Gibson, Philadelphia; Prof. J. H. W. Touhey, Boston; William S. Bell, Massachusetts; Dr. J. L. York, California; Theron C. Leland, Prof. A. L. Rawson, Mrs. Clara Neyman, New York; Mr. Charles Ellis, Boston; Mrs. P. R. Lawrence, Quincy, Mass.; and Mrs. Grace L. Parkhurst, Elkland, Pa. These should all go to work to increase the interest in Liberalism that we hope will be engendered at the Convention.

Those who desire to put up at a first-class boarding-house at Watkins—terms, one dollar per day—can communicate with either of the following ladies: Mrs. Stoel, Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Ringer, Mrs. H. Skinner. Each is the proprietress of a boarding-house.

The Shaker sect is to be well represented at Watkins by Elder Evans, Mr. G. A. Lomas, editor of The Shaker, and many others. This is about the only Christian body that believes in liberty of thought and speech.

Many will be pleased to listen to that earnest female speaker, Ella E. Gibson, of Philadelphia, who has been doing such good work for the Liberal cause during the past year.

B. F. Underwood writes: "I expect great good will result from the Convention."

We are sure Dr. J. L. York, of California, the earnest worker of the Pacific States, will be cordially welcomed by his Eastern friends. He deserves it.

Thousands of Spiritualists and other Freethinkers will be gratified to meet the great traveler and lecturer, Dr. J. M. Peebles, at Watkins.

It will be a rich treat to hear the eloquent Fred. Douglas, of Washington, speak for the liberty of thought and expression. He knows what the word "liberty" means.

Dr. J. R. Monroe, editor of the Seymour Times, writes that he shall try and attend the Convention. If the Doctor can speak as well as he writes, and in the same vein, we may expect a rich entertainment.

Col. Ingersoll can be sure of an immense audience. The trouble will be that if it is announced in advance that he is to speak, the whole town will be thronged with an eager multitude, each of whom will desire to hear the most eloquent orator in America. The Colonel will be at home at this Convention.

As to music, Prof. Hudson and his two lady associates will add very much to the interest of the occasion. He is known as the Liberal Sankey of the West, but he far surpasses the orthodox Sankey, and his songs being of the Liberal, progressive character are very much more entertaining.

The editor of this paper expects of course to be on hand, and hopes to meet a goodly number of his friends.

JAMES PARTON announces as the subject of his address at the Freethinkers' Convention, "The Coming Man's Religion."

REV. W. E. COPELAND, of Nebraska, will address the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention on "A View of the Situation by a Frontiersman."

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, of Boston, will read a paper at the Freethinkers' Convention at Watkins entitled "Creed and Religion as a Cultivator of Political Hypocrisy."

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

The moment we begin to criticise the discourses to the Jews in the fourth gospel, the argument takes another turn, namely, if they were ever uttered as we read them, they bring no honor, but only dishonor, on him who uttered them; who puzzles where he ought to instruct, denounces where he ought to explain, irritates, exasperates, equivocates, shuffles, and seems to do all in his power to rouse violent resentment. Since I distinctly profess that I do not believe Jesus ever to have spoken any of these discourses, I hope that no reader will charge on me that in these remarks I am attacking him. They are to me simply incredible. It is transparent that the respondents to Jesus are men of straw, who talk in a silly way to be a foil setting off his wisdom. But when we pass to grand address and prayer in John xiii, 31; xvii., the objection is quite of another kind; viz., similar to that against the two miracles above. All the eleven were present at these majestic utterances; yet no hint of them comes out in the other gospels. How could the apostles have forgotten so signal, so striking, so unprecedented an address at so critical a moment? Could they have failed to see its supreme interest, and their bounden duty to transmit it to all the disciples? He lays down for them a new commandment of mutual love, announces the new claim of being himself the image of God, makes a new promise concerning the Comforter, lays down a new duty of praying in his name (xvi, 24) and for the first time assumes for himself the power of answering prayer (xiv, 13). As usual, the remarks put into the mouths of the apostles are almost childish; and do not at all give the impression of real dialogue. Not only is the total silence of the other three narrators highly suspicious, but what is more, this magnificent oration takes (as it were) the place of the terrible struggle of mind (with bloody sweat in Luke) which immediately follows, when Jesus goes out into Gethsemane. Such agony after that triumphant prayer, if really credible, is quite dishonorable. The simplest explanation is, that because this fourth writer thought the agony unworthy of Jesus, he invented this splendid address to supersede it. Similarly it is more than probable that he superseded cures of demoniacs by forging new miracles, just because he knew the essential weakness of the former. Paul in his epistles talks of marvels and mighty deeds and spiritual gifts, but no where alludes to exorcism; which is ordinary in the gospels and the Acts.

III.

After so much specifically on the fourth gospel, I turn to the others more particularly. I beg first to adduce a discourse in Luke, and appeal to the reader, whether it is credible as a historical fact (to me it is not), and whether, if true, it is not disgraceful to the speaker. I refer to Luke xi, 37–52. A Pharisee who heard Jesus speaking besought him to dine with him, and Jesus went in with him and sat down to meat; but Jesus did not wash his hands, and his host showed surprise—surely both naturally and rightly. In a land where guests dip their fingers in a common dish it is a gross rudeness, and gives just offense to others, not first to rinse the hands. The surprise of the Pharisee denotes that his servant, according to the practice still existing in Western Asia, carried round water for the guests, or certainly that facility for washing was close at hand. If Jesus acted as we are here told, he owed a cordial apology to his host. A kindly man, a reasonable man, might have said: "Forgive me; my mind was so absorbed in high thoughts that I forgot myself." Instead of this, he is made to answer just as if he had committed this indefensible discourtesy on purpose, in order to get a keynote for invective, for he at once starts out against his host with the words: "Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and platter, but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness. Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also? But rather GIVE ALMS of such things as ye have, and behold, all things are clean unto you. But woe unto you, Pharisees!" etc., etc. Was such a style of address likely to make a proud man better, or to touch his conscience? Is it conceivable that the speaker was aiming at that at all? Could he attain any result but that of being accounted a fierce fanatic, a monomaniac, or in the language of that day, one possessed by a demon of bitterness? If ever it were right to rebuke Pharisees, he put himself in the wrong by choosing a wrong time and place. His first business was, to acknowledge his own fault, instead of defending himself by violent recrimination; nor, while accepting hospitality, was he at liberty for coarse invective, which might certainly have been delayed without great moral mischief.

A friend will whisper to me, Do you forget that Matthew puts this attack on Pharisees, scribes, and lawyers in another place? I do not forget it, and I think Luke must be quite wrong; nor have I any conviction that Jesus committed the rudeness which Luke ascribes to him. He may on some other occasion have deprecated accounting breach of good manners co-ordinate with breach of more vital morality, and that, without defending the violation of minor morals, though I fear he did defend it. But I desire to call attention to the pernicious garbling induced by promiscuous transpositions, such as one sees with a glance of the eye to abound in these three gospels. Vehement utterances or calm precepts appropriate in one connection may be highly reprehensible or highly misleading in another; hence a fraud is committed on us by negligent transposition, which, when a character is presented to us as without spot and perfect, is a very serious matter. Also, how striking is the fact, that Luke was not shocked at the picture which he was presenting to the reader! It denotes how completely void of moral criticism was his mind, which swallowed indiscriminately whatever he found asserted in his documents.

But, can this bitter, fierce, sweeping invective commend itself to us any the more, as Matthew tells it? In Luke it was delivered face to face with a Pharisee and a Doctor of the Law, but in Matthew it is spoken to the multitude and to his disciples, in the absence of the persons assailed. To justify such attack, first of all, the guilt imputed must be strictly true; and next, the attack must tend to produce good moral results. It should have been delivered with great pain, and under the pressure of some high necessity. As to the first, viz., the extreme wickedness of the Jewish rulers contemporary with Jesus—this, being a question of history, is necessarily more or less obscure. As far as I know, it is solely from the New Testament, and especially from the four gospels, that our received notion of the despicable hypocrisy and hateful wickedness of scribes and Pharisees, priests, lawyers and Sadducees is derived. On the second point, the tendency of this speech, we can perfectly judge for ourselves. It is impossible that an orator could really so address the multitude without creating a sincere belief in the rulers that he was trying to stir up insurrection, especially when he had just before received by acclamation the title, Son of David, and was reported to call himself King of the Jews. No man of common sense could imagine that such a speech would find its way into the consciences of the rulers, and make them condemn themselves. It could only harden and exasperate them. This surely was no good end to aim at. But could it do good to the multitude or to his disciples? Is any multitude made better by listening to violent, undiscriminating invective against the rulers? It seems impossible for the Sanhedrim to have put any other interpretation on it (if really uttered) than that it was intended to excite the multitude to violence. Its opening, which bade them "to obey the commands of the rulers, but not to imitate their conduct," would necessarily seem a mere piece of hypocrisy.

It may perhaps be fair to ask the reader to open the New Testament, and keep the whole twenty-third chapter of Matthew before him. Unless he read with fresh eyes, he may not realize the spasmodic intensity and fierceness of the invective. I strongly and deliberately insist, that if it were ever so true, it ought not to have been spoken. In some sense the motto of our lawyers will apply, "The greater the truth, the worse the libel," for the more it might have of truth the more it would tend to rouse the multitude to violence, and to kindle dark passion in the rulers. But, so wild is the attack, that in part we can form a decided opinion against its justice. Here is a clause: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees! hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves."

What did Jesus know of the synagogues in the wide empires of Rome and Parthia, stretching from Spain to the frontiers of India? what knew he of the proselytes whom they made? In these proselytes Paul afterwards found the principal nucleus of his churches. Loving the spiritual side of Judaism, they did not accept its ceremonial. Born and bred in national religions generally impure and wildly false—religions which had no cognizance of morality, no idea what holiness meant, no benevolence to strangers, no mercy to the down-trodden—they learned from Jewish teachers a noble monotheism, the worship of a holy and merciful God, and sentiment that was a support of all morality. Whatever were the defects of the Hebrew religion of that age (and the doctrine of the great teacher Hillel, in whose time Jesus was born, easily compares in goodness with anything here imputed to Jesus) it was certainly a vast step upwards from paganism. To hear the proselytes collectively called children of hell almost takes away one's breath. It seems an audacious and malignant slander worthy only of Tacitus. It is a melancholy thing to find Jesus, as it were, echoing his spite. In his Histories (v. 5) he says: "All the worst characters of other nations spurn their fathers' religions, and make contributions large or small to Judea," i. e., to the treasury of the temple."

Is the Editor a Spiritualist?

We take the following from the Religio-Philosophical Journal. We shall not undertake to decide the question as to how much Spiritualism Col. Bundy believes in, but we are confident that he is an honorable, upright man who will not be a party to fraud and who uses his best efforts to expose it. Whatever he does, is guided by the principles of justice and truth:

"A prominent medium and inspirational speaker writes us that when soliciting subscribers for the Journal, he is sometimes met by the inquiry: "Is the editor a Spiritualist?" we hardly think any regular subscriber or careful reader has the least doubt on that subject. The editorial page of every issue contains an affirmative answer to the question. The editor of the Journal is a firm and steadfast Spiritualist, the assertions of pseudo mediums and their dupes to the contrary notwithstanding.

"He has sublime confidence in a future life and in spirit communion. This confidence is pased upon absolute knowledge of spirit phenomena. Possessed of this certain knowledge he is enabled to look calmly and serenely upon the downfall of the huge superstructure of fiction which has been reared by illegitimate speculators in Spiritualism and bigoted ex-church members, who have not outgrown the blind superstition of their early training.

"Spirits, who, when on earth, were reckoned among the wisest of men, have the Religio-Philosophical Journal in charge, and the editor believes every issue of the paper is carefully scrutinized by them before publication. These spirits have for many years been preparing the editor for the work they have for him to do. Years ago they told him clearly and with great minuteness of detail what was before him, and he has been an humble, earnest co-worker with them; never surrendering his own judgment, but always acting up to his highest reason after due consultation and advice.

"The Religio-Philosophical Journal is rapidly rendering it more and difficult for the horde of vampires who infest the ranks of Spiritualism to palm off their wares upon the public; for this, the editor must, of course, expect, and he is prepared to receive their most bitter maledictions. Not being able to find a soiled spot in his public or private life, after the most careful scrutiny, the only resource of these pests is to traduce his motives and declare he is not a Spiritualist. To offset this class, the Religio-Philosophical Journal has a large and constantly increasing list of highly intelligent subscribers, and the editor has the very great honor and pleasure of possessing the entire confidence and warm personal friendship of very many of the representative men and women in the ranks of Spiritualism.

"In the same mail which brought the letter spoken of at the commencement, there came a short message from one of the most gifted authors and Spiritualists—a man whose name is familiar to millions, and whose memory will be revered by millions yet unborn. Speaking as one having authority he says:

"'I know very well that the fight in which you are engaged is "the good fight" and I have full faith in your just victory; it will, however, take much time and impose severe trials. But you must go forward!'

"Go forward he will and in time hopes and believes that many good people who now fail to understand him, or honestly oppose him, will be numbered among his most steadfast friends. In conclusion, he requests that subscribers will confront with this statement, those who honestly, or otherwise, assert that the editor is not a Spiritualist."

That Advertisement.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 20th a beautiful advertisement for the benefit of, the fraud Mott, under the title of "A Week with the Ghosts," by D. Jenkins, of Hannibal, Mo., whose attempt to disguise the fact that he is working for, and is a tool of Mott is simply amusing. He is evidently acting at the direct instigation of a certain party at Memphis, Mo., whose name I now withhold. There is evidently a well concerted plan on the part of Mott & Co., to raise a new interest in Mott, and bring back the travel to that town. Of course many are interested who are not Spiritualists. They are trying to obliterate the effects of the thorough exposure, and the general distrust produced thereby.

Col. Mackay, of Leavenworth, obtained passes for Mott to go to Colorado, on promise to stop off on his return and give some test seances. Mackay built a cabinet and made all arrangements when Mott slipped home to Memphis; and first thing the Colonel heard from him was that he was at his usual performances again.

If I mistake not, Col. Bundy of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, himself a strong Spiritualist, has proposed to Mott a seance under "fraud-proof conditions," offering to loose the time and incur the expense of going from Chicago to Memphis for that purpose. Does he, dare he accede to the proposition? A letter from a gentleman in Missouri, says, speaking of Mott and those who are in company with him: "Every move they make indicates rascality!"

There is no use in trying to get the sympathy of Liberals for an exposed fraud like Mott, a man who has swindled thousands by making them think they were in communication with dead relatives, and it does not help the matter to say that Christians condemn these things. So far as Christians denounce fraud it is to their credit. So far as Liberals countenance it, it is to their disgrace. ANTI-FRAUD.

TAKE from the orthodox church of to-day the threat and fear of hell, and it becomes an extinct volcano.—Ingersoll.

Pious Correspondence.

A Letter from Deacon Joel Skidmore.

ZION HILL, N. J., July 20, 1878.

MR. EDITUR OF THE PAPER CALLED THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav for 10 days felt imprest with a feelin that it was my bounden duty to rite you a letter and to give you the truth as it is in Jesus. I hav seen 2 or 3 of your Infidle sheets, & I must tell you I think they are simply horrible. John J. Smith, who lives about a mile & a haf northeast of me, takes your paper and he has let me see copies of them 3 or 4 times. He thinks it is the greatest paper that was ever printed but I jest think it is the most blasfemusest sheet that was ever given man to read. I don't see how you dare to go on & talk the way you do. If I shood ever git so wicked as to talk & blasfeme the way you do in evry paper you print I shood expect that the grate God whos throan is above the clouds wood send down his thunderbolts after me & strike me to the erth. I shood expect evry minit wood be my last. It is a grate wunderment to me how it is the Supream Being allows such a man as you are to cumber the ground. If I cood be God Almity about haf an hour it is my opinyun that thare wood be no truth seeker nor truth seeker editur left to spread thare darkness over the minds of men & wimmen and turn soles from the true path of virchue & eternal life.

How can you go on & talk the way you do? I shood think your conshunce wood trubble you so you cood not sleep nor eat. Nabor Smith will hav it that you are the greatest man that lives. He says you have no fear for God, man, nor the devil, & I dont beleave you have nuther. If you had a little more feer before your eyes I beleev it wood be a grate deel better for you. You are having your day now, but let me tel you that a day of recknin is sure to cum, & then you will hav to anser for all your unbeleef & all the awful things you hav sed. I woodn't stand in your skin then for the best farm in Hunterdon County with a good team of horses & a new farm-waggin thrown in. It is my onest opinion that your chances for happines in the world to come are of the very slimmest character that can possably be imagined.

It makes my blood fairly curdle to read your sassy questions to God and your disbeleef in the Bible, as well as to read some of the letters which your frends rite you. O how much you all need the saving grace of our Lord Jesus Christ to save your benited soles from hell and damnation. You have preshus soles to be saved or lost, and I would that you cum to Jesus before it is too late & while his savin arm is stretched out to save.

Yes, I thought I would write you a good long letter & see if I cannot perswade you to depart from your evil ways & repent & turn to the Lord. You have too much talent to devote to the servis of the devil. He has a grate plenty in his employ without you, and I wood be so glad to see you devoting your time and abilities to a better purpus than you are pursuing.

My nabor Smith—we call him Captin Smith, for he had a company in the 9th Jersey regiment in the war—will have it that you are one of the most onest men that lives, he sez this is so becos you oppose the popular religions which have most all the welth in the country and the stile and influence, and take up on the side of onpopular opinions and advocate them in the face of all opposition when you know that the mass of people will despise you for it. I told him I had to admit that it was a pretty good test of onesty and sincerity, but still it duz not prove that your doctrines are true. A man may think ever so strong that he is rite and be wrong after all. You may say that rule will apply to me just as well as to you. Mebbe that is so, but you must remember I have the Bible on my side, and you go square agin it, and O that makes me feel so bad when I think of it that you do not accept that blessed book as the word of God. Wy, it seems to me it wood be ever so much better if you wood just embrace the truth and come to Jesus and beleev the Bible. I love Jesus and that good book so much that I want you to love them too.

I want you to understand that I have a very friendly feeling towards you, though you are so much in the dark, and, if you are willing to print this letter, I will follow it up with others, and will do my best to show you a better way than you are now persuing. Do remember that you have a preshus sole to be saved or lost, and, oh, why don't you try to save it? Do consider what a terrible thing it is for a sole to be lost. You had a grate deal better have no sole at all than to lose it. Now, Mr. Editor, if I can be of the least servis in helping you to save your sole, you shall sartingly have my ade free gratis for nothing. I believe you have a good big sole, but if you are so unfortnnate as to lose it, you will not be a bit better off than as tho you had the smallest, most diminutive kind of a sole you ever herd of.

Now, Mr. Editur, let me make a bargin with you. If you will print this letter in your paper, and give a Christian man like myself a chance to be herd in your columns, I will rite you a seriz of letters, doing my best to giv you the truth and keep you posted as to how the gosple flurishes in this neck of the woods. My wife, Sally, says you will not print a Christian letter in your paper, becoz, from what she herd me reed out of those papers which Captin Smith let me hav, she sez you don't believ much in Christians, and that you wood ruther print Infidle letters and peeces. But, sez I, Sally, I am going to try him once, any way, and I hav a notion that he is a fare man enuf to print a letter if it duz not talk just as he beelevs. And so, Mr. Editur, heer goes. I enclose a fifty cent scrip for your paper three months. I notis you say you will send it to new beginners three months for haf a dollar. That is good in you, and as times are so hard I will gladly avale myself of your good offer. I will take your paper, as wicked as it is, that long any how, and if you will print my letters, I will try and send you one every week if my work don't prevent, and I hope by that time I will be able to convert you and a good many of your heathen reeders, and, if I can do that, I shall not begrudg the time and labor. The value of a single sole is enormous, and if I can save even one it will be glory enuf for me. If after the 3 months are up, I like your paper, and I find there is some hopes of converting you and some of your reeders, I will send you 3 dollars for a hul yeer, and I shall pray evry day that you may becum converted to the truth.

I must tell you I am a farmer. I have 125 akers of tolerable good land, and it is paid for. I don't owe a cent on it and no man holds my note for a dollar and I have some munny on intrust. I don't want to boast but I will say I stand middlin fair in this community. I have been deacon of Zion Hill Baptist Church for more than 10 yeers and most evry body within five miles of this place will say that Deacon Skidmore's credit is A number 1, and that what he sezs is just about so. I was born and raised in this country and have always lived in this state. I married Sally Crandall 26 years ago and we have lived, thank God, middlin happy together sence. Sally is naturally a little spunky and wunce in a while her dander gets stirred up and she talks rather hasty, but I have lerned that if I keep still and say as little as possible than she soon cools down and in a little while is as kind as a kitten. In that way we manage to get along pretty well, I tell you. I discovered menny yeers ago that thare are menny worse wimmen than Sally Skidmore. She used to be right good looking, but hard work, baring children and increasing yeers has taken away some of her good looks, but when I remember all the good deeds she has done for me and my children she looks well to me yet. She has been a good mother and now she has a motherly look, and our Elder Goodly calls her a mother in Israel.

We have 5 children that hav grone up and two dide when little; the first one dide with the meezles and the other had the rickets and had a swelled hed. He was sick a long time but endured his suffrens with grate pashence. 2 of our grone children are boys and 3 are gals. They are all married but 1 boy and 1 gal. Our oldest boy married Phebe Dusenberry, they are farmers and live 5 miles to the south of us. They are both pious Christians and have 3 children already. Our oldest gal Sally married Stephen Goodrich, a young man from Monmouth County. He keeps a country store in a little village, and runs the post offis. My dawter Sally belongs to the Church but Stephen dont. He sez he dont see as church folks are any better than anybody else. He is a little in the dark yet. I pray for him wunce in a while. Our second boy aint married; he has gone to Callaforny and Collerado. He is in the mines and has done pretty well. I am afeard he is a little wild. He haint got no more religion than a bootjack. Our middle dawter Cynthia marred 8 months ago to a young man, Giles Studwell from Philadelphia. He is clerking in his father's dry goods store and has fare prospects. They have no children yet, but Cynthea rites her mother that they hav reson to expect one along by September. Our youngest girl Susan is at home with us yet, but I'm afrade we shall lose her before very long, for Samuel Craighead, son of Deacon Craighead, is sticking to her mighty close. He cums to see her evry Sunday nite, and they set up in the parlor til most Mundy morning, and I can see plane enuf that the gal likes him. If I do say it, Susan is one of the finest gals in this county. She is of middle size, but very trim; she has big, brite, brown eyes and long brown hare, and Sam sez her mouth is the prettiest and sweetest of any girl's in the hull country, and I think he ort to know. She teaches a class in the Sunday-school, but betwixt you and I the gal aint got any more religion than the law allows; she goes to meeting evry Sunday, but she sez she dont beleev any more of what Elder Goodly sez than she has a mind to.

It is hardly neccessary for me to tell you I am not a first class speller. When I was about 15 yeers old I had a bad spell with the hoopin-coff, and I hav been a bad speller ever sense. 15 yeers ago I was elected school trustee, and I was called upon to rite a notis for town meeting, and sum of the boys made a good deal of fun over my producshun. They counted 19 mistakes in spelling in it, but I didn't care a cent. They new what I ment, and that was all I cared for; and it is the same way now. If your reeders understand my meening it is all I want. If I dont spell according to the prevaling fashun its no matter. I think we need a spellin reform about as much as we do more greenbacks.

I hav lots of things I want to tell you but must draw to a close now. If I find favor in your eyes I shall expect to get a TRUTH SEEKER in course of a week with this letter in it. If I do I will take it for granted that you are disposed to let me rite again. Sally is almost afrade to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER come into the house and sez she will bet 3 quarts of buttermilk that if I reed your paper 6 months I will be nearer converted to your doctrine than you will be to mine. Time will tell. Susan sezs she will bet a dollar out of her butter munney that Bennett converts her daddy to be an Infidle. She would just as live I shood becum an Infidle as not. But, praise the Lord, that I will never do and will never be. My fathe is too firmly grounded on the rock of ages ever to be shaken by the storms of unbelief.

I subscribe myself truly yours, JOEL SKIDMORE,
1st Deacon of Zion Hill Baptist Church.

Speling Reform Without New Leterz.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

The crūel mokery which this tirant inflicts upon trustfūl childhūd iz not the leest ov the outrājez which the speling būk perpetrates. It beginz with the ferst leson in speling and never lets up throo the longest life. When the child haz commited tu memory the ferst and simplest task, b-a, ba; b-e, be; b-i, bī; b-o, bo; b-u, bu; b-y, by; he aut tu feel that he haz lernd sumthing, but he haz not. If the teecher pronounsez this silabl, "by," he cannot tel for the life ov him which "bī" he is tu spel, whether b-i or b-y; and he iz tu lern shortly that he iz still more at a los, for it may be b-u-y, or b-y-e, or b-a-y, az wel as b-i or b-y. He can cum within fore ov it after much labor. He haz lernd tu spel "ba," but he iz tu discuver soon that he duz not no which "bā," whether b-a, or b-a-y, or b-e-y, or b-e-i; and plane "bē" may be b-ee, or b-e-a az will az b-e; and "bō" may be b-e-a-u, or b-o-w, or b-o-a, az wel az b-o; and "bū" may be b-e-a-u, or b-u-e, az wel az b-u. Iz there eny uther tirant on erth hoo haz three, or fore, or five wayz ov dooing a thing, hoo inflicts a punishment for dooing it wun way when hiz caprees demanded anuther way for that particūlar occazion. Yet the child or the man hoo spelz "by" the rong way iz held in contempt—iz punisht for hiz ignoranz aul his life.

But this iz not the wurst. This unsuspecting pursūer ov nolege under dificultiz iz shure tu lern that he can never tel—never tu the day ov hiz deth, tho he becum the mōst eminent ov men—what b-o-w, or s-o-w, or r-e-a-d, or t-e-a-r, and meny uther combinashonz ov leterz spel, without rēding bakwerdz, or forwerdz, or both, tu gather from the conecshon what thay aut tu spel. He lernz by and by that sumtimez the tirant requires him tu uze a-i for plane a az in jail, but that a-i iz a substitute for e in said, and i in aisle; so e-o becumz e in people, o in yeoman, u in pigeon; and o-e iz o in foe, u in does; o-u-g-h iz o in dough, oo in through, uf in tough, auf in trough, ou in plough.

WHOT MAKES THIS SLAVERY POSIBL?

The slave hoo ōbayz a crūel master without suspecting that the exacshonz ar outrājus iz more tu be pitid than the more sensitiv and more sensibl wun hoo chafes under the outrage and resolvz tu be free and tu help utherz tu be free aulso. It iz therfore no compliment tu yoo that aul theze yeerz yoo hav bin reqūired tu expres the long sound ov o in more than twenty wayz, and yet neether new it nor cared for it. It iz such stūpidity that makes slāvery posibl. It iz tu caul yoor attenshon to such outrājez, and thus, if posibl, tu enlist yoor simpathy in behāf ov thoze hoo intend tu be free, that I hav chozen this theem for yoor considerashon, tho fūly aware that sum ov yoo wil continue tu hug yoor chanes az ov ōld, and probably ēven make an effort tu defend and approv the exacshonz ov yoor master. And now so insensibl ar yoo tu yoor one [own] sufferings, that it iz nesesery tu giv yoo proof ov this before yoo wil beleev that yoo hav ēven bin so treeted. Ferst, ther iz plane o, then ther ar o-h and o-w-e for ō alone; then yoo hav o-w in blow, o-l in folk, k-o in know, o-o in door, e-w-e in ewe, o-e in foe, e-a-u in beau, h-o in ghost, e-w in sew, o-u-g-h in dough, w-o-l in wholly, w-o-e in whole, o-a in coal, e-o in yeoman, o-l in roll, o-u in court, w-o in sword, a-u in hautboy, and probably several utherz which doo not now occur tu me. And nerely the same may be sed ov the different wayz ov expressing the soundz ov the uther vowelz. Iz it eny wunder then that no man but a wurd-bilder in the printing-offis can ever lern tu spel our language, and that not wun in a thouzand ov ēven wurd-bilders ever so lernt it az tu be able tu dispens with the speling-būk, tho thay hav dun nuthing els than spel for forty or fifty yeerz?

I OPPOSE the Church because she is the enemy of liberty; because her dogmas are infamous and cruel; because she humiliates and degrades women; because she teaches the doctrine of eternal torment and the natural depravity of man; because she insists upon the absurd, the impossible, and the senseless; because she resorts to falsehood and slander; because she is arrogant and revengeful; because she allows man to sin on a credit; because she discourages self-reliance, and laughs at good works; because she believes in vicarious virtue and vicarious vice—vicarious punishment and vicarious reward; because she regards repentance of more importance than restitution, and because she sacrifices the world we have to one we know not of.—Ingersoll.

Letters from Friends.

COURTESY IN DISCUSSION.

MR. EDITOR: A correspondent in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER writes: "Oh is it not deplorable that such men as Abbot and Underwood should suffer themselves to be overrun by popular prejudice, and actually go back on their word and principles"

Among the readers of all papers, there are undiscriminating, censorious persons who are ever ready to denounce any individual who dares to dissent on any subject from the editor. In the ranks of Liberalism there are persons who are so narrow in their range of thought, and so much under the influence of orthodox teachings, that they have only to learn a man differs from them on some of their pet notions, when they are eager to cast some reflection on him, or apply to him offensive epithets. But I am sure, Mr. Editor, you do not consider it necessary in order to sustain your position to publish from that class of persons false and slanderous statements (like the above) in regard to advocates of Freethought who, unable to concur with you as to the desirableness of the total repeal of the law of 1873, yet with no less honesty or independence maintain that the law should be modified so it can apply only to the publishers and venders of nasty trash that all decent people unite in condemning. Many of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER favor modification rather than repeal, and signed that petition with the desire for modification only. And such is the position of Liberals by thousands and hundreds of thousands in the United States. Are they "overrun by popular prejudice"? Do they "go back on their word and principles"? It would be well for writers like the one from whom I have quoted to confine themselves to facts and arguments pertaining to the subject on which they wish to express their views, and not descend to illiberal and untruthful sentiments in regard to those whose views differ from their own. But when letters are received reflecting on the moral character of co-laborers whom I recognize as honest and honorable men, my method is not to send them to The Index or any other Liberal paper for publication, but to consign them to their proper place—the waste-basket.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

REMARKS.—Mr. Underwood's strictures are very just. The sentence he quotes is objectionable, and it found a place in our columns by escaping our notice. We, perhaps, are not always as careful as we should be with some communications that are admitted. Here we have an instance in point. We have not the slightest doubt that Mr. Underwood is strictly honest in thinking that the Comstock laws of March 3, 1873 are necessary to prevent vile trash from being published and circulated, but he is simply mistaken. That class of literature, as we have before shown, was effectually suppressed before those laws had an existence, and they have not been used in any such case. They have chiefly or wholly been used to oppress worthy people like Dr. E. B. Foote, E. H. Heywood, and others. Those who can see any good in the Comstock laws, either in the conception of them or in the way they have been administered, have a perfect right to defend their opinion. But for our part, we fail to see that a mawkish fear of indirectly favoring obscene publications is the highest incentive that may actuate a human being.—[ED. T. S.]

CORVALLIS, BENTON CO., OREGON, June 23, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I do not know but that I am a little behind in paying for the matchless TRUTH SEEKER. Therefore find a post-office order for three dollars. I think it is likely that I am the oldest subscriber you have on your list; if you have an older one, he or she will have to be more than eighty-five and a half years old, for I was born on the twelfth day of January, 1793. JOHN GRIMSLEY.

NAPLES, ONT., May 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I enclose fifty cents in stamps for a package of your tracts and leaflets. This man I am sending these to is very poor, but he is doing all he can. He is the only missionary in his locality. The Church gives me the credit of breaking up the revivals here last winter. They say they cannot get a paying number to join, and think I am in a very mean business.

This man had a dispute with a minister about Christ descending into hell, the minister denied it. Could you send him the reference. J. W. Price.

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA, July 13, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I expect to be present at the Watkins Convention, and after it is over I propose spending a month or two in New York and New England, during which time I should be pleased to address Liberal Leagues and other Liberal societies. I should esteem it a favor if you would make this announcement through THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some of the subjects on which I am prepared to lecture are:

The Devil Worshipers of America.
The Spiritual Bankrupt Act.
Armageddon.
The Reign of Law.
The Positive Side of Liberalism.
The Loom of Life.

Societies wishing my services may address H. L. Green, Esq., of Salamanca, New York, or W. E. Copeland, Lincoln, Nebraska. Yours truly, W. E. COPELAND

GALVION, O., June 27, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: If my mind serves me right, it is time for you to hear from me again. Enclosed find one dollar which you will please apply to my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am glad that you are so liberal as to accept the subscription price for your paper in installments, as it will give many a chance to pay for it who could not well spare three dollars at one time.

You have many books in your list for sale that I am anxious to procure, but, for the present, mortgages, and discretion, say not now. You may however book me for "The Champions of the Church," which I will order as soon as I can well do so. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the first Freethought journal I ever took. I am not only pleased, but fully satisfied with it, and since the Age of Reason has committed suicide, and The Index is following in the same ignoble path, and so long as D. M. Bennett is editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I think I shall become a life subscriber. I wish you could afford to make a standing offer to let new subscribers have THE TRUTH SEEKER three months for fifty cents on trial. I think by so doing, your friends could in a few years swell your subscription list to a hundred thousand. There are thousands of liberal thinkers in this country that do not know of such a paper being published.

Respectfully, WM. R. DAVIS.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

The speakers who are to address the Watkins Convention, who have not already done so, will please send me the title of their lecture.

ADVERTISE THE CONVENTION.

Every friend of the Watkins Convention is requested, at once, to see that a notice of it is published in the local papers where he or she resides. Some forty able speakers will be present. H. L. GREEN.

PLEASANT LAKE, IND., July 19, 1878.

Passed to the land of souls, from this place, on Friday, 19th inst., the spirit of Mrs. Nancy S. Vanauken, consort of J. H. Vanauken, aged 63 years and 7 months.

Sister Vanauken has been a life-long disbeliever in the popular religions of the day, and she and her husband, and, indeed, all the family, have been known as Atheists. They have lived together forty-seven years, raised a family of eleven children, all of whom are living and ministered to her in her last sickness, except one, who had been killed by lightning a few years ago. They regard it as a little remarkable that the birth of her spirit occurred upon the very hour and anniversary of this deceased son's birth into earth-life. Notwithstanding her disbelief in popular whims, she was a woman so distinguished for her kindness and utter unselfishness, as to have no enemies, and many friends. There were about twelve hundred persons at the funeral, and it is unnecessary to say that the services were conducted without prayer, or even a chapter from the Bible. Words of comfort were spoken by Bro. Wilson, of Auburn, Ind., and the writer. D. W. HULL, M. D.

DANSVILLE, INGHAM CO., MICH., July 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find fifty cents, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Cephas Smith, Stockbridge, Ingham Co, Mich., for three months, as per advertisement in your last issue. I have made some effort in this place to procure subscribers for your paper. In some cases hard times and the want of money is the excuse, but in most cases it is the want of sufficient back-bone and the necessary moral courage to face Mother Grundy and popular theology, or, in other words, to get out of the groove in which the popular world moves.

My advice to Abbot & Co. is, hereafter, when they write or speak on the subject of Liberalism, that they be very careful how they touch or handle the obscenity subject. Don't, gentlemen, advise your readers and hearers to come out and be full-fledged Liberalists; just tell them to keep a little of old superstitious orthodoxy on their plates; it won't do, gentlemen, to give the people a full, square meal of Liberalism. But then, all of those objections against the broadest liberty for the press, free thought, and the expression thereof, is only applicable to our ungodly neighbor. O, no, we don't need it; we don't need any restraint, but the rest of the world do; and it won't answer to give them the privilege of writing and speaking their best thoughts, without first keeping an eye on the key to the popular pulse. So be careful, Brother Abbot, and when you write for the press, or speak from the rostrum, don't meddle with those beautiful declarations in the Bible that treat so plainly on subjects that if a tithe of them were contained in any book of modern times it would send the author to jail, without judge or jury, if Comstock & Co. and his backers could have their way about it. But go ahead, Brother Bennett; don't yield one jot or tittle in your strict adherence to the necessity of unconditional repeal of the odious and abominable Comstock laws, so called. I have long since learned that the great majority of mankind act more natural when not restrained or coerced, than otherwise, consequently the real manhood and womanhood is more easily reached, and sooner developed, than when under severe restraint.

Yours for the entire repeal of all the odious and hellish laws, of whatever name, that restrain or restrict the broadest mental freedom. E. J. SMITH.

WEST POINT, IOWA, July 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir and Bro.: I am very sorry that some of our great lights in the Liberal ranks have taken the position and pursued the course they have in regard to the petition you had the goodness to have circulated for the repeal or modification of the obnoxious Comstock laws. There has nothing happened to the progress of the Liberal cause, and liberalism generally, so detrimental as this. The attack made upon you, the petition, and those who signed it, by Mr. Abbot, was entirely uncalled for and ill-advised—a most wanton and shameful attack—one that will redound to the discredit of himself and those who have rallied to his support.

By rallying to the cultured editor's support, they may comfort and console him in his humiliating mistake, but they will as assuredly ditch themselves, with all on board that train, provided they persist in defense of one so lost to honor. I venture that the greatest mistake that any of them has ever made, and the most detrimental to the Liberal cause, and the high position they have enjoyed in the liberal and scientific ranks, is the position they have taken in regard to the petition, and the insult they have given to those who signed it. I presume there was not a man in America who admired our able champions more than myself; but, like all their admirers, I admired them for their ability, honesty, and true liberalism; and I would just say, for the benefit of those who suppose that most of those who signed the petition were ignorant of what they were signing, that in my opinion a greater mistake was never made. For my own part, I carefully read every word of it over and over again, knew its contents perfectly, and fully indorsed every word of it, and I am not in favor of obscenity any more than Mr. Abbot; and it is a gross insult to me and every one who signed it as I did, knowing what it contained. I circulated the petition in my town, and I can say, of a truth, that I never circulated a petition before that was so carefully read and considered, and which I was so often called upon to explain, as the one under consideration. No, it is a bold assumption of Abbot's that it was generally signed in ignorance.

When a minister is enshrined in the hearts of his congregation, or a physician in the hearts of his patrons, he is pretty safely ensconced, no matter what he may do; but not so with a Liberal leader, and I am glad it is so, for the great cause of liberalism and humanity. The position they occupy in our ranks will depend upon the correctness of the positions they take in regard to the well-being and rights of mankind. While we admit the ability of D. M. Bennett, we admire him more for his honesty and fairness than for anything else, and while he remains so he may expect the hearty support of all good Liberals; but with all our admiration of him, let him prove dishonest or recreant, and he is adjudged and condemned at once. There never was such a tribunal as the Liberals of the civilized world at the present time, without the religious dogmas and superstitions of the past and present; they denounce dishonesty and hypocrisy of every kind. Those who have arrayed themselves on the side of Abbot, in his denunciation of the petition, and those who signed it, have done more to retard the progress of the Liberal League and Liberalism in the West than all other things combined. A more fatal mistake could not be made than to suppose the majority of Liberals ignorant. They are, as a general rule, persons of more than average education and intelligence, and they sit in judgment upon everything that comes to them through the Liberal press; and depend upon it, the judgment rendered in every case will be wonderfully correct and damaging to the dishonest Liberal, no matter what his position may have been in their ranks heretofore. We, with the deepest regret imaginable, hate to part company with those we have so much admired, but when they differ from us, we differ from them; and while we grant them perfect right to their opinions (honest or dishonest though they may be) we cannot and will not indorse them, or those who entertain them, nor give them our support. The first thing for us as Liberals to do, in my opinion, is to utterly rout dishonesty and hypocrisy from our ranks, and then, if possible, keep it out and maintain our position by an unswerving fidelity to truth, and a moral courage invincible.

To seek patronage through popular opinion, contrary to our own convictions of truth and justice, is cowardice—a thing Liberals, as reformers, should never be guilty of.

I greatly admire T. C. Leland's scathing review of Abbot's course. He has vindicated you in the most able manner. I admire anything and everything that comes from his pen; and Mrs. Slenker is another whom I admire very much. I admire her brave, honest, Quaker style—perhaps partly because I was born and raised a Quaker myself.

A LOVER OF JUSTICE.

HOW CAN WE SUSTAIN OURSELVES ON THE OBSCENITY QUESTION?

NORRIDGWOCK JAIL, MAINE, July 20, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I believe my name has never graced or disgraced your pages, but if you please, now the iron is hot, I will strike. I am surprised (if there is anything surprising in this age of the world) to hear a man deny the right to send any publication through the mails or otherwise. If we acknowledge the right of legislators to prohibit the sending of any kind of reading matter through the mails, we are floored at once. In the language of H. C. Wright, "The authority of each individual soul is absolute and final in deciding questions as to what is true or false in principle, or right or wrong in practice; therefore, the individual, the Church, or the State, that attempts to control the opinions or the practice of any man or woman, by an authority or power outside of his or her own soul, is guilty of a flagrant wrong." In the language of my esteemed friend George C. Waite in the Crucible, "The discussion by so-called Liberalists in regard to what obscenity is and what shall and what shall not be suppressed from circulation as obscene is absurd. Who is to judge what is obscene—Mr. Abbot, Mr. Comstock, or some one else? To admit the right of government to suppress what some person or persons think obscenity (whatever that may be) is to deny the right of private judgment in morality. To say that one shall or shall not read or circulate what Mr. Abbot, or Mr. Comstock, or any one else, regards as 'obscene' is to suggest a censorship of thought, and impose your opinions upon others as law. Therefore, if we respect 'liberty,' we must make a square issue; all publications whether 'obscene' or not should be freely read, that the people, and not intrusive intolerants, may judge for themselves what is right and needful. What grander work is there first to do, than to establish the freedom of thought, speech, press, or mails, that obscenity as well as charity be openly discussed and acted upon by the people themselves."

I deny the right of any one to say that I shall circulate through the mails, be it obscene or otherwise. Reformers are fritting away their time, giving the enemy great advantage in allowing for one moment that we shall not have the same right to send obscene matter through the mails or otherwise, as the so-called purest reading matter in the world. I demand freedom, just the same freedom to do wrong as to do right, just the same freedom to sell rum as to sell bread. Anything short of this is no freedom at all.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

PARIS, TEXAS, July 15, 1878.

MY DEAR FRIEND: The "Champions" came to hand all right—not even the corners of the beautiful binding injured in the least. I am much pleased with the work; every Liberal should own it. We are so often reminded of what Christianity has done for the world that we ought to be well posted in the contents of this beautifully gotten up volume, in order to know "both sides of the shield."

The value of your work cannot be estimated. May you live to a ripe old age to strike for humanity and the right. I do sincerely hope orders may come in abundantly and quickly for this new and valuable book. Free thinking people ought in every way possible to add to their stock of knowledge. They will find the "Champions of the Church" a perfect encyclopedia of its kind, written in pleasing style, printed in good type, and bound nicely and prettily.

I have all three of your books, "The Sages," Lord Amberley's, and this last, "The Champions." They are a library of themselves. With these, Graves' "Sixteen Saviors," and a half dozen other choice works on my table, I have no fear of the world, the flesh, the devil, and man-made gods. How often I think of you at your labor. I cannot conceive how you do so much. Do you still live the self-denying, economical life you and Mrs. Bennett were leading when I was in New York? I think of you in that little narrow, one room, as two birds in a cage. Yet, with all its narrowness, littleness, oneness, and severe economy, how pleasant you and Mrs. B. made it. It was one of the sunniest pictures I placed in Memory's hall during my eastern trip from the blue Kennebeck to the historic Potomac.

How much I wish I could have yourself and lady here with me one week. The rest would do you good, and the fresh prairie breeze would strengthen you, soul and body. You Northern people think of us, down here in Texas, as a very sultry set, but if you could step into my cool, shady rooms this afternoon you would just lie back, and not even bother with a fan. I never suffer here with heat as I used to suffer in New York, Philadelphia, and Washington. Texas is a good country for "get up and dust" people, if some of its pious ones are hard on the "Infidels." I shall never forgive the inhuman outrage to that high-toned and honorable gentleman, Dr. Russell. His persecutors ought to have had a prominent place in the "Champions." Wishing you health to pursue your arduous labors in putting down error, I am yours truly, HENRIETTA L. BUCKNER.

[We thank our kind friend for her good words about our new book, and for her kind remembrance of us. We have to inform her that we are still occupying the same rooms as when she was here two years ago, and have taken one additional room. When we enlarged our paper and increased our book work we had to have more room for the printers, and were compelled to take the one we used for a dwelling-room for business purposes, and took another in the same building for our dwelling-room. We would be very glad could our Texas friend look in and see us.]

SILVERTON, OREGON, July 1, 1878.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I positively must and will write to say a few words. The T. S. seems to grow better every week—never missed but one copy since its first issue, and that you replaced fourfold. I always distribute copies where I think 'twill do good, but it goes like pulling sound double teeth to part with them. Oh! how fearfully Materialistic Infidelity is spreading, is the cry of the Church, for very few ever come back from its fold. Being a stranger here, I stump every man I meet to know what his religion is, and about twelve out of thirteen new-comers answer, Well, the big church. Then we drop into a chat about god (I always write it now with a little g) and "sich;" one or both of us have read THE TRUTH SEEKER or Investigator. We first give Tony hell! and, for the last month or six weeks, fling a small chunk at Abbot, overhaul the Bible, the preachers, then have to brag up those two preeminently the most fair, honest spoken, gentlemanly editors (Seaver and Bennett) the world ever produced. I always begin by reading the letters from friends, which is one of the best features of the paper, as it is distinctly our views, and is also a means of finding where Infidels are living and how to find them. Every few weeks I get or send a letter to some of them. The "Interrogatories" show us what you are thinking about, and set us to thinking. Our gentlemanly, scholarly devil gives us a magazine of useful scientific facts. Simon Christianus takes a peep at the credulity, absurdity, and thinness of theology (I am not going to say anything about Sister Slenker, because every one else does).

T. C. Leland is the champion crack shot that kills every shot—no blanks. Brick Pomeroy, when he began organizing greenback clubs, issued a circular to those proposing to start a club to elect for trustees men known to be radical, loquacious, combative, uncompromising, and persistent greenbackers and anti-monopolists, and the club would be assured of success, and he was right, as Brick nearly always was on those subjects. If ever the devil plotted against Christianity, it was when he moved Anthony to try to attack the trustee of American Freethought, D. M. Bennett. It was a deep, dark, and (to orthodoxy) a damnable plot. Jah's big dog, Tony, never met his match before. Now he has put his foot in it, got well crushed and mutilated, no one seems to be afraid of him any more. I have seen a notice of him in more than a dozen different papers since that big petition came up before Congress, whose editors had never heard of him before, and I have the first one to see that did not roundly condemn him as a sneak and spy, low-born, dirty, contemptible, and inhuman. Stick to him brother, like a bull dog to a rat, until he stops squealing. Am sorry you had cause to quarrel with Abbot, but you are right, and defended us in a way that all approve of, and with words that have no double meaning. A. S. KINSER.

HYDE PARK, PA., July 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed find two dollars. $1.30 to pay the balance I owe on "Champions." I am highly delighted with the book. It is a scorcher on the orthodox Christianity of to-day, which it is claimed mankind have been so much benefited by. Yours forever in the cause,
J. F. GREEN.

WESTERVILLE, OHIO, July 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I find that it is time for me to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Enclosed find three dollars for which please send me the paper another year. It may be necessary to change the address often, but wherever I go I want your paper to follow me. It is a glorious sheet. The only fault I can find is its quarrel with other papers. Do not notice the efforts of The Index, and such contemptible organs as the Age of Reason, and THE TRUTH SEEKER will remain as it has been since I have known it—the best of them all. Do not fight an enemy who is beneath you. CHARLES N. MARVIN.

CLARION, IOWA, July 13, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 29 W. H. Beard's communication contains one sentence that would make an excellent text for some of your lady correspondents, and I verily expected to see it handled to good purpose in your next issue. Wake up ladies, and let us hear from you through the T. S. He says after giving old Simon Dale his due, that the Newburgh child "was robbed of her virtue, of all that makes a woman a gem of loveliness and beauty," and then and there leaves the poor child to perish under the heel of our exquisitely respectable society, without one cheering word of hope. Although Christ treated the woman—not a mere child, but an adult woman—very differently, saying unto her, "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more," his professed followers unite in driving her to suicide, or worse still, to the brothel. The latter in our large cities is kept full to overflowing by just such encouragement as friend Beard gives that little girl. He surely did not mean to join Dale, and crush her beyond the hope of resurrection. Will some one please give us a good article in this paper upon that text?
H. BROOKS.

ROCKFORD, ILL., July 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: Many thanks for the kindness shown me and the cause I so much love, by giving my letter a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I feel assured that there are thousand of the readers of your valuable paper who would rejoice to see the philosophy of Spiritualism eliminated from the dross and cobwebs of ignorance and superstition into which some of its more ignorant and uninformed followers have in many instances and localities cast upon it, thereby causing it to be misunderstood and evilly spoken of. Yet a large portion of this class of professed Spiritualists are as ignorant of the noble and inspiring teachings of spiritual philosophy as the most unlettered Catholics are of the doctrines of the Catholic Church, some of them having never advanced any farther than to have attended a circle or two, and, may be, heard a few raps; or perchance they may have had some medium give them a few tests, and presto, immediately they are full-fledged Spiritualists. They know all about it, and fall to teaching it like a Methodist convert. This class of believers is a hindrance to its prosperity and are like the camp-followers of an advancing army. Spiritualism (as well as all other phases of unorganized Liberalism) is more cursed with this class of uninformed followers than any other ism that the world has ever known. This state of things is largely owing to its unprecedented growth during the few years of its existence and to its not organizing societies for education and improvement. And the natural consequence of this state of affairs is that we as Spiritualists have to stand the opprobrium of both orthodoxy and Materialism. We are in the condition of an army under a cross fire—an enemy on both sides. I do not complain of this, but in some respects I am rather glad of it, hoping that it will eventuate in driving our forces together. But it is hard to be misrepresented and falsified without having a fair and impartial hearing, and I am glad that THE TRUTH SEEKER is open to give all sides a fair showing. It is perfectly right that all public mediums should give investigators of the phenomena a fair chance to test the genuineness of their mediumship, provided that in giving such tests, they are not required to suffer torture, or endanger their own health and personal safety, and the spirits desirious of using them as a medium of communication—if they are intelligent and truthful spirits, for I do not consider all spirits out of the physical body perfect or truthful, any more than spirits in the body are perfect and truthful—ought to be willing and anxious to have them thus tested. But in my opinion the fault of false mediumship does not rest entirely with the mediums.

It doubtless is often the case that those who go to mediums for communications and tests are untruthful persons themselves, and as a natural consequence attract to themselves untruthful and lying spirits, and when such spirits can get control of an organism for communication, they would be very likely to deal in falsehood and deceit. And again, many inquirers are very anxious to have the future unveiled to them, and it is very questionable whether spirits out of a physical body have a much more extended knowledge of the future than spirits in the physical body—for if this were so, it would put an end to the law of progression which Spiritualism so beautifully teaches—and this often leads them, through an over anxiety of the medium to please and give satisfaction to the sitter, or from a tendency of the spirit controlling to deal in predictions in regard to the future, to get false communications in reference to coming events. And notwithstanding they may have received good and reliable tests of the presence of a power or knowledge outside of anything that they themselves may have possessed, or the medium with whom they may have been sitting has possessed, yet because the predictions in regard to future events failed to become true, they have been led to denounce all mediums as frauds and humbugs. I do not profess to be a medium, and consequently only speak as a layman on this subject.

The philosophy of Spiritualism and spirit manifestation, and its beautiful teachings in reference to the present and future life, appear to me to be rational and natural. And I hope others may be led into an investigation of the matter for themselves. It embraces matters of vital importance to every one of us, which it were well to look into, and if rightly understood, I think that it will show us the utility of proper living while here in earth life in order that we may be the better prepared to enjoy life in the myriads of ages to come. I remain as ever, an humble inquirer after the truth, F. F. FOLLET.

P. S. BRO. B.: I hope and trust that this may fall into the hands of some poor struggling, doubting, soul, and that he or she may be encouraged to struggle on, living up to the light that is given them, and by so doing be lead into broader fields of light which will be sure to come. It is inexplicably true that we are not all so constituted as to be able to receive personal evidence of spirit presence, notwithstanding that they may be around every one of us a good deal of the time, yet if we would give more attention to the slight manifestations that we get, our powers of preception would increase. I know it has been so with me. F. F. F.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I have been a reader of your valuable paper (which I take from Deulinger and Russell, book dealers who subscribed for it at my request,) something over two months, and I am highly pleased with it. It treats each and every subject impartially, giving its readers an opportunity of reasoning from both or from many views presented, and by doing so it has made many friends to the Liberal cause, which is that of justice and equal rights to all, and which I must say is not the orthodox motto; hence it is wrong, for in my opinion, where justice is excluded, wrong predominates. Why have not I and why has not THE TRUTH SEEKER, or any other Liberal sheet, the same right to give our opinions of a Deity or of a hereafter as our pious neighbor has, without being bellowed at by a self-righteous community of unreasonable bigots, who hurl at us between their teeth with a vengeance, the words, Infidel, Atheist, Scoffer? Why have we not equal rights of opinion with them, without being viewed by our long-faced, sanctified, chicken-eating neighbor as a "vampire," or something equally horrible? Why speak of such Liberal sheets as THE TRUTH SEEKER, The Investigator, and many others I could name, as "even dangerous to be handled with tongs?" The orthodox religion in this century, as far as I am aware, has not had persons to contend with who resorted to the laws of the United States in order to crush it out of existence. Is it not true on the other hand that they have used every dishonorable means their sneaking natures could devise, embracing Comstockism (which is one of their filthiest resources), to prevent liberty of speech and free thought? Upon a candidate petitioning to join the Y. M. C. A.'s, I would like to be informed if he is handed one of the laws of the society in question to peruse? I refer to the "Comstock laws."

But in their very teeth has not our cause been gaining nobly, under the very eyes and upturned nose of the Church? What believer in the "blood of the lamb" will dispute it? Does that not confirm that "right is might?" Is anything right when it is proven to be false? Is it worth upholding under such circumstances? Is it true that those who obstinately assert for facts that which has been proven untrue, I say, are they the promoters of truth and justice, and are they the right persons to train young minds? Is religion of the present day, or has it ever been, anything different from a fear of some supernatural being supposed to be capable of creating or demolishing anything in existence merely by his will? Has that supposed being ever given any sign to which we, the present generation, can testify by our knowing it positively, undisputably, on account of having seen it personally and knowing it to be real, a fact known to us by our natural senses? Can a human being credit as true anything contrary to the convictions of the supreme court of his own conscience? Why does Christianity despise science and investigation, and in fact everything calculated to enlighten us in regard to ourselves, the position we occupy toward each other as human beings, and to the universe in which we have our existence? Is it not because their myth would, under science and investigation, vanish as smoke before a gale? Is not their desire to hold it (their myth) a superstitious dread instilled into their minds, caused by having been brought up and taught by superstitious and God-fearing or ignorant teachers, or ignorance in them to the exclusion of reason? Has any of the teachings of the book called Bible shown any example of mercy or justice? Is what it teaches justice? Is it Christian mercy? Was it Christian justice or mercy to persecute and harass beyond endurance a lady who had the welfare of the human family in mind, who wished to promote health and make us wiser of ourselves, by causing printed pamphlets or books to be sent through the mails and to be distributed among honest and truth seeking people, I ask, was that Christian mercy? That is a sample of what we expect to see in the future, as an outgrowth of the Y. M. C. A.'s, or the S. F. S. Vice. Small thanks if they have no better to offer.

In conclusion, allow me to say that if Christians would read scientific works and give a little more time to investigation instead of swallowing mythical tales as a matter of fact, they would soon be convinced of the true state of things as they really are. That to doubt is not to be damned, but to the contrary, it is the forerunner of an intelligent and happy mind. I am glad there are so many of the opposite sex engaged in this work. Such ladies as Mrs. Slenker, Mrs. Chase, Mrs. Besant, and others are doing a good work, and may they and every one in the cause of liberty continue to prosper as long as our freedom is in danger of insults from or of being imprisoned and shackled by the chains of orthodox superstition. Go on Mr. Bennett with your good work, you are sure to prosper. I would like to say more but perhaps I have already imposed upon good nature, so I will close wishing you to ever remember me, Yours for truth, liberty, and free thought, J. W. M. ESLAMAN.

A Letter from E. H. Heywood.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Will you give place in your columns to a brief statement of the leading facts contained in the enclosed letter from E. H. Heywood, published in the Investigator? The Liberals throughout the country are under many obligations to you for the attitude you have taken with regard to the Comstock law. According to the Christian standard of morality, religion is its strongest safeguard, therefore the Index, Investigator, and TRUTH SEEKER, and I may add the Spiritualistic journals, may, by some new interpretation of the law, be construed into immoral and obscene publications, and then, if not before, there will be a great awakening among the advocates of "modification."

In view of the fact that the daily papers represent our friend, Mr. Heywood, to be in the receipt of a "bushel of letters every week," will you permit me to make this practical suggestion to his correspondents, viz., that they accompany with their friendly inquiries a postage stamp, in order that their response may not tax his already depleted purse. Yours sincerely, LAURA KENDRICK.

July 19, 1878, Y. L 6.

DEAR MR. SEAVER: I am under obligations to you and Mr. Mendum for many noble words and deeds in many ways. It was very kind of you to insert gratuitously a notice of our house in Princeton, and we expected that all would go on well there; but my own brother, S. R. Heywood, of Worcester, an Orthodox capitalist, has foreclosed the mortgage, and advertised the house to be sold one week from to-day, July 26th! Although he has been very kind to me for twenty-five years, financially, he came here to this jail June 25th (the first voluntary step he had taken towards me during eight months of trial and anxiety); he came here to ask me to assist him to put my little children and their mother into the street even sooner than the law would allow him to do it! My friends wish to buy in the house and save a shelter for my family. He is trying to prevent it! Representing the religious bigots in Worcester, Plymouth Church, who broke up Prof. Denton's meetings in Mechanics' Hall there ten years ago, he wishes to colonize a set of them in our house to riot in prayers and psalm-singing under that roof consecrated to liberty and progress!

Worse than this, he refused to be present at my trial in court in Boston, saying that he would not be seen "with the crowd," referring to the friends of liberty who stood by me there. He is not ashamed to be seen with Comstock, Cummings, Clark, and Clifford, the enemies of freedom! He thinks my sentence "light," and he boasts that if I would "confess," "pocket my chrochets," "quit reform," and "behave," he (through Messrs. Hoar, Rice, Devens, and others, Worcester men) "could have me out in forty-eight hours." With one hand he thinks he, unless I will "confess," can close the avenues of approach to President Hayes; with the other he rudely, and needlessly, and mercilessly, thrusts my family into the street in Princeton! Naturally a kind, generous man, religion makes him now savage and cruel. The only one of my creditors who has not treated me in a fair, generous way, he, my brother, is the one who, "for Christ's sake," tortures me with anxiety about my family, and from whose approaching footsteps my little children flee in terror!

It is dreadful to have to state such facts about one's own brother, but it is my duty to do it, and you are at liberty to read this in your public meeting, and print it in the Investigator. You may remember that in January, 1875, at the Paine Anniversary, the reporter of the Herald accidently gave my speech as from "S. R. Heywood of Worcester" (then three years House member of the Massachusetts Legislature, now willing to be Senator) and that my brother rushed to the telegraph office in great alarm, sending a dispatch to the "religious" editor of the Herald to say that he was no such Infidel!

I am glad that you are to discuss in Investigator Hall "The Battle of the Boyne," and to see that you, as usual, are on the side of liberty. The City Government of Montreal is disgraced, beyond words to express, by its cowardly and treacherous action and inaction in the recent issue.

I am quite well. The heavy dose of "law and order" they gave me has not made me either sick or penitent. Love to all. Truly yours, ever, E. H. HEYWOOD.

P. S.—If my brother will allow us a fair chance, we can save the house; naturally an honest, able man, he may yet come to a humane sense of the situation. If my creditors will be patient, they will all get their pay in full. Devoted largely to reform for twenty years, I have also done much other business, have always paid one hundred cents on the dollar, and always intend to do so. E. H. H.

Apple Blossoms.

The orchard grass is sunshine barred,
And starry-white upon the sward
The pretty daisies lie;
I rest beneath a mossy tree,
And through its waving branches see
The sapphire of the sky.

I feel the balmy breeze of May
Soft blowing down the grassy way,
And in the boughs above
The little birds break into song,
And praise in thrilling strains and strong,
Spring's halcyon days of love.

The apple blossoms fall around,
And fleck the daisy-checkered ground
As breezes softly blow;
I stretch a lazy hand aloft,
And grasp a cluster silken soft,
Like rosy-tinted snow.

I look at every tender leaf,
And marvel why a life so brief
To such sweet things is given;
Why not for them a longer space
To blossom gayly in their place,
Beneath the summer heaven?

Why not for them a longer time
To feel the sun at morning prime,
To see the moon at night?
To quiver by soft breezes stirred;
To listen when God's morning bird
Sings heavenward his delight?

Ah me, my heart! it must be so.
The blossom drops that fruit may grow;
The sweetness of the flower
Dies early on the vernal breeze.
That autumn-time may bless the trees
With gold and crimson dower.

Ah me, my heart! so must thou see
The fi wery hopes that gladden thee
In this thy morning prime
Fade in the fair place where they grow.
Drop round thee swiftly like the snow
Of apple-blossom time.

But if they leave thee good and true,
And pure as when they blossomed new.
Then gladly let them go;
Where now these fairy blossoms be.
In God's good time thine eyes shall see
Thy life's fair harvest glow!

BY W. S. BELL.

The high-toned representatives of cultured Freethought and respectability may not look with favor upon these three thousand interrogatories to Jehovah which THE TRUTH SEEKER, D. M. Bennett, has preferred. They doubtless will look down from the serene heights of culture and view these questionings as vulgar and coarse. Still, they are questions which occur to multitudes of men and women when they begin to think for themselves; and the plain, straightforward form of expression in which they are presented is adapted to the capacity of the largest number of inquiring minds. The Christian may at first look upon them as blasphemous, but he cannot follow these inquiries through many pages and not feel convinced that the writer is asking rational questions; nor can he charge the interrogator with foolhardy presumption in seeking for instruction. For the "word of the Lord" bids him ask and receive. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God . . . let him ask in faith, nothing wavering" (James i, 5, 6). D. M. Bennett never wavered until he had rolled up something more than three thousand inquiries about the divine mysteries. He wants to get at "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." But the clergy, the "men of gawd," do not admire this new departure. Why should the unsanctified scribe, D. M. Bennett, break through all time-honored customs and rush into the face of Jehovah with his questions, when the "priests of the living God," those who wait upon him day and night, and who therefore must "know the will of God," and "the mind of Christ," and whose office it is to teach the people the hidden mysteries—why should they do otherwise than look with horror and indignation upon a proceeding which, if persisted in by others, would destroy their occupation? Besides, this way of asking questions by the wholesale threatens destruction to the retail business. He asks so very many questions, and they are so exceedingly difficult to answer. Perhaps the difficulty of these interrogatories may rest in the brain of D. M. Bennett. If he trusts to "carnal reason," of course he cannot view spiritual things with the eye of faith. He insists that heavenly things shall correspond with earthly things. If he insists on the exercise of common sense, and places reason above faith, and science higher than religion—if this is the way he is going to get through this world, of course we see that he is no Christian.

But he has put up his three thousand questions, and the people are waiting to see what the three thousand answers will be; but, so far as heard from, no returns have come in from the other side. No revelations have yet come from the clouds; nor have the servants of Jehovah, the men of gawd, who are on "speaking terms" with this otherwise silent Deity, deemed it expedient to come forward and unravel these flimsy queries. The people are beginning to wonder at the silence—the reticence. Why does this ancient God refuse to give any reply to these questions? Why does he not command the priests to come forward and silence these mockings of Infidelity? Perhaps "his watchmen are blind; they are all ignorant; they are all dumb dogs; they cannot bark" (Isa. lvi, 10). To be sure, this is not very elegant language to copy into the columns of a Freethought journal; nor is it quoted in such relations as to display to the faithful the beauties of its inspiration.

If they were "dumb dogs," of course, they could not bark. It may be that these ancient canines lost their voices, as some modern curs have, by barking up the wrong tree. We have observed a few instances where the holy men have gone for this Philistine of THE TRUTH SEEKER with unwavering faith in the "God of battles," and in their own direct and uncorrupted lineage from the same, intent upon the utter rout, discomfiture, and destruction of the Infidel. A proper sense of our duty as chroniclers of passing events, and a due regard for truth, compel us to state that these soldiers of the cross have usually retreated from the combat sadder and wiser men. They almost invariably find that they are barking up the wrong tree.

To the reader who has not the time to look up all the authorities on the absurdities, errors, contradictions, and immoralities which are connected with Christian theology, this handy volume, "Interrogatories to Jehovah," will be a most welcome aid. It will prove to be exceedingly suggestive to the thoughtful mind, and will bear re-perusal, as the three thousand questions are of vital import.

"Champions of the Church."

MR. EDITOR: I have been lately looking through a handsomely-bound volume of 1,119 pages, which I received from the author, entitled "The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions," by D. M. Bennett, "Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of 'The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers,' 'Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures,' 'Interrogatories to Jehovah,' 'What I Don't Believe; What I Do Believe: Why and Wherefore,' and joint author of 'Christianity and Infidelity—the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion,' 'The Bennett-Teed Discussion,' etc., etc., etc." Mr. Bennett, it will be seen, is a very prolific writer. Books from his publishing house, many of them bearing his name as author, appear faster than one can read them. He is himself a very ready writer, and he must keep employed several assistants to help him write and compile these large works.

The volume whose title is at the head of this article "is largely," says the author, "a compilation from standard authorities, and consequently but little claim is set up for originality." The object aimed at is to show the follies and vices, crimes and cruelties, of which distinguished "champions of the Church" have been guilty. This the author has done very successfully. "The most striking cases have been selected." The first champion "hauled over the coals" is Jesus, but whose name has a more appropriate place, I think, in Mr. Bennett's other work, "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." However, his name is among "the champions of the Church" here, and he is treated accordingly. The last "champion" whose character and doings are described is Anthony Comstock, to whom 111 pages are devoted, and who is represented as a moral monster. "As a champion of morality and decency," says Mr. Bennett, "he is perhaps one of the most sensual, vile, and corrupt that has lived since the Christian rule began." Several hundred characters are mentioned or sketched between the chapter on Jesus and that on Anthony. The vices and crimes of Fathers, rulers, popes, priests, and devotees are narrated in vigorous language. The sketches of the Christian Fathers are brief, but generally good. The writer of them evidently had access to the excellent work, "Supernatural Religion," among other valuable works.

The chapters on the early Christians do them, I believe, injustice. The sketches of Calvin and Luther are very readable, and give facts not dwelt on much by Protestants. Several pages are devoted to "Sinful Clergymen." Some years ago an ex-clergyman compiled a book, which he thought of publishing under the title of "Amours of the Clergy." There is no need of that book now. Mr. Bennett has collected a sufficient number of cases of clerical weakness, vice, and villany to show the most bigoted Christian that the clergy are the wrong class to throw stones at Infidels for real or alleged immoralities. An interesting chapter is given on "Christianity and Slavery," and another is devoted to "The Persecution of Witches."

I notice some errors in the book, which is not strange considering that "the greater portion has been produced in a little over three months' time." It will probably be carefully revised before it is republished. It contains a vast amount of information, and a large number of authorities are cited; and although it is easy to discover defects in a work of this size, hastily compiled as this has been, yet it is a work that has cost much labor, and will be highly valued by a large class of readers. One who wishes a large mass of facts, in convenient form for reference, with which to refute the notion that sincere piety and intense religious zeal are evidence of moral goodness, will find this work valuable. Mr. Bennett's method of attacking superstition is distasteful to some Liberals who are quite as earnest as himself; and theirs, I presume, is as little to his taste. Let every advocate of Free Thought labor in his own way, neither expecting entire acquiescence in what he says or does, even from friends, nor claiming exemption from candid criticism.

Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.
Thorndike, Mass., July 17, 1878.

"Interrogatories to Jehovah."

This is an odd book, highly ingenious, and quite out of the common way of book-making, and some might think it irreverent perhaps. But its talented author, D. M. Bennett, in these inquiries, and the book is full of them from beginning to end, was actuated by no such motive, we are sure. While the spirit of candor and honest inquiry pervades its pages throughout, at the same time it presents a sharp, searching, and vigorous examination of Biblical assertions, dogmatisms, fallacies, and sophistries.

According to Scriptural record, Jehovah was formerly on intimate terms with the children of earth, counseling, commanding, questioning, and answering questions. This being assumed, what reason is there to suppose that his ear has become deaf or his lips mute in these present days? Does he not know as much of his children as heretofore? And may he not answer the fair and earnest interrogatories of D. M. Bennett as well as those of Moses or Jeremiah? Has he outgrown the world or the world him? Has he not particularly said, "Call unto me and I will answer thee"? (Jer. xxxiii, 3.)

Then has Mr. Bennett, or any one else, a perfect right to ask questions and expect answers from him direct or from his appointed ministers? All the inquiries in this work are based upon problems, propositions, assertions written in the so-called "Word of God," and if they (the problems, etc) are founded in Nature, they may easily be answered; if not, one may well ask cui bono? And if the answer comes sweeping down to us in tones louder than was ever thundered from Mt. Sinai, "Of no good!" then surely none will feel inclined to pin his faith upon a system as barren and desolate of truth as malarial districts of health in mid-summer.

This work, of two hundred and fifty pages, is worthy of examination by all classes, believers as well as unbelievers. It will well repay a careful reading, and every one who buys it will feel that he is not only assisting the author in his chosen and worthy work of unveiling superstition and seeking and uplifting truth, but will also know that he is most assuredly receiving more than his "money's worth" in this highly interesting, instructive, and common-sense book.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

Gems of Thought.

MAN'S likeness is reflected in his gods.—Schiller.

THERE is no slavery but ignorance. Liberty is the child of intelligence.—Ingersoll.

MUSIC is a prophecy of what life is to be—the rainbow of promise translated out of seeing into hearing.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

THERE is one good—happiness. There is but one sin—selfishness. All law should be for the preservation of the one and the destruction of the other.—Ingersoll.

THROUGH zeal knowledge is gotten, through lack of zeal knowledge is lost; let a man who knows this double path of gain and loss thus place himself that knowledge may grow.—Buddha.

TRUE worth is as inevitably discovered by the facial expression, as its opposite is sure to be clearly represented there. The human face is nature's tablet; the truth is certainly written thereon.—Lavater.

THE rights of men and women should be equal and sacred; marriage should be a perfect partnership; children should be governed by kindness; every family should be a republic; every fireside a democracy.—Ingersoll.

As I approve of a youth that has something of the old man in him, so I am no less pleased with an old man that has something of the youth. He that follows this rule may be old in body, but can never be so in mind.—Cicero.

TO GENERATE and superinduce a new nature, or new natures, upon a given body, is the labor and aim of human power; whilst to discover the form, or true difference of a given nature, or the nature to which such nature is owing, or source from which it emanates, is the labor and discovery of human knowledge.—Bacon.

THE chief business of the clergy has always been to destroy the joy of life, and multiply and magnify the terrors and tortures of death and perdition. They have polluted the heart and paralyzed the brain; and upon the ignorant altars of the Past and the Dead, they have endeavored to sacrifice the Present and the Living.—Ingersoll.

IN Sophocles, Jocasta prays to the Lycian Apollo, and says "that she came to his temple because it was the nearest." This was but a sorry compliment to his godship. It is the same, however, that people generally pay to religion, who abide by the doctrines and faith they have been bred up in, merely to save themselves the trouble of seeking farther.—Sterne.

WE may be pretty certain that persons whom all the world treats ill deserve entirely the treatment they get. The world is a looking-glass, and gives back to every man the reflection of his own face. Frown at it, and it will in turn look sourly upon you; laugh at it and with it, and it is a jolly, kind companion; and so let all young persons take their choice.—Thackeray.

MUSIC is the rod of Hermes. It calls up the spirits from below, or conducts them back again to Elysium. It not only excites the imagination, but invigorates eloquence and refreshes the memory. It is like besprinkling a tessellated pavement with odoriferous water, which brings out the images, cools the apartment, and gratifies the senses by its fragrance. —Walter Savage Landor.

IT is our office, as faithful secretaries, to receive and note down such laws as have been enacted by the voice of Nature herself; and our trustiness must stand acquitted, whether they are accepted, or, by the suffrage of general opinion, rejected. Still we do not abandon the hope that, in times yet to come, individuals may arise who will be able to comprehend and digest the choicest of those things; and solicitous also to carry them to perfection.—Bacon.

ADD to the power of discovering truth, the desire of using it for the promotion of human happiness, and you have the great end and object of our existence. This is the immaculate model of excellence that every human being should fix in the chambers of his heart; which he should place before his mind's eye from the rising to the setting of the sun; to strengthen his understanding, that he may direct his benevolence, and to exhibit to the world the most beautiful spectacle the world can behold—of consummate virtue guided by consummate talents.—Sydney Smith.

CHRISTIANS accuse us of rejecting everything, good, bad, and indifferent, that is contained within the lids of the Bible, and of hating God, Christ, and religion, whereas we admire, love, and appreciate whatever of good, whatever of beauty, and whatever of truth there is to be found in the old book, just as much as if it were printed in any other volume. We cherish, respect, and reverence everything good, grand, or noble that is therein narrated or descriptive of the life and character of the so-called Christ, just as much as we do the same beautiful traits and sentiments when we read of them in connection with the hero of some other novel, or any of the records of the ancient mythological deities. We feel awe, reverence, wonder, and admiration when we behold the various manifestations of the forces of nature, the grand sublimities, the gentle, silent beauties, and the sweet, tender harmonies that permeate all space around and about us. We love and admire the real and the tangible, while Christians dream dreams and weave cloud-theories of vague and visionary nothings. Ours is the actual; theirs is the ideal. Ours the reality; theirs the romance. We prefer not blissful dreams of future impossible happiness, never to be realized, but strive to enjoy the actual, living now, with all its common every-day ups and downs, joys and pleasures, tears and smiles, and hopes and fears.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

SAL ARY is the young lady that everybody wishes to secure.

DURING the seige, Paris subsisted on horse-flesh. Now it lives on strangers.

OF a barber's shop that was formerly a law office the paper says that the people get shaved there just the same.

IT was said of a certain judge that he was so reserved in his manners that one would never suspect that he had any.

COUGH-DROPS.—The philosopher, Josh Billings, has placed in the hands of his publishers the "Farmers' Allminix" for 1879. From its pages we are permitted to make the following extracts. Josh is summering at the Glen House, White Mountains, and the trout are growing fewer every day:

Bachelors are alwus a braggin ov their freedom!!—freedom to darn their own stockings, and poultiss their own shins! I had rather be a widower once in 2 years, reglar, than tew be a grunting, old, hair-dyed bachelor only for 90 days.

Ambishun tew shine in everything iz a sure way tew to put a man's kandell all out.

Sucking a whipt sillybub, thru a rhy straw, iz a good deal like trieing to liv on buty.

Sum people won't beleave ennything they kant prove; the things i can't prove, are the very things i beleave in most.

Good examples amung the rulers are the best laws they kan enakt.

One ov the saddest sights ov all to me, iz an old man, poor and deserted, whom i once knew living in ease and luxury.

He who spends hiz younger days in dissipashun iz mortgaging himself tew disseaze and poverty, two inexorable creditors, who are certain tew foreclose at last, and take possession ov the premises.

The world owes all its energys and refinement tew luxurys—digging roots for breakfast and going naked for clothes, iz the virtewous innocence ov a lazy savage.

Prudes, are coquets, gone to seed.

A dandy in love iz in just about az bad a fix az a stick ov molassis kandy that haz half melted.

Thare iz no good substitute for wisdom, but silence iz the best that haz been discovered yet.

Thare iz lots ov folks in this world who, rather than not find enny fault at all, wouldn't hesitate tew say to an angle worm, that hiz tail waz altogether too long for the rest ov hiz body.

A man who iz good company for himself iz alwus good company for others.

Cunning iz very apt tew outwit itself. The man who turned the boat over and got under it to keep out ov the rain, waz one ov this kind.

I hav seen men who had worn out their vices, and supposed ov course that they waz living on their virtews.

What a man iz the most afrade ov he sez he don't believe in; this may ackount for sum men's unbelief in hell.

The man who dies the ritchest iz the one who leaves the least here, and takes the most with him.

ADVICE TO THE LADIES.

Unwary belles!
Who, day by day the fashionable round
Of dissipation tread, stealing from art
The blush Eliza owns, to hide a cheek
Pale and deserted—come and learn of me
How to be ever blooming, young, and fair,
And it shan't cost you a red cent.

Give to the mind improvement:
That is to say, read the fourth page
Of this paper, terms $10 a year in advance.
No discount to clergymen. Let the tongue
Be subject to the heart and head,
And give it a rest occasionally.

Withdraw from the city smoke,
And trip with agile foot oft as the day begins
The steepy down or velvet lawn,
Or play an air from "Trovatore,"
On an old-fashioned churn.
Rise with the lark and with the lark to bed;
The breath of night's destructive to the hue
Of every flower that blows. Go to the field,
And ask the humble daisy why it sleeps
Soon as the sun departs? It will tell you
It is to preserve its complexion
And keep its breath pure and sweet;
That it would droop and all its freshness lose
Compelled to taste the rank and poisonous steam
Of midnight theatre and morning ball,
Or to sit out on the stoop with a young man.

Give to repose the solemn hour she claims
And the front gate will call you blessed.

O, there is a charm
Which morning has, that gives the brow of age
A smack of youth
And makes the life of youth
Shed perfumes exquisite—
Precisely what you want, you see,
And what you pay your druggists big money for,
Except, perhaps, the smack of youth,
Which he will be only too glad to give
For nothing; or, if he isn't
Do not hesitate to call on us—
You will ever find our latch string out,
By a very large majority.

Expect it not.
Ye who till noon upon a down bed lie
While your mothers are doing the work;
Ye fair, like you, it must be wooed, or never won;
And, being lost, it is in vain to advertise for it.
Also is it vain ye ask for Milk of Roses,
Goat's Milk, Bloom of Youth, lily white,
Cream for the complexion,
Or any other cosmetic? All are n. g.

Notes and Clippings.

"We've Left the Barrel" and "Hurrah for the Pump" are the titles of two popular English temperance songs.

AN English clergyman characterizes the leading parties in the Church as Attitudinarians, Latitudinarians, and Platitudinarians.

"A NEW pipe organ with sixteen stops, and no debt upon it," is what is just now making a Massachusetts church particularly happy.

THERE is a university in New Zealand which confers degrees, said to be as good as any in England. Let the yet untitled clergymen of this land give attention.

TWELVE English clergymen have in one month joined the Church of Rome. It is thought the entire ritualistic portion of the English Church will ultimately be absorbed by the Church of Rome.

A PIOUS deacon in good standing in the Methodist church in Gouverneur, N. Y., is charged with the seduction of a young woman, eighteen years of age, in the same church. Gouverneur is getting its name up for scandals of this kind.

AMERICAN live cattle are arriving in London great numbers. One thousand reached there on one day, and the London Graphic says that some of them were so "mountainous that they might be made fit subjects of decent itinerant shows."

THE second person to be punished in Virginia under the new law re-establishing the whipping-post was a white girl of seventeen. She received twenty-five lashes on her bare back, in the Elizabeth City Court House, at the hands of a negro constable.

THE yield of the Consolidated Virginia mine for the year ending June 30, 1878, was 187,572 tons and 1,600 pounds of ore, which produced bullion to the value of $15,468,915.50. The California mine yielded 222,276 tons of ore, producing $17,649,329.42 of bullion.

CIRCUSES have escaped lately, but the lightning is going for the gospel and Sunday-school tents and churches as though the Almighty was recklessly trying to bankrupt the insurance companies. Who ever heard of a theater being struck by lightning?

PETER'S pence come in so sparingly as to cause serious concern at the Vatican. Pilgrimages, so fruitful under Pius IX., will, therefore, again be resorted to. Four will set out from France next autumn, two from Spain, one Carlist and one Alfonsist, and one from Belgium.

A PRESBYTERIAN has issued a book called "Baptism in a Nutshell." A Baptist paper jocosely remarks the appropriateness of this for Presbyterian brethren, as a nutshell will hold enough water for purposes of sprinkling. The Baptist, however, prefers "Baptism in the Baptistery."

PEOPLE do not generally associate wealth with British Colonial bishoprics, but there are exceptions to every rule. Bishop Tyrell of Newcastle, New South Wales, announces that he has bequeathed $1,250,000 for various purposes, including an endowment of $500,000 for the clergy in that diocese.

PARIS green used by a farmer in his potato field came near destroying a picnic party near Ottawa. They had their luncheon spread on a grassy plot in an adjoining field, and the wind blew a quantity of the poison over the eatables. At one time it was thought that not one of the party would recover.

THE city clergyman who told the singers in a country choir that the angels ought to come down from heaven and wring their necks, was considered to have no music in his soul. The stout soprano said she would like to go for him and wring his neck without calling for the assistance of any of the angels.

EACH convict in the State prison at Concord is allowed to take one religious paper. More than one hundred subscribe to the Boston Pilot. The Pilot is a Catholic paper, and the fact that so many of the convicts choose it is a pretty good indication of the source whence offenders against the laws come.

THE conundrum about the pins is well enough; but who breaks all the needles? A single factory in Redditch, England, turns out between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 of them each week, or about 3 0,000,000 a year, which is equal to one-third of the population of the globe. With all the factories of the world going, who breaks these billions of needles?

THERE is a tradition in the East that one of the tests by which the Queen of Sheba tried to prove the wisdom of Solomon was by placing on a table before her two bouquets, one of natural, the other of artificial flowers, and requiring that he should distinguish the one from the other; whereupon the wisest man ordered the windows to be thrown open, and in came the bees.

AS THE Rev. R. W. Pearson is allowed to retain his pastorate of the Fourth Baptist Church in Pittsburgh, a number of the members of that church who do not believe in him have withdrawn and organized a new church. They meet in the old Union Church in Grant street, and take its name. This is an instance when a decided criminal is countenanced and sustained by the church.

IT is said that the Rev. C. A. Kendrick, who was tried in Columbus for seduction, and who recently figured in Cincinnati again, has written to some friends who stood by him in his hour of trial, confessing fully his guilt in both Columbus and Cincinnati. The letter was read to the church in Columbus, and the brethren who received it confessed that they had been deceived.—Savannah News.

A COUNTRY deacon went, on a free ticket, to a circus entertainment. His pastor remonstrated with him on the wickedness of so doing. But he made answer: "Why, you see, pastor, I had a dead-head ticket, and I thought it my bounden duty to go and keep somebody out of that seat who might have been harmed by the circus." The pastor accepted the deacon's explanation as about half satisfactory.

A HORRIBLE murder was committed recently at Neriad, in India. A religious mendicant and fanatic seized a boy from among several of his playfellows and stabbed him in the throat. The murderer made no resistance, but calmly told his capturers that the boy was an enemy of his god Rama, and he was moved by the god to kill him. Supposed enemies of the gods have ever been treated with similar injustice.

THE POPE'S LATEST UTTTRANCE.—In the Consistory held in Rome on Monday, July 15th, the Pope, speaking with evident emotion, said he found himself environed on all sides by difficulties which he could have overcome had the Sacred College given him constant and loyal support. Nothing was to be expected from the monarchs and Governments of to-day, those whose intentions were good being powerless to execute them. The Church must therefore confide in her own strength, fighting unflinchingly and without truce.

A MINISTER'S CONFIDENCE IN MANKIND.—One of our exchanges states that it knows a minister who says he has a sermon that he has been occasionally preaching for many years. When he was a very young man it began: "I have all confidence in mankind." Some years later it commenced: "I have some confidence in mankind." In later life it began: "I have little or no confidence in mankind." The clergyman's change of views is explained by the fact that he ran for Congress, was elected, and served a term in the House of Representatives. It is curious how, as we fail in the objects of our ambition, we lose confidence in our fellow-beings.

THE great engineering work known as the Sutro Tunnel, in Nevada, is completed, after nine years of steady labor in the face of the most serious natural difficulties and the most uncompromising opposition on the part of great silver-mine owners. The tunnel is nearly four miles in length, and for a long time after it was begun it advanced at the rate of only twenty-eight feet a month. It is expected to keep the silver mines of the Comstock lode clear of water, and to bring into market millions of dollars' worth of low-grade ores, the mining of which has heretofore been unprofitable. The cost of the work has been about $4,000,000.

THE Rev. Dr. Schaff is visiting in Utah. He says that some of the unbelievers there regard Mormonism as steadily increasing and consolidating, while others see disintegration and growing Infidelity. He thinks that most Mormons are living in monogamy, although they hold to the doctrine of polygamy. The following is Dr. Schaff's prophecy as to Mormonism: "It has been nursed into power by cruel persecution, and the fire of fanaticism and material self-interest may keep it up for a considerable time; but it can scarcely be expected that as a religious and polygamous system it will be able to resist much longer the pressure of the surrounding civilization and churches."

ANOTHER of the minor planets discovered by Prof. Peters at Clinton, N. Y., brings up their whole number to 188, nine of which have been found since the beginning of the year, and sixteen during the last eleven months. Nos. 173, 177, and 178 have been named Ino, Irma, and Belisana, while three of last year's planets are still without names. Of the nine planets found since the beginning of the present year, No. 180, discovered by Perrotin at Toulouse on Jan. 29, has received the name Garuma; No. 181, discovered by Cottenot at Marsailles on Feb. 2, the name Eucharis. Of the three planets, 182, 183, and 184, found by Palisa at Pola in February, only the last has yet got a name, Dejopeja.

DR. W. FARR, in a letter on the causes of death in England and Wales, printed with the Registrar-General's annual report, just issued, says that alcohol has undoubtedly a medicinal effect in many maladies; it stimulates the fainting heart after shocks of every kind. Port wine is a potent remedy in fevers; instead of raising, it reduces the burning heat of the blood and calms the delirium of the brain. Alcohol appears to arrest the action of zymotic diseases as it prevents weak wines from fermenting. Like camphor, alcohol preserves animal matter; this is not now disputed. Dr. Farr invites the attention of those who have portrayed the bad effects of alcohol to consider whether it does not prevent the action of various infections on the temperate.

THE Rev. J. W. Taylor, for some time past pastor of the Baptist church at Great Bend, and formerly of Binghamton, has just been expelled from that denomination by the Ecclesiastical Council, assembled at Great Bend, for having more wives than the laws of the State of New York allow. He had previously been convicted of adultery by the criminal courts of Susquehanna county. Both of Taylor's wives were residents of this State. By his first wife he had four children, and by his present one. In defense Taylor claimed that he had obtained a decree of divorce from his first wife, she still being a resident of this State. The opinion prevailed, however, supported by very good evidence, that the bill of divorce produced was a forged one. Taylor and his second wife are now living under the same roof, but he claims not as man and wife. He is a man of fine talents, and, were it not for his overreaching tendency toward Mormon practices, might be appreciated and successful.—Ex.

THE REMAINS OF A MASTODON FOUND IN A CAVE AT MOUNT ARARAT, PA.—It having been announced to-day (July 27th) that the fossil remains of a mastodon had been found in a cave near the railway station at Mount Ararat, on the Jefferson branch of the Erie road, hundreds of persons, both on foot and in carriages, visited the scene. It seems that some workmen, while excavating at the point named, came upon what they at first thought to be part of the tusk of an elephant. It was taken to a naturalist who lives in the neighborhood, and he pronounced it to be the tooth of a mastodon. The workmen at once returned to their task, and under the direction of the naturalist and an antiquarian whom he summoned from Carbondale, the search was prosecuted until nearly midnight, by which time nearly the entire skeleton of the monster was unearthed, and is now on exhibition at the opening of the cave. The jawbone is four feet long and thirteen inches thick; the vertebræ, twenty-three feet eight inches long; knee-cap eighteen inches in length and nine and a half inches in width at the narrowest point; thigh bones six and a quarter feet long; and the bones from the knee to the foot seven feet in length. It is said that the skeleton will be boxed and shipped to the Smithsonian Institution.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

This, my dear readers, is a woman's story, and it is of a woman's grief, therefore, that we have drawn the most vivid picture—and no ideal one, either, strange as it may read. Let the loving, tender mother who has passed through some fiery ordeal record faithfully her heart's emotions during her trial hours, and she will find the picture all too feebly drawn and too dimly colored. She will recognize, with a kindred feeling of keen appreciativeness, the words of the poet—words that ran through and through the brain of poor Mrs. Darwin, time and again, as she fought through her great agony:

"Oh, my thoughts! why will ye rave thus wildly
In your pent-up cells, and fret your never Weary wings against your iron-bound prison?
Why will ye not be gentle, calm, and quiet,
Like my own outward self, and not foam like
The untiring sea against its rock-bound shores?

"Hard, nay, fiercely, have ye striven to burst
The bars of reason, and rove unfettered
Through delirious space, and pierce the regions
Of insanity; and hard, but vainly,
Have I pressed my hands upon my aching
Head, to still its burning throbbings; but as Well might I say to the soaring eagle,
'Cease thy flight!' or to the ocean, 'Cease thy murmurings!'
As to knell the agony of a half-crazed brain.
Rave on! rave on! my thoughts.
Ye can but drink bitter draughts of memory from the Anguish-riven past! Ye can but break what Is already broken—my bleeding heart!"

The Christian may boast of the consolations of religion when sorrow and tribulation come, and the Infidel may resort to philosophy; but Nature, ever imperious in her exactions, demands of each living soul her tribute of tears, sorrow, and wretchedness whenever an irretrievable loss, such as the sudden death of a cherished and beloved one, occurs, or when one dearer than the heart's blood steps aside from virtue's path and commits a dastard's crime, that shows an inward depravity of which we had not dreamed, or some weakness that could not withstand temptation.

"The heart that is soonest alive to the flowers
Is always the first to be touched by the thorns."

As we have remarked, the first great agony over, Mrs. Darwin resolutely set to work and conquered herself, subjected her heart to philosophy's stern rule, and came out from the furnace of affliction "all the purer from the fiercer fire." Always tender, gentle, and loving, she became now almost sweetly humble and angelic. She talked to her darling, in her moments of comparative ease, and told her what a joy and blessing she had always been, and how sweet and pleasant it would be in the lonely hours that must come, to think of the time when they were an unbroken household. Rose had now her own little world, and a husband, who claimed the first place in her thoughts. Willie, dear, good boy as he was and always would be, was no longer wholly hers. Another was winning him from the sweet old home-ties, and usurping his warmest, truest affections; and so, "Minnie, darling Minnie," she continued, "I have but you, of all my children, to look to as mine only. Yes, love is selfish, very selfish and exacting, but it is unutterably sweet and precious. We build us a shrine and place therein our idol, and worship it; but lo! a sudden unforseen calamity overtakes us, and the shrine at which we bent is empty. The jewel that lay upon it is stolen from us, and we are heart-broken. But oh! my baby-girl, amid all my affliction the dear, sweet thought comes to cheer me that no stain has ever rested upon the record-leaves of thy young life. And for thee death has no terrors, the future no fears. Whatever I may grieve for, I have this to cheer me—that thy life has been bright, fair, pleasant, and industriously happy. We have all done our duty by thee as well as we knew how, and so there will be no sting remaining to us of the thought of lost opportunities—of regrets that we had not done well by thee."

And Minnie would tell her mother how bright and happy her days had ever been, and how sweet and pleasant had been her dreams by night, and that, dearly as she had loved all the precious home circle, no one, not even her beloved father, had ever stolen so deeply into her heart as had her darling mamma. "You are my first love, and my last, and never seemed to me so good and lovable as you do now, in this sad parting hour. I know you will miss me more than all the rest can, but I am so glad I have seen the first bitterness of the dread parting pass away. The eyes of the dying see clearly, mother, and I have seen the terrible throes of anguish that have racked and tortured you, till my heart has bled for you. But oh! I am so glad to see the beautiful calm resignation that has taken their place, and rejoice to feel that the bitterness of death is over, and you can bid me good-bye with a patient composure and a quiet calmness."

One day a pious old lady came in. She had been a near neighbor to them and a constant visitor ever since they had moved to the Forks, but she had never talked to them about their peculiar doctrines, for she was a real lady, and therefore avoided what she feared might be an unpleasant subject. But she had become tenderly attached to Minnie, whose bright, girlish, loving ways always attracted the old. As she sat by Minnie's side, gazing upon the fair young face that was so soon to be shut out from her gaze, she could no longer restrain her anxiety, and so she said, "Minnie, my dear girl, I have a duty to perform, and must beg your pardon if I offend you. I cannot feel conscience-clear if I do not say a few words to you on the one vital subject that is so important to us all. I must ask you if you do not have some fears, some dread of what eternity may have in store for you. I know your family do not believe in God or the holy Bible, but hitherto they have all been well and strong, and have felt, perhaps, sufficient unto themselves; but now that you are so soon to meet the great Judge of all the earth, does not your heart sink within you at the thought of what may be? Oh, my beloved young friend, can you not, here on your dying bed, confess Christ and accept of his mercy? I cannot bear to think of what your fate may be should you go thus unbelieving and uncaring into that dread presence 'who judgeth the quick and the dead.'"

"Dear grandma," said Minnie, who always delighted in pet names for her chosen friends, "dear grandma, I am not at all afraid to pass out into the 'unknown dark.' It is only a going to sleep forever, instead of for a few hours, as I have hitherto done. Should you assure me that there was a dinotherium in our cellar, I should not feel a bit more sure you were deceived—nay, not as certain of it as I am that the whole system of Christian mythology is a myth and a fable. I would not hurt your feelings, my dear old friend, but I speak thus plainly so that you may understand what I mean. It would be just as impossible for you to convince me of the truth of all the Christian myths as it would for me to convince you that the old Greek and Roman deities ever existed, or still exist; that on the summit of the snow-clad mountain of Olympus dwelt Jupiter, or Jove, the supreme god of the heathens—the governor of heaven and earth—and his beautiful wife Juno, the peerless queen of heaven and the mother-protectress of all womankind; Apollo, the god of life, light, and the arts; Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, who sprang from the head of Jupiter ('a goddess armed,' and wiser than any other of her kind); and fair Ceres, 'the goddess of grist;' Diana, who 'wouldn't be kissed;' and all the rest of the long train of once-worshiped beings, who ate ambrosia, drank nectar, and lived, loved, and married, gossiped, warred, and hated, just as mortal men and women do. Our classical poems and all ancient history are full of the sayings and doings of these gods; and why should you claim for your mythology implicit belief, and not accord it to this older mythology, which had a longer existence and a greater train of believers than yours has, or will ever have? Dear grandma, I know your faith is dear to you, and I do not want to shake it, but I do want to show you that for me it has no shadow of ground for belief. I want to show you that I do not reject it out of a spirit of bravado, which would ill become me here in my last hours as a dweller with you, but that I have carefully revolved the whole subject in my mind, and am satisfied that all religions are only myths and superstitions; that matter, with its forces, is the all in all. I have no more fear or thought of the future than you would have of going into your bedchamber to-night and lying down to sleep. You would not believe it if some one were to solemnly assure you that you would awake in the morning in a land where elfs, fairies, and spirits do abide, or that you would find yourself in Pluto's dreary realm, where the unhappy shades were once supposed to wander. I know there is much that is beautiful and good in all these mythologies—all religions have the element of goodness in them; but in time all are outgrown, are cast off like old clothes, and the truth and goodness that was embodied in them are transferred to their successor, and from this new favorite on to the next; and so it will be through all the ages to come. No system of ethics, philosophy, or religion can stand forever, because none of them are entirely true or perfect. You may wonder, my dear old friend, that a girl like me should talk so earnestly about things such as these; but we (our family) all love mythology as a science; we like to trace the growth and development of the different nations through their mythologies or beliefs. Perhaps you are too old to change your opinions, or to care to do so; but, if at any time you do want to read up the subject of ancient faiths, father will give you some books, and aid your researches after truth. I thank you for your love and kindness, and hope you will not think hard of me for my plain talk. I have said what I have to you because you are a good woman, and when people ask you how I, the daughter of the noted Infidel Mr. Darwin, and myself always an Infidel, died, you will tell them the real truth, and not change, or misrepresent my words."

All this was spoken at intervals, as Minnie felt strength to talk; and we have here registered it as proof that no faith is easier to live by than faith in what is seen and known—nor, consequently, to die by.

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

Unfortunately I cannot here follow in detail the various exceedingly interesting parallels and analogies which occur between the formation of the most perfect anorgana, the crystals, and the formation of the simplest organisms, the Monera, and their next kindred forms. For this I must refer to a minute comparison of organisms and anorgana which I have carried out in the fifth chapter of my General Morphology (Gen. Morph. i, 111–160). I have there shown in detail that there exist no complete differences between organic and inorganic natural bodies, neither in respect to form and structure, nor in respect to matter and force; and that the actually existing differences are dependent upon the peculiar nature of the carbon; and that there exists no insurmountable chasm between organic and inorganic nature. We can perceive this most important fact very clearly if we examine and compare the origin of the forms in crystals and in the simplest organic individuals. In the formation of crystal individuals, two different counteracting formative tendencies come into operation. The inner constructive force, or the inner formative tendency, which corresponds to the Heredity of organisms, in the case of the crystal is the direct result of its material constitution or of its chemical composition. The form of the crystal, so far as it is determined by this inner original formative tendency, is the result of the specific and definite way in which the smallest particles of the crystallizing matter unite together in different directions according to law. That independent inner formative force, which is directly inherent in the matter itself, is directly counteracted by a second formative force. The external constructive force, or the external formative tendency, may be called Adaptation in crystals as well as in organisms. Every crystal individual during its formation, like every organic individual, must submit and adapt itself to the surrounding influences and conditions of existence of the outer world. In fact, the form and size of every crystal is dependent upon its whole surroundings, for example, upon the vessel in which the crystallization takes place, upon the temperature and the pressure of the air under which the crystal is formed, upon the presence or absence of heterogeneous bodies, etc. Consequently, the form of every single crystal, like the form of every single organism, is the result of the interaction of two opposing factors—the inner formative tendency, which is determined by the chemical constitution of the matter itself, and the external formative tendency, which is dependent upon the influence of surrounding matter. Both these constructive forces interact similarly also in the organism, and, just as in the crystal, are of a purely mechanical nature and directly inherent in the substance of the body. If we designate the growth and the formation of organisms as a process of life, we may with equal reason apply the same term to the developing crystal. The teleological conception of nature, which looks upon organisms as machines of creation arranged for a definite purpose, must logically acknowledge the same also in regard to the forms of crystals. The differences which exist between the simplest organic individuals and inorganic crystals are determined by the solid state of aggregation of the latter, and by the semi-fluid state of the former. Beyond that the causes producing form are exactly the same in both. This conviction forces itself upon us most clearly, if we compare the exceedingly remarkable phenomena of growth, adaptation, and the "correlation of parts" of developing crystals with the corresponding phenomena of the origin of the simplest organic individuals (Monera and cells). The analogy between the two is so great that, in reality, no accurate boundary can be drawn. In my General Morphology I have quoted in support of this a number of striking facts (Gen. Morph. i, 146, 156, 158).

If we vividly picture to ourselves this "unity of organic and inorganic nature," this essential agreement of organisms and anorgana in matter, form, and force, and if we bear in mind that we are not able to establish any one fundamental distinction between these two groups of bodies (as was formerly generally assumed), then the question of spontaneous generation will lose a great deal of the difficulty which at first seems to surround it. Then the development of the first organism out of inorganic matter will appear a much more easily conceivable and intelligible process than has hitherto been the case, whilst an artificial absolute barrier between organic or animate, and inorganic or inanimate nature was maintained.

In the question of spontaneous generation, or archigony, which we can now answer more definitely, it must be borne in mind that by this conception we understand generally the non-parental generation of an organic individual, the origin of an organism independent of a parental or producing organism. It is in this sense that on a former occasion I mentioned spontaneous generation (archigony) as opposed to parental generation or propagation (tocogony). In the latter case the organic individual arises by a greater or less portion of an already existing organism, separating itself and growing independently (Gen. Morph. ii, 32).

In spontaneous generation, which is often also called original generation (generatio spontanea, æquivoca, primaria, etc.) we must first distinguish two essentially different kinds, namely, autogeny and plasmogeny. By autogeny we understand the origin of a most simple organic individual in an inorganic formative fluid, that is, in a fluid which contains the fundamental substances for the composition of the organism dissolved in simple and loose combinations (for example, carbonic acid, ammonia, binary salts, etc.). On the other hand, we call spontaneous generation plasmogeny when the organism arises in an organic formative fluid, that is, in a fluid which contains those requisite fundamental substances dissolved in the form of complicated and fluid combinations of carbon (for example, albumen, fat, hydrate of carbon, etc.). (Gen. Morph. i, 174, ii, 33.)

Neither the process of autogeny, nor that of plasmogeny, has yet been directly observed with perfect certainty. In early, and also in more recent times, numerous and interesting experiments have been made as to the possibility or reality of spontaneous generation. Almost all these experiments refer not to autogeny, but to plasmogeny, to the origin of an organism out of already formed organic matter. It is evident, however, that this latter process is only of subordinate interest for our history of creation. It is much more important for us to solve the question, "Is there such a thing as autogeny? Is it possible that an organism can arise, not out of pre-existing organic, but out of purely inorganic, matter?" Hence we can quietly lay aside all the numerous experiments which refer only to plasmogeny, which have been carried on very zealously during the last ten years, and which for the most part have had a negative result. For even supposing that the reality of plasmogeny were strictly proved, still autogeny would not be explained by it.

The experiments on autogeny have likewise as yet furnished no certain and positive result. Yet we must at the outset most distinctly protest against the notion that these experiments have proved the impossibility of spontaneous generation in general. Most naturalists who have endeavored to decide this question experimentally, and who, after having employed all possible precautionary measures, under well-ascertained conditions, have seen no organisms come into being, have straightway made the assertion, on the ground of these negative results: "That it is altogether impossible for organisms to come into existence by themselves without parental generation." This hasty and inconsiderate assertion they have supported by the negative results of their experiments, which, after all, could prove nothing except that, under these or those highly artificial circumstances created by the experimenters themselves, no organism was developed. From these experiments, which have been for the most part made under the most unnatural conditions, and in a highly artificial manner, we can by no means draw the conclusion that spontaneous generation in general is impossible. The impossibility of such a process can, in fact, never be proved. For how can we know that in remote primeval times there did not exist conditions quite different from those at present obtaining, and which may have rendered spontaneous generation possible. Indeed, we can even positively and with full assurance maintain that the general conditions of life in primeval times must have been entirely different from those of the present time. Think only of the fact that the enormous masses of carbon which we now find deposited in the primary coal mountains were first reduced to a solid form by the action of vegetable life, and are the compressed and condensed remains of innumerable vegetable substances, which have accumulated in the course of many millions of years. But at the time when, after the origin of water in a liquid state on the cooled crust of the earth, organisms were first formed by spontaneous generation, those immeasurable quantities of carbon existed in a totally different form, probably for the most part dispersed in the atmosphere in the shape of carbonic acid. The whole composition of the atmosphere was therefore extremely different from the present. Further, as may be inferred upon chemical, physical, and geological grounds, the density and the electrical conditions of the atmosphere were quite different. In like manner the chemical and physical nature of the primeval ocean, which then continuously covered the whole surface of the earth as an uninterrupted watery sheet, was quite peculiar. The temperature, the density, the amount of salt, etc., must have been very different from those of the present ocean. In any case, therefore, even if we do not know anything more about it, there remains to us the supposition, which can at least not be disputed, that at that time, under conditions quite different from those of to-day, a spontaneous generation, which now is perhaps no longer possible, may have taken place.

But it is necessary to add here that, by the recent progress of chemistry and physiology, the mysterious and miraculous character which at first seems to belong to this much disputed and yet inevitable process of spontaneous generation, has been to a great extent, or almost entirely, destroyed. Not fifty years ago, all chemists maintained that we were unable to produce artificially in our laboratories any complicated combination of carbon, or so-called "organic combination." The mystic "vital force" alone was supposed to be able to produce these combinations. When, therefore, in 1828, Wohler, in Gottingen, for the first time refuted this dogma, and exhibited pure "organic" urea, obtained in an artificial manner from a purely inorganic body (cyanate of ammonium), it caused the greatest surprise and astonishment. In more recent times, by the progress of synthetic chemistry, we have succeeded in producing in our laboratories a great variety of similar "organic" combinations of carbon, by purely artificial means—for example, alcohol, acetic acid, formic acid. Indeed, many exceedingly complicated combinations of carbon are now artificially produced, so that there is every likelihood, sooner or later, of our producing artificially the most complicated, and at the same time the most important of all, namely, the albuminous combinations, or plasma-bodies. By the consideration of this probability, the deep chasm which was formerly and generally believed to exist between organic and inorganic bodies is almost or entirely removed, and the way is paved for the conception of spontaneous generation.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The advocates of Christianity would certainly find no nation in the nineteenth century entirely civilized, if they made the absence of great evils and wrongs, an indispensable condition of civilization. The practice however, of theologians, of raking together all the crimes and vices of pagan nations, and contrasting them with the virtues of Christian lands, in order to show the indebtedness of the world to their faith, is quite as unfair as would be an effort to show the superiority of pagan Rome over modern nations, by drawing dark pictures of the latter without one bright spot, and dwelling in contrast, on the noble lives, the sublime sayings, and the splendid achievements which have shed an undying lustre on the old pagan nation.

Nor is it any proof of the enlightening influence of Christianity that in many respects we are, in this age, in advance of the Greeks. It would be strange, indeed, if in more than 2,000 years, no nations had arisen, able, with the rich heritage Greece and Rome left to the world, to add to the achievements of those nations, and to advance beyond the position which they occupied.

The clergy as a class, have used all their influence to make the uneducated masses believe that Pagan antiquity was without any firm principles of morality, and that the beautiful precepts found in the New Testament were taught by Jesus for the first time. Nothing could be farther from the truth. There is not one moral precept in the New Testament which was not taught ages before Jesus lived. The doctrine of love, which by many is considered the chief merit of the "system" of Jesus, was taught by Plato with as much clearness and emphasis as by the reformer of Nazareth. "Love," says the great teacher of the Academy, "is peace and good will among men, calm upon the waters, repose and stillness in the storm, and balm of sleep in sadness."

"Platonic love," is a phrase with which all are familiar. But this sentiment was not confined to philosophers or poets, among the ancients. It is as old as human society, and has been exhibited wherever mothers have caressed their children, or friends have imperiled their lives in aiding one another; wherever patriots have died for country, or philanthropists for the good of the race.

It is a great mistake to suppose, as many Christians believe, that Jesus was the first to proclaim what is known as the "Golden Rule." Scholars have frequently pointed out that the sentiment was distinctly expressed, in almost the very words ascribed to Jesus, by Confucius in China, Isocrates in Greece, and Hillel in Judea.

The disposition to act toward our fellows kindly and justly as we would have them act toward us, is found even among savages, although of course their ideas of justice are not as correct or as well defined as among more enlightened minds. In Egypt and India, in Greece and Rome, all the essential principles of morality were understood as they are to-day, and truthfulness, honesty, friendship, and love were esteemed as virtues as they are among us.

The doctrine of "the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," which the clergy are still in the habit of claiming as a distinctively Christian doctrine, was taught by philosophers and poets, and understood to some extent by the people, long before the time of Jesus.

"One who knows himself," says Cicero, "will feel that he is a citizen of the whole world holding all united by nature his own relatives" (De Legib. i, 22, 23). Numerous passages of a similar character could be given from the same author. The Stoics taught the same doctrine clearly and unequivocally. There is hardly an author of the Augustan age from whose works extracts cannot be gleaned inculcating the equality and brotherhood of man. We can go much farther back, and find the doctrine taught quite as plainly. Aratus, a poet of Celicia, who flourished 279 B. C. says,

> "Jove's presence fills all space, upholds this ball;
> All need his aid; his power sustains us all,
> For we his offspring are." —(Phenomena, book v, p. 5).

Cleanthes, a Stoic philosopher and poet, a pupil of Zeno and who lived from 330 to 240 before Christ, expressed the same sentiment in his famous "Hymn to Jupiter" as follows:

> "Great and divine father whose names are many,
> But who art one and the same unchangeable and almighty power;
> O thou supreme author of nature,
> That govern'st by a single unerring law;
> Hail King!
> For thou art able to enforce obedience from all frail mortals
> Because we are thy offspring,
> The image and echo only of thy eternal voice."

Of this poem, from which I have given but a brief extract, Doddridge says, "It contains nothing unworthy of a Christian, or I had almost said, of an inspired pen." It is generally thought by scholars that Cleanthes is the poet from whom Paul quoted, in his address to the Athenians, when he said, "As certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring" (Acts xvii, 28).

The forgiveness of enemies was enjoined by teachers long before the Christian era, and Pagan antiquity is full of instances of magnanimity to fallen foes, which many of us have not the lofty virtue to imitate.

The duty of self-examination is another doctrine of which it is claimed that Jesus was the first teacher; but the fact is, this was known to the ancient Pagans, and Plato and Zeno taught that men should study their dreams, on the ground that they often reveal the latent tendencies of their dispositions. "Pythagoras," says Lecky, "urged his disciples daily to examine themselves when they retired to rest, and his practice soon became a recognized part of Pythagorean discipline. It was introduced into Rome with the school before the close of the Republic" (Hist. Morals, vol. i, p. 262).

Some writers, seeing the impossibility of disproving the existence of an elevated morality among the ancient Pagans, have endeavored to prove that they obtained it from Jewish sources. Watson and others have attempted to trace the Theism of Plato, as well as the best part of the moral teachings of the Greeks generally, to Judea. This notion, first maintained by the Christain Fathers, is now wholly abandoned by scholars that have investigated the subject. "The statement of Justin Martyr and Tertullian, that Pagan philosophers borrowed from Jewish prophets, and the supposition that Plato had access to a Greek version of the Old Testament in Egypt, are," says the Christian writer, Rev. Dr. Crocker, "obviously mere suppositions by which over-zealous Christians sought to maintain the supremacy of the Scriptures. The travels of Pythagoras are altogether mythical, the mere invention of Alexandrian writers who believed that all wisdom flowed from the East. That Plato visited Egypt at all rests on the single authority of Strabo, who lived at least four centuries after Plato, and there is no trace in his own works of Egyptian research. His pretended travels in Phœnicia, where he gained from the Jews a knowledge of the true God, are more unreliable still. Plato lived in the fourth century before Christ (430 B. C.), and there is no good evidence of the existence of a Greek version of the Old Testament before that of the Seventy (Septuagint) made by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, B. C. 270. Jeremiah, the prophet of Israel, lived two centuries before Plato, consequently any personal interview between the two was simply impossible" (Christianity and Greek Philosophy, p. 476).

A strange notion, indeed, that the Greeks went to Judea to learn wisdom and virtue, when the Jews were an exceedingly illiterate people, and the moral character of their best men was immeasurably inferior to that of the Grecian philosophers.

"The Bible," says Albert Barnes, "came from a land undistinguished for literature; a land not rich in classical associations; a land not distinguished for pushing its discoveries into the regions of science. Chaldea had its observatories, and the dwellers there looked out on the stars and gave them names; Egypt had its temples, where the truths of science as well as the precepts of religion were committed to the sacred priesthood; Greece had academic groves; but Judea had neither. To such things the attention of the nation was never turned. We have all their literature, all their science, all their knowledge of art, and all this is in the Bible. Among the ancients they were regarded as a narrow-minded, a bigoted, a superstitious people" (Lectures on Ev. of Christianity, pp. 257–8).

It is hardly probable that the philosophers of Greece went to such a people to get their systems of philosophy and their code of ethics.

But even if this preposterous claim could be sustained, it would now fail to serve the advocates of Christianity; for the same moral teachings to which we have referred, have been traced back to a period, compared with which the oldest of the Bible writers are unquestionably modern. The researches of the past few years in the history of ancient Egypt and ancient Judea, have made sad havoc with the whimsical theories of old theological writers.

It is, I think, sufficiently evident from what has been said, that whatever has been the influence of Christianity, genius, moral worth, and national as well as individual greatness existed ages before it appeared, and where the Bible was never known. It follows clearly enough that civilization is not dependent upon the Christian system or the Jewish or Christian sacred scriptures. There is, therefore, no reason for the belief so frequently expressed, that the world would go back into barbarism if regard for the Bible as a work of divine origin and authority were destroyed.

NO. XXIV.

CHANGES IN THE EARTH'S SURFACE.

My Dear Readers: In connection with the subject considered in my last, it may not be improper to call your attention, in this letter, to the great changes which have constantly been taking place in the surface of your globe. These have arisen from a variety of causes which have been continually in operation. What may be considered as the first cause is the gradual contraction or shrinking of the earth from the radiation of its heat. Long ages ago the earth was less dense than it is at the present time, and consequently occupied a greater amount of space. When bodies possess a high degree of heat, they are greatly expanded, and as that heat is dissipated or lessened the expansiveness is lessened, and the matter becomes more compact. This law has been in operation on the globe for hundreds of thousands of years. You know how the skin of an apple becomes wrinkled as the apple itself dries up and shrinks in size. The surface of the earth has been affected in a manner not unlike the skin of the apple. Unevennesses have taken place, and the surface has literally become wrinkled; it has risen in some places and become depressed in others, and this action has been kept up more or less, without cessation or interruption, and the effects are perceptible in various parts of the globe, some portions having risen and others having become depressed. What are now the deserts of Sahara and Cimbri were once beds of the ocean. And where your western prairies, for hundreds and thousands of square miles, now produce a teeming growth of wheat and corn and grass, was once covered by the salt water of the ocean. Hills and elevations in which sea-shells and marine fossils are found, and which were once at the water level, are now several hundred feet above the same level.

There is hardly a shore in Europe that does not give this class of evidence. The mouths of the rivers are totally unlike what they were three thousand years ago, and some have become almost obliterated. Islands, like Rhodes, have risen from the bottom of the ocean. The North Adriatic, once a deep gulf, has now become shallow. Leaning towers and inclining temples have sunk with the settling of the earth in other localities. The Scandinavian Peninsula furnishes an instance of these varying motions or changes in elevation; the northern part has been gradually rising at the rate of four feet a century, the southern part, on the contrary, experiencing a slow depression.

These slow movements, as I said, have been in operation for almost numberless ages. Since what geologists call the tertiary period two-thirds of Europe has been lifted above the surface of the sea. The Norway coast has been elevated no less than six hundred feet; the Alps have been upheaved from two to three thousand feet; the Apennines have experienced an elevation of two thousand feet in places. The country between Mont Blanc and Vienna has in this way been raised even since the adjacent seas have been peopled with species of animals still in existence.

The continent of Asia, or parts of it at least, have been elevated in a similar manner. Even the Old Himalaya Mountains themselves were once elevated from the bed of the ocean. In some of their highest peaks are fossil remains of cretaceous formations, showing conclusively that they were once below the surface of the ocean. True, this took place far back in the by-gone eras of the past, but it was long since certain other elevations took place on your own continent. At the falls of the Ohio River, at low water, have been found, by an eminent geologist from Europe, a fine display of the remains of a coral reef, formed by zoophytes which flourished in a sea of an earlier date than the carboniferous period, which is the age of the Alps and the Himalayas. The coral reef around the falls of the Ohio were a formation of the tertiary period, while the cretaceous formations of the elevated positions of the Alps and the Himalayas belonged to the carboniferous period—a much later era—thus proving that America is older than Europe or Asia. On the western coast of Greenland, for more than six hundred miles, the land is slowly sinking. Ancient buildings on low, rocky islands and on the shores of the mainland, have been gradually submerged; and experience has taught the aboriginal Greenlander not to build his hut near the water's edge. By measurement by means of poles planted in the edge of the water it has been found, during the last two hundred years, that the land has been steadily but slowly sinking. Many of the poles thus planted many years ago are now entirely below the water.

At Spitzbergen, on the other hand, drift-wood and bones of whales have been found several miles inland, thirty or forty feet above high water mark, showing that that island has been considerably elevated.

In England and Scotland the land has in many places been rising for ages, which is proved by the elevated sea-beaches found in many places.

Probably few better evidences of the elevation of portions of the earth's crust can be found than that of Jupiter Serapis at Puzzuoli. Originally the temple had twenty-four granite columns and twenty-two of marble, each hewn from a single stone. Three of these columns remain erect, and the tallest is forty-two feet high. They are smooth and uninjured to the height of twelve feet, but above that are bands of holes nine feet wide, made by the boring of sea muscles, some of the shells still being found there. Above these bands the columns are smooth to their summits. It is clear to the observer that the pillars were once below the level of the sea, their lower portions being protected by the rubbish, and since that time they have been elevated twenty-three feet without disturbing the columns.

The island of Newfoundland is also gradually rising out of the sea. In the neighborhood of Conception Bay large flat rocks exist over which schooners used to pass only thirty or forty years ago; now the water is hardly deep enough to allow a skiff to pass over them. The southern coast of Nova Scotia is also rising. Near Salmon River are bluffs fifty feet high containing shells, the most of which are of a similar character to those in the contiguous sea. At points on the St. Lawrence River below Quebec are old sea-beaches from fifty to three hundred feet above the present sea level.

There are many points in South America which show the same upward tendency, and where the ancient bed of the ocean has risen more than eighty feet, strata having been found at that height above the sea level containing sea-shells seaweed, etc. The same is true of many other parts of the globe, which I will not now detain you by enumerating.

In view of the endless changes that have been constantly and uninterruptedly taking place upon the surface of the globe, allow me to quote here an Arabian poem, translated from a writer of the seventh century of your era, and which has been also quoted by a distinguished scientist of your own time:

"I wandered by a goodly town
Beset with many a golden fair,
And asked, of one who gathered down
Large fruit, how long the town was there.
He spoke nor chose his hand to stay:
'The town has stood for many a day,
And will be here forever and aye.'

A thousand years went by, and then
I visited the place again;
No vestige of that town I traced.
But one poor swain his horn employed;
His sheep, unconscious, browsed and grazed.
I asked, 'When was the town destroyed?'
He spoke nor would his horn lay by:
'One thing may grow, and another die;
But I know nothing of towns; not I.'

A thousand years went by, and then
I wandered past the spot again.
There, in the deep of waters, cast
His nets a lonely fisherman;
And, as he drew them up at last,
I asked him how the lake began.
He looked at me, and laughed to say,
'The waters spring forever and aye,
And fish are plenty every day.'

A thousand years went by, and then
I saw the self same place again,
And, lo! a country wild and rude;
And, axe in hand, beside a tree,
The hermit of that solitude.
I asked how old the wood might be.
He said, 'I count not time at all;
A tree may rise, a tree may fall;
The forest overlives us all.'

A thousand years went by, and then
I went the same old round again;
And there a glorious city stood;
And 'mid tumultuous market-cry,
I asked, when rose the town where wood,
Pasture, and lake forgotten lie?
They heard me not, and little blame;
For them the world is as it came;
And all things must be still the same.

A thousand years shall pass, and then
I mean to try that road again."

If he makes that journey once more he may next time find the sea returned as at first, for thus goes the world. Two centuries see it not the same and scarcely any two years see it alike. It is ever changing. It has been so for hundreds of thousands of years and will continue in the same way for hundreds of thousands of years to come.

The second great agency which contributes largely towards changing the topography of the earth—the islands and continents—is the ceaseless energy of the waters of the ocean. The never-ending lashings of the waves are constantly wearing, washing, and bearing away the land from numerous parts of the earth to be deposited to form land anew in other localities. At Cape May, on your own coast, in sixteen years, by actual measurement, the sea encroached upon the land at the rate of nine feet a year. At Sullivan's Island, near Charleston, South Carolina, the water carried away a quarter of a mile in three years. Near Boston Harbor, the islands are rapidly wasting away under the influence of the Atlantic waves; and on one of them—Deer Island—an extensive wall of stone has been erected to arrest the work of destruction. It has been calculated that one thousand tons of earthy matter are transported from the coast of Long Island seaward.

On the other side of the Atlantic numerous instances are presented of the same character. North of Scotland the Orkney and Shetland Islands, though made of the hardest material, have been worn away to mere needles. On the coast of Durham, where magnesian limestone cliffs of the permian formation front the German Ocean, there are caves in great number made by the rolling waves. In times of storm the furious waves lift masses of these rocks weighing thousands of pounds and dash them as in sport, and with terrible force, against the cliffs, and break them in pieces. In this way very great inroads are made upon that coast. In Yorkshire the cliffs are crumbling away along its whole extent. At Whitby an old abbey stands perched on the cliff, which when built stood nearly two miles from the beach. Auburn, Hartburn, and Hyde were once towns on the coast of England, but the inexorable waves long since took them entirely away. At Owthorne the encroachment of the ocean is twelve feet per year. The cliffs of Norfolk and Suffolk are wearing away with great rapidity. The ancient villages of Shipden, Wimpwell, and Eccles long since were borne off by the waves. The entire site of the ancient town of Cromer has been submerged, and ships now pass over the place where the town once was. Dunwick, in Suffolk, was once a place of no little importance, containing at one time fifty-two churches and monasteries. One after another they were swallowed up by "old Ocean," and at one time four hundred houses were swallowed up by the waves. A wood once stood half a mile east of Dunwick, but now the site is a long way out in the ocean. The sea is now twenty-four feet deep where the town of Aldborough once stood.

At the mouth of the Thames, on the island of Shipley, the land has been washed away rapidly. One hundred years ago the church of Minster was in the center of the island; now it is near the coast. In another hundred years the island, six miles long by four in breadth, will have disappeared and will be known no more.

England once formed a part of the Continent, and that country was joined to France; but the ceaseless and ever-dashing waves cut through the British Channel, and now the countries are twenty miles apart. A similar class of results has taken place in Holland. North Friesland, six hundred years ago, was a flourishing district ten miles long and seven broad. Three hundred years later it was only four miles around. Two hundred years ago a flood passed over the entire island, and thirteen hundred houses, many churches, six thousand people, and fifty thousand head of cattle were borne away by the tireless waves. Three small islets only remain, and they are wasting away.

The question has been asked, "Is this to be the fate of the world? Must the hungry sea swallow up all, and the waves chant forever the funeral dirge of the lost, lost land?" No, this is not to be. The law of compensation rules in the universe. Checks and counterbalances will ever exist. More rapidly than the sea eats the land away in some places, it is forming and making anew in others.

The third agency that is most efficient in changing the topography of the earth is the action of the rills, creeks, and rivers that are constantly flowing from the mountain tops to the great fountains of the oceans, bearing along the oxidized and crumbling portions of rocks and soil, depositing the same in deltas and making new land. In this way the wastes are made up; and to-day there is a greater aggregate surface of dry land upon the earth than ever before. Every shower washes material down the hills into the plains, and thence it is eventually borne to the ocean.

Your Mississippi and Missouri rivers illustrate how this work is constantly being performed. Three thousand miles away up among the mountains, where those rivers begin to form, the turbid waters bear away the soil to deposit it in the Gulf of Mexico. Much of that low country has been filled up and made solid ground in that way, and now an alluvial plain or delta is forming extending for a long distance, and nearly a hundred miles in breadth, made up of the sediment brought down from the mountains three thousand miles distant. The land thus formed in the gulf amounts to some fifteen hundred square miles, and a mile is added to the product every century. The bar at the Southwest Pass advances into the gulf three hundred and forty feet per annum. The coarser sediment is deposited near the mouth and the finer portion is borne much further away. Much is deposited on the ocean bottom to enter again into the formation of rock, which with time and pressure is being accomplished.

It has been estimated that four billions cubic feet of mud are carried down by the Mississippi every year, or sufficient to cover a township six miles square to the depth of forty feet. It would take forty thousand locomotives, carrying a thousand tons a trip, and making a trip a week, to transport the amount of solid material this mighty river sweeps down suspended in its bosom.

The Amazon of South America carries down a still greater amount of sediment, but the Gulf Stream bears the most of it far out in the ocean. The Ganges and Brahmapootra, the two principal rivers in India, descending from the highest mountains in the world, and where the rain-fall is heavy, bear down with them an immense amount of solid material. The united deltas of these two rivers measure more than sixty thousand square miles. The deposit of sediment brought down by the Ganges alone is estimated to be seven thousand million tons per year—enough solid material to make a good-sized country every twelve months.

The Po and the Adige of Europe, flowing into the Adriatic Sea, or Gulf of Venice, have caused hundreds of miles of coast to encroach on the gulf from one to ten miles every thousand years. Thus the Gulf of Mexico, the Bay of Bengal, and the Gulf of Venice are gradually filling with solid material, and must ultimately largely become firm, tillable ground. In this way the delta of the Nile, or much of the land of Egypt, was built up, and the delta is still forming in the Mediterranean, borne down by the Nile from the distant mountains and high lands of Africa. And thus are the streams and rivers ever toiling, bearing on their bosoms the solid materials of which the mountains are composed, and depositing the same in bays and gulfs and oceans; and thus it will ever continue.

As an evidence of what the rivers are doing and the length of time they have been at work, let me call your attention to some of your own streams. The grand Niagara pours six hundred and seventy thousand tons of water over the precipice every minute, wearing the rock away at the rate of ten inches every year. At that rate, it has taken forty thousand years to cut away its deep channel seven miles in length.

Below the city of Rochester the Genesee has cut its channel out of the solid rock for seven miles; the rock, being of different degrees of hardness, has worn faster in some places than others, so that there are now three different cataracts, and miles apart. In New Mexico, Texas, Colorado, and California there are long, deep gulfs, called "canyons," where for days together the traveler can find no place to cross; and though the water is in sight, there is no way to obtain it. Grand Canyon, on Canadian River, is two hundred and fifty feet deep and fifty miles long. There is a canyon on Red River, in Texas, seventy miles long and from five hundred to eight hundred feet deep. In some places on the Colorado they are more than a thousand feet deep, in solid granite. Think of the length of time necessary to cut away such a mass of solid rock! Can you not easily perceive that your globe is many times more than six thousand years old?

But pardon me, dear readers, for detaining you so long. The subject possessing unusual interest, and I having so much I wished to say, the time passed almost unobserved.

Believe me, upon taking my leave for another week, to still be your steadfast friend,

LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

In a letter to M. Dumas, which was read at the Académie des Sciences in the early part of 1869, M. Janssen, whose researches in connection with the spectrum analysis have obtained great notoriety, supports this view by a summary of the knowledge hitherto acquired as to the constitution of the Sun. This communication, stated succinctly, shows that modern research, interpreted by M. Faye's theory, tends to the conclusion that the Sun is essentially a gaseous globe, with a temperature of its own so elevated that no substance or body can exist there, save in a very gasiform state. But it is known that gases, even when raised to a very high temperature, are but faintly luminous when they do not contain particles of a fixed body—that is to say, of one not reduced to gas. How, then, are we to explain the brilliancy of the Sun? In this way. The region in which the solar globe moves causes a diminution of temperature upon the surface of that luminary, sufficient to condense within it the gaseous elements and reduce them into solid dust. This dust, mixed up with the incandescent gases, gives them the effulgency and radiation which we perceive, just as carbon, lime, and magnesium impart the luminous property to the dull flames of our own gases.

Thus, by a relative decline of temperature, the gaseous globe is surrounded by a very luminous envelope; this is the photosphere, or visible part of the Sun—the Sun itself as it appears to the general public. In this photosphere are visible spots and rents which have attracted the careful attention of astronomers. These rents in the luminous envelope, the diameter of which is often double or treble that of the earth, enable us to ascertain that the central gaseous nucleus is relatively obscure; their motions have revealed the law of the superficial rotation of the Sun—a rotation the speed of which varies according to the latitudes—and thus have supplied us with one of the most striking proofs of the gaseous character of the sun.

It is the examination of the spots, too, that has led astronomers to admit the existence of an atmosphere around the luminous envelope. But the existence of this atmosphere, which has since been revealed by the phenomena of refraction noticed on the photosphere, and by the effects of absorption remarked upon the edges of the solar disk, was only guessed at, and its nature, its altitude, and its composition were the objects of the most contradictory statements. As to those singular luminous appendages or protuberances which have been observed during the latest total eclipses, absolutely nothing was known about them. Such was the state of things when the great eclipse of August 18, 1868, supplied the first opportunity for applying the new method of analysis to these phenomena.

Analysis of the light of these protuberances revealed, first of all, their character and their gaseous composition. These large appendages are almost exclusively composed of incandescent hydrogen. It has also been remarked that this hydrogen exists over the whole circumference of the Sun, and that the protuberances are but the more prominent parts of this hydrogenic atmosphere.

When this interesting memoir, here summarized, was read, M. Leverrier remarked that the theory which consisted in treating the Sun, in regard to its luminous portion, as an incandescent globe, covered with a small gaseous atmosphere, to which part of the phenomena observed upon its surface are attributable, has been established beyond the possibility of doubt by the observations taken during the total eclipse of 1860. The important point ascertained during the eclipse of 1868 is as to the nature of this atmosphere; and M. Janssen, by making it possible to observe, at any period, phenomena which had before been visible only at the moment of a general eclipse, had rendered a great service to science. Upon the same occasion, M. Leverrier read a memoir from M. Royet, in which it is shown that the yellow ray discovered by the spectrum analysis is visible upon the whole contour of the Sun; whence he concludes that the incandescent gas to which it corresponds is, upon the same principle as hydrogen, a constitutive element of the solar atmosphere. At the same time, we do not at present know what this gas is, for the ray in question does not coincide with the yellow ray of sodium.

XI.

The question naturally arises: Why is the temperature of the Sun so enormous? It may have been caused by the very force of the gravity which conjoined the elements that formed the central point of the solar system. In the first instance, the temperature thus mechanically acquired must have been much higher than it is at present, now that the Sun is getting cooler. At the same time, the diminution of its heat, great as it may be, is almost imperceptible to us, being, as it is, so gradual, and partially compensated by the transforming of a portion of the solar mass into various chemical combinations. It may also be that certain foreign bodies, attracted into the Sun, help to maintain its incessant combustion. There is a great variety of opinion as to the sum of the solar temperature, and it is very astonishing to find that the researches of the specialists lead them to such widely different conclusions. During the last few years much has been written upon this subject, and one of the most recent treatises is that of M. Vicaire, who points out that Father Secchi estimates the temperature at 10,000,000 degrees Cent., while M. Spœrer puts it at not more than 37,000. And if to these opinions I add that of M. Pouillet, who thinks that it is not less than 1,461 or more than 1,761 degrees, my readers will see that science has not yet reached any satisfactory conclusion in regard to this matter.

Col. Ingersoll's Views on Burns and Others.

The following account of Col. Ingersoll's departure for Europe on Saturday, the 3d inst., is from The Sun of the 4th:

Col. Bob Ingersoll leaned against the rail of the quarter-deck of the steamship Rhein, yesterday afternoon, placidly smoking and contemplating the hurly-burly of preparation for sailing. He wore an easy-fitting suit of blue flannel, and a white beaver was carelessly pushed back from his forehead. Mrs. Ingersoll and the Misses Ingersoll, blooming maidens—the youngest being an exact softened and colored likeness of her father—sat on a bench near by.

"I shall not lecture," he said, "in Europe. Most of our time will be spent in Scotland, for I go to Europe principally to inquire into the life of Robert Burns. I regard him as second only to Shakspere in poetry. Shakspere was the palace, but he was the cottage of poetry, and the houses between were not worth much. Then Burns was probably the stoutest enemy that Calvinism ever had. His 'Holy Willy's Prayer' is the best argument against Calvinism. I don't like Calvinism; it is hidebound, and a deal less attractive than Catholicism, which it was designed to supersede. Catholicism is willing to let you have a good time here below, if you pay for it; but Calvinism is not, whether you pay or not. The pithiest opinion that was ever expressed of Puritanism is attributed to Macaulay, when he said that the Puritans objected to bull-baiting, not because it was cruelty to the bulls, but because the spectators liked it. Now, I believe in enjoying this life reasonably, according to the means at my disposal, and I don't take stock in any creed that keeps us worrying about what is beyond. No one can know what is to come afterward. Why, it would be just as reasonable for me to worry myself about the future state as it would be for me to rush ashore, lay in a heavy stock of tales about appalling shipwrecks and the sufferings of shipwrecked men while clinging for their lives to spars and hencoops, and lose all the enjoyment that I expect to derive from the voyage in reading them. This is a sound and trim ship, and there's plenty of beer aboard—though, by the way, the only beverages that I enjoy are champagne and claret—and I don't propose to make myself miserable. I intend to learn German, and to be able to ask for whatever I want when I land. Oh, yes, we intend to visit the Exposition.

"From Paris we will probably go direct to Ayr, Burns' birthplace. I shall endeavor to find as many of the oldest inhabitants as possible. I may not be able to find out a great deal about him that is new, yet I may obtain new light upon parts of his history that will double their interest. Yes, I intend to lecture on Burns next winter. I think that he is in some quarters underrated because he did not have what is called a higher education. Now, my estimation of a higher education is that, excepting in rare cases, it crowds out whatever natural genius a man may be born with."

"Will you make any more speeches in the political field, Colonel, when you return?"

"I cannot say positively now whether I will or not. The party that is to carry the country in the future must do something for the workingmen. Their need is the vital demand of the hour. I think that a Government of the United States that cannot assure every industrious man a house of three or four rooms, a wife and three or four children, and plenty of food, clothing, and fuel, when we have millions upon millions of acres of land to yield food and articles of exchange with Europe, has no right to exist."

"Would you stump for Grant?"

"I don't believe that Grant will be the nominee of the Republican party for 1880. Hayes has made some people think of Grant favorably as compared with himself. Grant is 'the man on horseback, who rode before the man on crutches.' Hayes, through his weakness, has been Grant's best friend. I think that Blaine will be the strongest Republican candidate for the Presidency in 1880. He is a man who can talk to friends and enemies, and send them away with a clear understanding of how he stands toward them."

Here a shade settled upon the Colonel's jovial countenance, and the reporter, fancying that it arose from the Colonel's recollection of his latest relations with Mr. Hayes, ventured to ask:

"Colonel, have you seen Mr. Hayes recently?"

"No, sir, I have not," he answered very emphatically. "I did all that I could to elect him to the Presidency, but I have seen scarcely anything of him since he entered the White House. I called with some friends soon after his installation, and I said frankly, 'Mr. Hayes, I don't like your Southern policy. I approve the first part of it, the freeing of the States from military interference, but I don't think that you ought to desert Packard to conciliate the Southerners. I say now that no one can understand Hayes' arithmetic in his dealings with Packard. It is about as incomprehensible as the calculations that make John Sherman jubilant over his four per cent bonds. I read in a newspaper that $2,500,000 worth were taken in Wall street yesterday. This is one of the worst signs of the times. It looks like preparation for disaster. I fancy that men who intend to fail are giving money to their wives to buy these bonds, because they are low-priced and untaxable. Honest men don't rush forward to take four per cent interest on their money when they can get ten, with the best Western farms that the sun ever shone on as security."

"Do you believe, Colonel, that Mr. Hayes will be allowed to remain in the White House?"

"Whether he will or not, of course, depends upon the result of the investigation of the Potter Committee. If they clearly show that he was particeps criminis, undoubtedly he will be ousted. If I were in Congress I would certainly move to oust him if the committee's report satisfied me of his guilt. There is in this broad land enough big-hearted, whole-souled manliness to make it certain that if the report of the committee conclusively implicates him he will be handed outside of the White House in a very short time. The talk about revolution and Mexicanizing, if Hayes is put out of the White House, is bosh. I would like to know who would fire a gun for Hayes."

THE whole universe of matter is a great mundane psalm to celebrate the reign of Power, Law, and Mind. Fly through the solar system from remotest Neptune to the sun, study each planet, it is the same. Ask every little orange leaf, ask the aphis that feeds thereon, ask the insect corpses lying by millions in the dead ashes of the farmer's peat-fire, the remains of mollusks that gave up the ghost millions of years before man trod the globe, they all, with united voice, answer still the same, Power, law, mind. In all the space from Neptune to the sun, in all the time from the silicious shell to the orange leaf of to-day, there is no failure of that power, no break of that law, no cessation in its constant mode of operation, no error of that mind, whereof all space is here, all time is now. So the world is witness continually to power, to never-failing law, to mind that is everywhere. Look up and reverence; look down and trust. —Theodore Parker.

The Radical Pulpit.

The Consolations of Rationalism.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

Now, for the consolations of Rationalism. What are they? Let me frankly say that they are of a very robust and vigorous sort. They are not the consolations of idlers or mere sentimentalists or cowards, but of honest men and brave women, who face fortune and make the best of the world as they find it.

In the first place, we are released from the necessity of justifying the ways of God. That may not seem to be a very great gain, but it is an immense gain, not to be obliged to prove that everything is just and right, and good, and kind, and sweet in the world; to be released from the necessity of making constant apologies, of explaining, of getting up a grand philosophy upon which we can account for all the ugly and unpleasant experiences of life. This is a problem that has weighed upon the intellects of the thoughtful men of the world for thousands of years. What time it has taken up! What intellectual energy it has exhausted! What fountains of hope it has drawn dry! What spiritual vitality it has consumed! all of which are of immediate and vital consequence to the world, and all of which are thrown away.

Here is a man who has a theory, and his theory is that this is the best possible world; he therefore bends all his energies to prove that it is the best possible world. He puts the fairest construction upon the most desolating experiences, sees a variety of good in evil; says that evil is but the shadow of a cloud passing over the surface of the sun, that there is really no such thing as pain, or suffering, or sorrow; it is just as one happens to feel. This is a problem that is laid upon such men. I have known men who told me that their hearts came nigh breaking while they were endeavoring to prove that proposition. The Christian has it on his conscience to demonstrate the fact that an invisible stream of perfect grace flows into the believer's open heart—those who trust in Christ—keeping it always serene, and still pure, and sweet, under any of the exigencies of the world. What an undertaking is that? In the first place, those who are taught at all to make themselves examples of such a demonstration are exceedingly few. The great mass of mankind do not believe in Christ at all, have no such convictions, no such trust, no such hope; consequently no such expression as "saving grace." The great majority of mankind must be ruled out. And, then, can the Christian be sure that this small company of the elect are so perfect in their election that the stream of divine grace will inevitably descend into their hearts? Are they all true and faithful? Are they never untruthful? Do they pay their debts? Are none of them defaulters? Answer it who will; claim it who can, avouch it who dare. At all events, the Rationalist has no such task laid upon him. He takes the world as it is; he has no theory about it; he does not feel obliged to make it out better or worse than the facts warrant. He will make it out as well as he can; he will go behind the facts; he will seek to know something more about the treasures of the universe; he will try science; he will test philosophy; he will make the trained intellect groan under its task of study; but he will not explain, or apologize or vouch for things other than they are. And he will use all his physical and moral force to make things better than they are. This I, as a clergyman, can say is an enormous gain, for I recollect for how many years I, myself, staggered under this load, how I would go to the chambers of sorrow, to the houses of want, to the cells of crime, and as I looked upon the sad eyes of the mourner and pressed my bosom against that of the sufferer, I felt bound to say that things were right, that this thing had not befallen amiss, that there was no curse, that there was no evil. I bade farewell to that task long since, and now I take my moral patient by the hand, and look him straight in the eye, and explain to him life as well as I can, in my simplicity and ignorance; and I find that he is more consoled, because more honestly consoled, than my patient was before.

Another consolation belongs to the Rationalist: he has not imposed upon him the task of saving his own soul. Those who have not reflected upon it have no conception of the misery, the pain, the sorrow, the wretched agony that comes from that responsibility. I read in history of some of the noblest men and women who have ever lived, and they have but one aim, one purpose in life—to save their souls, no matter what else they do, no matter how useful they are, no matter how well they cultivate their faculties, no matter how truly they stand in their place and do their work, unless they can be sure that their soul is saved it is all nothing. Can they ever be sure? Have they neglected nothing? have they faithfully attended the sacrament? have they listened to a sufficient number of sermons? have they practiced constantly the lessons inculcated by the preacher? have they restrained themselves enough? have they spent enough on their neighbors and little enough on themselves? have they renounced themselves sufficiently? have they crucified themselves? have they read their Bible? do they understand it? are they sure that there is no grain of doubt, no question in regard to the divinity of the text? are they in the right path? have they prayed enough? have they prayed with all their hearts, during the silent night, down into the roots of their souls?—if not, no door may open to them; and, if it does not, then it is all in vain—life is lost. That misery, that torment, we are discharged from. Our concern is not to save our souls, but to do our duty as life goes on. We can consequently train ourselves, cultivate our faculties, use our opportunities, enjoy our privileges, and make the most of society and existence, without any awful misgivings of the future, such as torment the Christian. We can lie down to rest; we can sit under the shade of the trees; we can laugh and sing; we can employ our time to the fullest extent; we can use our gifts; we can drink in the strength of nature from the gladness of the morning, from the peace of the evening, from conversation with a friend; in a thousand ways we can draw in the refreshing water of life to cool our thirst. Is not that a consolation? It is one of the greatest; for, in hours of fatigue, and loneliness, and sorrow, at any rate, I can say to misgivings, Sit still. I am not bound to explain, I am not bound to feel that there is something I ought to have done. Let my soul be taken care of in the natural way, or let it not be taken care of at all.

Another consideration of immense moment is the limitation of moral responsibility. The Rationalist knows what he can do and what he cannot do; and he is satisfied with doing all he can, and leaving the rest undone. That is not a satisfaction taht a Christian believer can have, for he is never satisfied that he has done his duty. A limitation of responsibility is beyond his sight. He must always be clothed in armor; he must always have his intellectual sword in his hand; he must be always ready for the march and for the battle. But we who study ourselves and observe life, know that temperament, hereditary training, talent, opportunity, privilege, are given in variety of measure; one can do much, another can do little, another can do nothing, and we are satisfied with dropping our little drop of dew on the desert place where we happen to see it, trusting that verdure will come. The unpleasant sense of responsibility is taken off. I am not answerable for the world; I have my own affairs to attend to, you have yours; mind your business, and I will mind mine; mine is quite as much as I can attend to. The relief of taking that position, fairly and freely, once for all, is enormous. One goes with a free and jocund step, and he can enjoy this life; but there is no enjoyment in life; there is no rest or recreation; there is no accumulation of power, if one feels all the time that he is not at liberty to sit down, that he cannot take a vacation, that he can never sit on the rocks and look abroad and enjoy a sight of the ocean, that he can never wander out and lie under the shade of the trees, but must be always looking out for some duty. Ah! that vexatious word duty! How much it means of heaviness and sorrow! how much it means of usefulness, too, for these people who go rattling and tearing through the world, shouting the words "duty" and "excelsior!" how many heart-strings they tear out by the way!

Then there is still another consolation—the deep and inexpressible consolation of human sympathy. The Christian has sympathy with Christ, or with God, or with the Virgin Mary, or with some saint he has never seen. The Rationalist has sympathy with his next neighbor, who is in want or pain, and who is before him all the time, and there is the difference.

When Queen Victoria lost her husband, noble and stately herself though she was—an orthodox Christian—she went to a hospital and, day after day, read by the beside of a poor woman, out of any book that entertained and consoled her. Who was the comforter? The bed-ridden woman, not the desolate queen. Who gave the most? Not the head of England, but this poor woman, kept there on her bed by charity. Sympathy distributes itself—that is a great fact. Lose yourself, forget yourself.

We read of a man who, when he lost his only son, studied Greek. He lost himself in the acquisition of a new language, but he found himself again, and more than himself, as he communed with those pagan spirits of the past whose grandeur and magnificence, whose sweetness and subtleness, are consolation and support of heroic minds in every age. Forget yourself; lose the thought of yourself; lay a portion of your burden on somebody else's shoulder; let your friend, your neighbor, your kinsman or kinswoman, come in and take a little of it away, and so much of it is gone.

The tide finds its own level; the high becomes the low, the low becomes the high, and an equal division of cares and gifts is imparted to all varieties of men. You can begin where you are, one friend and sympathizer is enough; but if you are heroic, if you want more, more there are. Reform is waiting for the strong hand; there are poor people to be lifted out of the sinks of poverty, wretched people to be comforted, and melancholy people to be cheered; there they are, thousands of them within your reach. Is your heart empty? let them fill it. Is your mind barren and vacant? find that there are people who have more cause for barrenness and vacancy in their minds than you have, who can yet fling you a crust out of their superfluity.

The great consoler is love, is character, is manliness and womanliness—the human in every breast. The question is a very simple one: are you stronger than destiny, or is destiny stronger than you? Can you throw fate, or does fate get you down? There is the whole story in a nutshell. Increase yourself, multiply and magnify your own resources, strengthen your heart, make yourself equal to the occasion, and the occasion will be less than you are and will be tributary to you. A traveler over the Alps, with his companion, was overtaken by a storm. His companion, who was weaker than he, succumbed to the biting wind and the pelting snow, and laid down to die. The other felt a faintness creeping into his own heart; but, rousing himself with great effort, he began to rub into life his dying friend. In the stress of his labor he forgot the wind and the cold and snow; his own blood began to tingle in his veins, his courage and his energy returned as he toiled over his prostrate friend, welcoming every sign of recovering life. He became a man again; he lifted his friend from the ground, and the two fared on their way until they reached a hospice where they found shelter.

Would you comfort yourself? comfort another; would you help yourself? help your brother; would you save yourself? save him. You give your life for him, he gives his life for you. That is a fair return; give and take. We cannot get any more than we give. Life is a battle, and it is by fighting that we acquire the power to fight; it is by marching that we become inured to the exposure, toil, weariness, and want of the march. We could not now sally out and take a long campaign. But we soon get used to it, and the soldiers after the campaign are so much in love with the open air that they cannot sleep in a bed. So it is wrestling with fate; we make it our tributary, our companion, our friend, and extract from it the blessing it would fain withhold. How much there is in that Old Testament legend of the patriarch wrestling at midnight with his unseen foe! He cries, "I will not let thee go until thou bless me!" And he gets the blessing.

Nature prostrates our house, and we learn the next time to build a better one. An accident sends our ship to the bottom of the sea; the next time we provide against the accident. The thunderbolt comes down upon our dwelling, and we chain the thunderbolt and tell it to bear our messages. Steam threatens to explode and throw us all into the air; we cage it, keep and organize it, and make it pull our trains. So we gain in wisdom, in insight, in understanding, in power, in knowledge, and in courage as the world goes on. Morality and order follow then by slow degrees; harmony and peace and beauty all take their turns; and so, after stumbling and falling and groping a hundred times, we walk like men over the surface of the past. We are all soldiers; some major-generals, some generals of lower degree, captains, colonels, men in the ranks. But whatever we do, whatever our office, if we do that, we win.

The General travels over Europe from end to end, receiving greetings wherever he goes; royalty turns out to give him welcome, and he is called the greatest soldier of the world. A short time ago we were dropping our flowers on the graves of thousands of men, unknown, unremembered, who simply gave their lives. What would the great General have done without these—without their fortitude, their patience, their endurance, their courage, their readiness to go to the front, their willingness to return again and again to the charge, their determination that they would not be beaten; the persistency with which they stood shoulder to shoulder, each in his place, his eye running along the polished steel of his rifle, doing it year after year, going into the hospital, coming back into the camp, still again going to the front, and at last, at last, only sinking patiently into the ground? Who won the battle? They did. Who won the fight? Every one.

Last fall I made the journey between Boston and New York. The autumn winds were sighing among the trees, the red leaves were dropping to the ground, and here and there were piled up in masses to be carried away by the blast. All was desolate and wild and dreary; all spoke of gloom and disaster. Yesterday I made the same journey, and merry loveliness covered the hillside, the meadows, and the forest trees; there was beauty and life everywhere. Where did it come from? From incessant and indomitable elements that beat into the ground those dead leaves that had fallen. All summer long they had worked, disinfecting the atmosphere and cooling the ground, and now their task was over, and they fluttered down into their beds to be forgotten. And yet, unless this thing were done every autumn of every year, the glorious splendor of the year would never greet mortal eyes. Which of all the martyred leaves that fluttered down and rotted in the ground made the summer? Every leaf.

The Churches, Comstock, and Abbot.

FRIEND BENNETT: We have four churches in our village viz., a Christian church, a Baptist church, a Methodist church, and a Presbyterian church. I think it is safe to say, from the first outlay of money on these churches, enough has been spent in building, in repairing, in lighting and heating, in paying ministers, etc., to have fed and clothed every poor family in the town, and to have given to every poor boy and girl a decent education.

I find in these churches the same niggardly conduct that I witness, alas, in too many instances outside of them—men who are known to be untruthful, men who are know to be guilty of perjury, men who are knowun to be guilty of stealing, men guilty of adultery. I know men who were taken into the Church thirty years age, who were as ignorant as spaniels. They have sung hallelujah and paid their hard earnings to the priest all through these long years, but are as ignorant to-day as when they entered. Their God-school has not improved them in the least. One minister in this place has been paid in salaries and donations not less than $25,000. Now, has this money been so spent as to produce the greatest amount of happiness? If not, a great wrong has been committed, and the churches are justly chargeable with that wrong. But these pious people think but little about the suffering poor whom they might help, but they work all the time for the glory of God whom they cannot help. But, according to their own teaching they have been terribly rebuked in this place. They inculcate the lesson that God is merciful to the faithful who serve him; that he visits judgments upon the wicked and unbelieving; that he is a prayer hearing and a prayer answering God.

Day after day they put up prayers for the prosperity of the Church, and for the welfare of his chosen few. But let us see how these prayers are answered, and how he protects the churches dedicated to his service.

Within a short time the sheds belonging to the Methodist church in this village, were (by the hand of God, of course,) laid as flat as a trencher. No wicked unbeliever or his team happened to be under them. The Presbyterian church took fire (and God would not put it out), and all that remained was a pile of smouldering ruins. The Baptist church has been undergoing thorough repairs, its members have been taxed to the utmost to foot the bills. On the night of the 3d inst., just as the church was nearly completed, lightning struck the tower and utterly ruined it, scattering the fragments in every direction.

I wonder if these superstitious noddies will profit by the lesson. If my house had been struck by lightning, it would have been blowed from every pulpit in the village. When the theatre was burned in Brooklyn some time ago, nearly all the religious papers, and the clergy generally, rang the statement around the land that God visited his fiery indignation upon these poor, perishing mortals, because they had offended him. How long will it take these poor deluded hirelings to learn that God has no special favorites, that all the prayers ever offered cannot turn aside the lightning or quiet the storm, that all men, good, bad, and indifferent are subject to the same universal law.

The battle waxes hot between you and Mr. Abbot. He seems to believe there are 70,000 individuals in this republic who have not yet learned the definition of the words "modified" and "repealed." I am one of the 70,000. I thank you, Bro. Abbot, for the compliment. I was so uncultured that I did believe that the Comstock laws ought to be "repealed, or modified." And when I heard of Heywood's sentence I thought I would be one of 70,000 to sign a petition to have Comstock himself either "modified, or repealed." The more repeal the better. Mr. Abbot would convey the idea that all Liberals who favor the repeal of the Comstock laws are in favor of having these "tons of obscene literature" sent through the mails. Again, Bro. Abbot, I thank you for the compliment.

I do not know a single Liberal, worthy of the name, who would not take any truly obscene literature of whatever name or character between two chips and consign it to the flames, and not keep it on exhibition as that immaculate Comstock does. At the same time, if any Liberal farmer should find out how to make his ewes and cows yield twins, he would not feel as though he ought to go to jail because he let his brother farmers into the secret of increasing their flocks, which secret Comstock & Co. might confound with their "tons of obscene literature."

When Comstock shall have finished up the work assigned him by God and the Young Men's Christian Association, I would recommend that every Liberal in the land cast a rough stone upon his grave. And I offer the following lines as a fitting inscription to adorn the pile:

He lies beneath this pile of stones—
Forever cursed shall be his bones;
Come on! come on! ye hosts of hell,
Take him who lived to please you well.

Great Nick in sulphurous fury rise,
And bear him home, your lawful prize;
Make fast the gates and never free him,
We want not here, God knows, to see him.

In thy dark kitchen cram him smack,
Nor let the lecherous cuss come back;
Where fire, and smoke, and misery reign,
There let him rave, and gnaw his chain.

Although we've lost him here on earth,
Old Nick has got a crony,
Let hell's domain ring out with mirth,
O'er sneaking, scar-faced Tony.

Prepare, ye imps who squeal and croak,
For when he does to hell come,
With brimstone, thunder, fire, and smoke,
Give him a hearty welcome.

Naples, Ontario Co., N. Y. ***

Letter from Dr. J. S. Lyon.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: It must appear a little puzzling to that portion of orthodoxy whose minds are just being called into active requisition upon the subject of an overruling Providence—as connected with his power and skill in governing this universe—who having learned the Bible lesson that it is God who controls the elements, giving rain and sunshine to both the just and unjust; that his fingers play with the lightnings gleaming in the heavens, sending occasional flashes to earth as evidence of his displeasure and as punishment to the wicked—to be obliged to note the fact of his righteous retributions being sometimes visited upon them, while the ungodly are unharmed!

My attention was directed more particularly to this subject just after a heavy rain and thunder-storm recently, during which time a church edifice in this place was struck by lightning, and but for timely aid would soon have been reduced to ashes, while the Opera Hall occupied by Spiritualists and Liberalists, but a few paces removed, was unmolested.

This, to some, seemed a little perplexing, while no explanation would have been necessary had the reverse occurred. It may be argued that it was a chastisement needed by God's elect, which is probably correct; but why the object of their worship, the "Most High," should take this course, and act the part of an incendiary—attempt to burn his own house—seems a little out of order; and from the resistive effort made, must have been so regarded by his people.

Judging from their deportment in guarding and protecting their Godhouses against his assaults, they evidently appear distrustful of him; and owing, I presume, to his recklessness, seem to regard him as a little "shaky" or unbalanced—just as apt to work against his own interest as otherwise. Indeed, were he not considered unwise as well as distrustful, it would seem hardly necessary that so much precaution and combined effort be used to foil his purposes.

An occsional shower of fire with the smell of brimstone upon his "holy altar," as a foretaste of the orthodox hell, might not be altogether without significance; certainly not until the mind is divorced from religious superstition and becomes sufficiently expansive to understand that an imaginary being called God has nothing whatever to do with the universe, and is as oblivious to the wants and interests of the Church as he is powerless to control the lightning.

It seems the editor of The Index and some others are much concerned about "purifying Liberalism." Mr. Abbot doubtless wishes to benefit humanity, but his over-sensitive, timorous nature unfits him largely for a pioneer, thus producing a feeling of jealousy toward his competitors, who are less timid and better suited to the work, and consequently more successful. Claiming to be Liberal, he has shown himself illiberal, a stumblingblock to many in search of truth and freedom; and through his bitterness toward you has, perhaps, injured himself most of all. Not very unlike his prototype, S. W. Payne, in making his ungentlemanly assaults upon honest, earnest advocates of freedom, he can't reasonably expect to retain friends and increase his influence in the ranks of true Liberalists.

I have never had the pleasure of meeting you, Brother Bennett (though I have both yours and the "cultured editor's" photos), and, judging from your writings, which I have read pretty extensively, I can't say I regard you as a very bad man, certainly not to the extent he would try to make you appear.

Indeed, I can but feel that it is a downright shame that any one, much less such men as Abbot and others claiming to be Liberal, should be guilty of placing unnecessary obstacles in your way, misrepresenting you, and, by unfair means, trying to defame your good name. I have often wondered, under the pressure of business almost overwhelming, together with the many petty annoyances you are constantly subjected to, how you preserve your equanimity and meet injustice so mildly and unruffled. Surely, you possess some of the noblest traits peculiar to mankind; and I often think you are doing more to elevate and enlighten humanity than any other one man.

Your influence for good is becoming universally greater, reaching far out into the ranks of orthodoxy, while such men as Comstock & Co., who are seeking your overthrow, are simply making opportunities for you to more fully expose hypocrisy, and prosecute the glorious work you are so well fitted for. The ignominious acts of this sainted crew are eliciting thought from their own people, and more completely bringing to the surface the rottenness of old theology. Like "Matthew Hopkins, the witch-finder," in their cruel and relentless persecutions of some of the purest, bravest, and most intellectual citizens of America, they are simply laying a snare for their own destruction—making converts to the cause of truth and freedom.

Comstock's attempt to assassinate Dr. Sara B. Chase's reputation will elicit much sympathy in her behalf, and will most certainly reflect upon his unprincipled, hypocritical course new light to many who have hitherto given the subject of his work little thought. As usual, you have come to the front in her defense as few others could, still further entitling you to respectability and much credit. I wish I were able to help her financially. As far as influence goes, I will do for her all I can. Please send copy of the "Cruelties and Crimes of Anthony Comstock," and I will try to make it do good service in that direction.

Respectfully yours, J. S. LYON, M. D.

Letter from Leeds.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Allow me to inform you that the last regular meeting of the "Leeds Philosophic Association" was one that would do credit to any body of men who favor liberty and justice. There was manifested a firm, steady determination to search for the truth, regardless of the epithets hurled upon us by bigoted, superstitious, and intolerant Christians. Our president entertained us for some time upon the subject of "Our Organization; the Duties of Its Members," etc., etc. Among other things, he said: "The principles and objects of this association are broad and far-reaching. Under their guidance and protection, man, as an intelligent being, has the privilege to come out and free himself from the meshes of superstition and deception which have surrounded him in the past. . . . I am well aware that we are stigmatized as a body of Infidels by the so-called Christian community. Granted that we are, I, for one, am perfectly satisfied, as I think it only tends to expose their ignorance without doing me any material harm." He spoke very highly of Thomas Paine, and he added that if Paine was an Infidel then he most assuredly was. He considered that our actions and deeds would compare favorably with those of our Christian brethren, and admonished us to ever bear in mind that the eyes of the people were upon us, and that we ought therefore to be on our guard, so that they could have no reason to say that we are unjust, partial, or intolerant.

Your "Champions of the Church" is a splendid work. Everybody ought to have it. It contains information that would make any person of good sense better and wiser; it contains information that could not otherwise be acquired without a vast amount of time, labor, and money; besides, it is dirt-cheap. The sketch of Major-General Anthony Comstock, embassador of Emanuel J. Christ, is alone worth all the book costs. If what you have written concerning him is true, I think he is one of the most despicable wretches that ever went unhung. I am not so much opposed to the business in which he is engaged as to the low, mean, unprincipled manner in which he makes and secures his victims. I would not be guilty of taking the advantage of the worst brute that walks the earth that he takes of his brother man—that is, if civilized people can call him a brother in any sense. While the idea of hell is repulsive to me, yet if there is one (such a one as the Christians picture) it must be especially adapted to the aforesaid embassador's case. I believe it to be a shame and a disgrace for the American people, who boast of their liberty, to suffer this infamous, intolerant, heartless Christian fanatic and tyrant to longer pursue his work of destruction and misery. No man is safe while this wolf in sheep's clothing is prowling about. As he is a member of the Y. M. C. A., you may tell him for us that there did exist in Leeds an association by that hypocritical name, but the Leeds Philosophic and Library Association has superseded them, and is now occupying the same rooms. This last-named association, at its last regular meeting, unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

WHEREAS, It is the imperative duty of every rational being to truthfully acknowledge and sincerely appreciate any and all kind favors conferred upon him by a fellow-being; therefore, be it

Resolved, 1. That brother D. M. Bennett has, by his disinterested liberality towards the Leeds Philosophic and Library Association, strengthened the chain that binds us in the common cause of humanity, placed us in closer and more intimate relations to each other, strengthened and confirmed our good opinion of him, and placed us under obligations that, as men and brethren, we cannot evade—under obligations that none but the most vicious and inhuman would attempt to evade; under obligations which we must necessarily consider an imperative duty, an exalted privilege, and a great pleasure to fulfill.

2 That hereafter the Librarian shall, as far as possible, purchase of Brother Bennett all books for the Association, thereby the better demonstrating the truth of the foregoing resolution.

3. That we recommend to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all others in search of books, that they purchase them of D. M. Bennett, thus securing to themselves prompt attention, the benefit of low prices, and good, substantial workmanship, and to him the benefit of their purchases and the satisfaction of knowing that his hard labor and persistent advocacy of truth are duly appreciated.

4. That we firmly believe there is no method or system so well calculated to promote truth, freedom, and justice as that which opens the way to a careful study and investigation of any and all subjects that have a bearing upon or are in any manner connected with the present or future well being of our brothers and sisters, the human race.

5. That as the foregoing resolutions are expressive of our friendship and good will towards Brother Bennett, and as they in a measure express the sentiments and principles which it would be well for the masses to follow, the secretary shall place them in full upon the minutes, and a copy shall be forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication.

The Y. M. C. A. never passed such resolutions about anybody—not even their God. The fact is, they were too selfish; each doubtless felt that he would like to be all the God there is or was—himself, individually. We say, Give us more men like Bennett and less like General Comstock.

Fraternally yours, GEO. H. WARNER.

Leeds, N. Y., July 14, 1878.

IF thou wouldst be a man, bend at the shrine of no mortal; walk in no pathway because others tried it; be thy own leader—thy own sect; when all are so, then will come the true church. Who was Wesley, that thou shouldst be a Wesleyan? or Luther, that thou shouldst be a Lutheran? or Christ, that thou shouldst be a Christian? All men; art thou not equally so? When the priest threatens thee with damnation, and would load thee with his gyves to secure salvation, say, "Hands off, sir! I am also a man! Rather let me be lost, being a free man, than be saved to be an eternal slave!"—Wm. Denton.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1878.

The Indignation Meeting in Boston.

On Thursday evening, August 1st, according to previous announcement, the friends of the liberty of the press and of the liberty of speech met in Faneuil Hall to express their indignation at the conviction and imprisonment of Ezra H. Heywood, who was attacked for having written and published a pamphlet in which he used arguments that were opposed to the views of his persecutors, who were represented by Anthony Comstock. The pretense under which he was proceeded against was that he had mailed an obscene publication. An examination of the work by any candid person of sound mind, unbiased by prudery, will convince such a one that it is not obscene either in subject or matter, and is calculated to do much good by agitating a very important question, vital to the elevation of woman.

The doors were opened at 7 o'clock, and the place was soon filled, both floor and galleries, by nearly 8,000 people, many of whom were ladies. The platform for the speakers was adorned with a profusion of flowers.

The meeting was organized by electing the following officers:

President, Hon. Elizur Wright.

Vice-Presidents, Hon. B. F. Ware, Marblehead; Charles McLean, Boston; Elizabeth M. F. Denton, Wellesley; Henry H. Stone, Boston; Hon. Thomas Robinson, Pawtucket, R. I.; Josiah P. Mendum, Melrose; E. M. Chamberlain, Boston; Mrs. M. S. Wetmore, Charlestown; D. B. Morey, William Foster, Jr., Providence, R. I.; J. Q. A. Clifton, Boston; Henry Appleton, Providence; Alden Sampson, Charlestown; George A. Bacon, J. A. Wilcox, Chelsea, and C. W. McLellan, Boston.

Secretaries, Mrs. Mattie Sawyer and Benjamin R. Tucker.

Mr. Wright on taking the chair made the opening speech, in which he argued that the law against obscenity had not been violated by Mr. Heywood, and that on the contrary he had recommended the most valuable kind of knowledge, which was taught by the ancient Greek philosophers, who urged that to "know thyself" both physically and spiritually was the highest and best achievment. It was because of a lack of such knowledge that society was far below a state of perfection. He said that it was an error to expect to destroy vice and crime by legislation; and as well to try to abolish ignorance by statute. The pious law-makers try to abolish down-hill and fail to see that by so doing they will abolish up-hill. The truth is that the virtues are indigenous in the human race, and our Constitution defends our national right to develop them without let or hindrance.

The vital and naturally holy relations of the sexes are beset by deplorable falsehood and prudery, but the great body of the people are rising through knowledge to a purer and better condition.

The State laws are severe enough against obscene literature, but the real power for its suppression is elevation of public sentiment above such unworthy things. Loose and careless Federal legislation on this subject has been the cover for a persecution of freedom of opinion. A detective employed by a bigoted and aggressive religious sect trapped into the mail by a lie (as if a lie was not more dangerous) a book that had been openly sold a long time, without remark as to its exceptional character. Under such a law there is no such thing as liberty of the press, and without that the Constitution and Declaration of Independence are not worth two brass buttons.

He made a good point against Comstock's method of trapping his victims by quoting from Isaiah (29th chapter) the passage denouncing such underhanded business.

In speaking of the character of the book he said if words are used to allure the young to "chambers of death" they are criminal; but there can be no crime in using any words necessary to warn them away. Under this law Solomon the king if alive now, could be indicted and sent to prison for his songs; and there are many passages in the Bible of similar character. The worst feature of the law was the lack of a definition of obscenity.

This persecution is a dangerous mistake, and it is for the safety of our country that freedom of publication shall be maintained. He said he believed the family was the foundation of the State, and the perfection of the family was the union of one man and one woman, and such unions are generally happy in our country. He did not favor the law which oppressed women without giving her a voice in framing it.

Prof. J. W. H. Toohey followed and argued that morals form a small part of civilized society, although a good and latent part. Obscenity is among us, but is the exception, and in this case has been by false pretense made an excuse for attacking a good man. He referred to the position assumed by the Independent of this city, in which Freethinkers were called rats and Comstock a terrier dog trained to worry and kill them, and gave a good account of the arrest and conviction of Mr. Heywood.

Mr. T. B. Wakeman followed in an eloquent address on the unconstitutionality of the law and the arrest and conviction of Mr. Heywood, a man against whom no one had ever as yet before this made any complaint. The wrong was done in violation of the Constitution of the United States. This law indicates that we have heretofore been negligent of our duty, and have allowed the framers of it to steal a march upon us in the name of goodness. He said that while pretending to suppress obscenity they had taken the position of that worthy boor who was set to watch his sleeping master, and who to keep the flies off threw such large stones as to smash his head. He argued at some length the unconstitutionality of the postal law and the action of the authorities in punishing Mr. Heywood. He compared France with the United States in the matter of progress, showing how France, being under the sway of retrogrades and conservatives, could only advance by revolution, while here the Progressives and Liberals elevate society by agitation, looking toward an ideal future on this earth as their heaven. The administration of our affairs was placed in the hands of conservatives by our fathers, and wisely. Fanatics were debarred from doing much mischief, but in this case they have stolen a march on us. The so-called Comstock law of 1873 was passed in the last hours of Congress, when no one had a chance of knowing what was in it, and therefore without the knowledge or consent of the people, surreptiously. And yet this law, begotten in fraud, seeks to use the United States mails to supervise the morals of the country. The real object of the framers of the law was to suppress liberty of speech and liberty of the press, as we learn from the reports of the society which supports Comstock and of which he is secretary. The seal of the society, printed on the cover of their report, is an insult to the age in which we live, representing as it does a policeman putting an editor in jail, while Anthony Comstock is near by burning books.

Webster and Clay defended the liberty of speech and the press, and urged that it would be unwise to designate the persons or parties or classes who may have the benefit of the mails. Just now we need liberty and true conservatism, such as that exhibited by Jackson, whose singular strength of mind prevented the formation of an aristocracy of money, which would have overwhelmed the land. The people protest that this is not the law of the land, and never, never, never shall be. Obscenity, bad as it is, can be taken care of without violating the Constitution.

Mr. Wakeman was greeted with frequent bursts of applause, and made many successful points, carrying the vast audience with him almost unanimously. A few hissses in the gallery on two or three occasions was promptly and overwhelmingly outcheered.

The Rev. J. M. L. Babcock followed in a very forcible and effective speech, which was received with much applause. He arraigned the law, the judges, and the prosecutor in vigorous terms. He prophesied for Comstock a miserable future and the unhappy end of all informers.

The next speaker was Laura Kendrick, a lady of fine address and clear thought. She referred to a recent meeting in the Park-street church, in which some clergyman discussed the best way of checking crime. They have taught regeneration, although the people know that regeneration is a failure. Right generation is the better way, and in spite of the prudery of the Church, is being studied more and more every day. We need reform, but not such work as is done by the rascal Anthony Comstock; and when his real work is known, it will be repudiated by the people. She did not believe in the twenty-ton story—always twenty tons—no more or less of obscene matter, that Comstock says goes through the mails yearly (he may mean the Freethought journals, and if so, his estimate is far too low). When the young are properly instructed, and parents and guardians set good examples, obscenity will practically vanish. She hoped the tenor of the meeting would be flashed across the wires to cheer the hearts of Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh in their struggle for the maintenance of truth in England. Her remarks were frequently interrupted by hearty applause.

Prof. A. L. Rawson followed in an interesting, earnest, and enthusiastic speech, in which he introduced an original allegory, wherein Uncle Sam, the great father of the nation, calls his children before him and binds them to keep the contract known as the Constitution. The argument was, that having united for the sake of mutual protection and peace, which could not be enjoyed in the Old World, it was the plain duty of all sects and parties to respect each other in the exercise of their rights as guaranteed by the Constitution. Uncle Sam reminds his children that they must forego such luxuries as roasting heretics, burning books, and persecutions for opinion's sake generally. He said that Uncle Sam had taken the place of the Jehovah of whom we read in the poetic book of Job, and he would insist on his children keeping the peace among themselves. This attack on Heywood was a breach of the contract under which this Government was formed and has been sustained, and it was an attempt of one party to gain power over others, while all have equal right to recognition and protection under the law. He believed no such mischief could arise if all the laws should be referred to the people for acceptance or rejection before being enforced. When that custom is adopted we shall have a government by the people, and not before.

There has been a growing tendency as a result of the teaching of New England theologians towards a habit of breaking contracts. This attack on the liberty of the press is a revival of that doctrine of the Puritans which taught that the only liberty of thought was to think as they did. Mr. Heywood was guilty of thinking for himself on the sex question, and differed from the Church party, and therefore was a "Freethinker" and a "rat" and must be "stamped out and killed." This threat comes from our brothers who have sworn to respect us for the sake of securing their own safety with the safety of the nation!

The speaker had made some inquiries about Comstock's method of work, and was convinced that he was a religious fanatic, over-zealous, and carried away with self-conceit and love of praise. He organized a prayer meeting when he was in the army in Florida, and now thinks he is serving the cause of Christ by lying and deceiving poor defenseless girls as he did in Greene street, where it is said he hired for $14.50 three girls to commit an offense against the law, who had never known any such mischief before meeting him. He hired a professional thief just out of prison, after serving a seven years' term, to introduce him and his companions as "four gentlemen from North Carolina," which party is said to have included two members of the Young Men's Christian Association.

While the girls were arranging for the exhibition, Mr. Comstock made some excuse to go out, and returned with a warrant, to obtain which he must have deceived the court, for the offense had not then been committed. The "company from North Carolina" indulged in the exhibition of "the three graces" until they were satisfied probably, and then the arrest was made.

If this conduct is permitted, and, by deception, such men as Heywood can be trapped into prison under false pretense, then there seems to rise in the future the danger that the Church party may gain power to control this country as it has Egypt, Palestine, Cyprus, and other states in Europe, where instead of the paradise that once existed in those places, the traveler now finds large districts a desert waste, filled with the crumbling ruins of cities. Our only safety lies in the mutual recognition of rights guaranteed by the Constitution, among which a free press is one of the most valuable means of civilization.

The audience frequently applauded the speaker, and seemed to enjoy his analysis of Comstock as rich and true. Many calls for Moses Hull were made all through the meeting, but the programme was followed, and the resolutions were then read by Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker, being received with great enthusiasm.

The resolutions adopted by the meeting were as follows: Be it Resolved, by this meeting of citizens of the United States, in Faneuil Hall assembled:

1. That the right to think and to publicly express, by tongue or pen, the results of thinking is the dearest right which American citizens possess; and to deny its exercise is subversive of natural justice, contrary to constitutional provision, dangerous to public welfare, and corrupting to public morals.

2. That no law ought to be permitted to remain upon our statute books which is, by the absence of definition, capable of being used by designing knaves of narrow-minded bigots in denial of the exercise of this right.

3. That, since the recent conviction of Ezra H. Heywood of Princeton, Massachusetts, nominally of having circulated obscene literature through the mails, but really of having published his sincere convictions on the subject of love and marriage, and his imprisonment in Dedham Jail for a period of two years, clearly make his case one of persecution of opinion under the law, meriting the severest reprobation of all right-minded persons, we call upon the President of the United States, in the name of the freedom of the press, and as he values the respect and confidence of the people whose servant he is, to release Mr. Heywood without delay.

4. That Anthony Comstock, Special Agent of the Post Office Department, whose duty it is to prosecute offenders against the United States law prohibiting the circulation of obscene literature through the mails, has shown himself, by his abuse of the power conferred upon him by the Government in repeatedly attempting to suppress free thought, free speech, and free press, and by the despicable and immoral methods which he habitually employs, unfit to be intrusted with the execution of any law seriously affecting the liberty of the citizen, and therefore we ask his immediate dismissal from the Government service.

5. That a copy of these resolutions be signed by the President and Secretaries of this meeting, and forwarded by the latter to the President of the United States.

After which Mr. Hull made a very racy and forcible speech which seemed to be received with great favor, especially on the floor of the hall. He said that liberty was on trial now if ever, when a peaceable citizen could be assailed and his right ruthlessly violated for no other crime than uttering his honest sentiments. He was present at the trial and heard the clerk of the court utter the prayer "God save the United States," and when he saw Mr. Heywood in prison, as he believed for no crime, he felt like reversing that prayer (which he did, the audience joining in a vociferous hurrah of applause).

Mr. Horace Seaver being called on by many of the audience made a few remarks in the spirit of the evening, which elicited hearty applause, and the meeting adjoined.

It is hoped that one good result of the meeting will be to disabuse the public as to the nature of the work being done by the friends of free speech. It is charged by the leading journals that those who urge Mr. Heywood's pardon are advocates of free love, defenders of obscenity, and otherwise objectionable because immoral characters. The reports of this meeting show how groundless any such assertions were. It is and will be a question as to the right to free speech and a free press, to advocate orthodoxy or Infidelity as it may please any person to choose which shall be done. The true principle is to protect all, that the best may be saved, preventing any from using force either to build up or to destroy.

What I Don't Believe.—No. 35.

307. I do not think there is a perfect harmony of sentiment between these passages on good works being seen of men and not seen of men: "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works" (Matt. v, 16); and "Take heed that you do not your alms before men to be seen of them" (Matt. vi, 1). If doing alms is not "good works," I do not know what it is.

308. On the matter of judgment there seems to be the same disagreement. First, we have: "Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged" (Matt. vii, 1, 2); and again: "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? And if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge the angels? How much more the things that pertain to this life? If, then, ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church" (1 Cor. vi, 2–4); "Do not ye judge them that are within" (1 Cor. v, 12).

309. A slight clashing seems to exist in those passages relative to non-resistence. In the first place, we have: "Resist not evil, but whoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also" (Matt. v, 39); "All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. xxvi, 52). In the next place, these: "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one" (Luke xxii, 36); "And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple" (John ii, 15).

310. No better agreement is found in these passages: "Be not afraid of them that kill the body" (Luke xii, 4), and "After these things Jesus walked into Galilee; for he would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill him" (John vii, 1).

311. On the subject of anger no greater unison is found. On the one hand, "Be angry and sin not" (Eph. iv, 26); "God is angry with the wicked every day" (Ps. vii, 11); "And when he had looked round about on them with anger . . . he saith unto them, Stretch forth thy hand" (Mark iii, 5); on the other hand, "Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry; for anger resteth in the bosom of fools" (Eccl. vii, 9); "Make no friendship with an angry man" (Prov. xxii, 24).

312. On the subject of killing no better agreement is found: "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor" (Ex. xxxii, 27); "So Jehu slew all that remained of the house of Ahab. . . . And the Lord said unto Jehu, Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab according to all that was in my heart, thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel" (2 Kings x, 11, 30). On the other hand we have: "Thou shalt not kill" (Ex. xx, 13); "No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him" (James ii, 15).

313. On the subject of lying, the same contradiction is discoverable. See 1 Sam. xvi, 1, 2; Josh. ii, 4, 5, 6; James ii, 25; Ex. i, 18–20; also: "And there come forth a spirit, and stood before the Lord and said, I will persuade him. . . . I will go forth and will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him and prevail also: go forth and do so" (1 Kings xxii, 21, 22); "Ye shall know my breach of promise" (Numb. xiv, 34); "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" (Rom. iii, 7); "Being crafty, I caught you with guile" (2 Cor. xii, 16). On the other hand, lying is positively forbidden: "Thou shalt not bear false witness" (Ex. xx, 16); "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord" (Prov. xii, 22); "All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone" (Rev. xxi, 8).

314. On the subject of circumcision, the following disagreement is found: First: "This is my covenant, which ye shall keep between me and you and thy seed after thee; Every man-child among you shall be circumcised" (Gen. xvii, 10), and then, "Behold, I, Paul, say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing" (Gal. v, 2).

315. On the Sunday question there is the same lack of harmony; thus: "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it" (Gen. ii, 3); "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy" (Ex. xx, 8); while on the other hand, "The new moons and Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity" (Isa. i, 13); "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind' (Rom. xiv, 5); "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days" (Col. ii, 16).

316. On the subject of wearing long hair are found these disagreements; in the first place, thus: "And no razor shall come on his head: for the child shall be a Nazarine unto God from the womb" (Judges xlii, 5); "All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head; until the days be fulfilled in the which he separated himself unto the Lord, he shall be holy, and shall not let the locks of hair of his head grow" (Numb. v, 5). On the other hand: "Doth not even nature itself teach you that if a man have long hair, it is a shame to him?" (1 Cor. xi, 14).

317. It is found that baptism is both commanded and not commanded; thus: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. xxviii, 19). And again: "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel. . . . I thank God I baptized none of you but Crispus and Gaius" (1 Cor. i, 17, 14).

318. Of the kinds of animals admissible for food the following disagreements are observable: In the first place, "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you" (Gen. ix, 3); "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat" (1 Cor. x, 25); "There is nothing unclean of itself" (Rom. xiv, 14). On the other hand we have: "Nevertheless, these shall ye not eat, of them that chew the cud or of them that divide the cloven hoof; as the camel, and the hare, and the coney; for they chew the cud, but divide not the hoof; therefore they are unclean to you. Or the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you; ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcass" (Deut. xiv, 7, 8.)

319. On the subject of oaths we find these contradictions: "He that sweareth in the earth shall swear by the God of truth" (Isa. lxv, 16). "Now, therefore, swear unto me here by God. . . . And Abraham said, I will swear. . . . Then they swore, both of them" (Gen. xxi, 23, 24, 31); "And I made them swear by God" (Neh. xiii, 25). On the other hand we have: "But I say unto you, swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne: nor by the earth, for it is his footstool" (Matt. v, 34, 35).

320. In the same way marriage is both approved and disapproved, thus: "And the Lord said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a help meet for him" (Gen. ii, 18); "And God said, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. i, 28); "For this shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife" (Matt. xix, 5); "Marriage is honorable in all" (Heb. xiii, 4). On the other hand, Paul says: "It is good for a man not to touch a woman. . . . For I would that all men were even as I myself. . . . It is good for them if they abide even as I" (1 Cor. vii, 1, 7, 8).

THE MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENT.

In addition to Prof. Hudson and the ladies before announced to provide music, we are to have the "old time" Hutchinson family, consisting of Mr. John W. Hutchinson, Mrs. Fannie B. Hutchinson, Mr. Henry J. Hutchinson, and Miss Lilly Phillips Hutchinson.

THE CONVENTION.

The first session of the convention will commence on Thursday forenoon at 11 o'clock, probably by an address by President Dr. Brown, of Binghamton, after which the balance of the forenoon will be devoted to a friendly interchange of views in speeches of ten minutes. As there will be so many speakers, it will be necessary for each, so far as possible, to condense his and her ideas, and also, so far as possible, to transact all the business of the Convention during special meetings at hours before and after the regular speaking sessions. I am confident, from letters I am receiving from all directions, that the most perfect harmony will prevail throughout the Convention, and all will labor unitedly for the sole object of advancing the cause of Freethought and Progress. It is very important that all who can should be present at the opening session on Thursday.

THE RAILROADS.

Most of the railroads have agreed to sell excursion tickets, and for special information as to any point send me a line, inclosing stamp. Those who are coming over the Pennsylvania R. R., the Northern Central R. R., or the Pennsylvania and Erie R. R., must send six cents and get an order from me before they can get their tickets.

IMPORTANT TO WESTERN PEOPLE.

Persons from most any of the western cities can procure excursion tickets very cheap to Chatauqua Lake and return (engaged for the great orthodox gathering), and then get further excursion tickets from Salamanca, or Dunkirk, to Watkins and return. These are all good for some time after the Watkins Convention.

FROM THE EAST.

I am pleased to announce that Boston and New England people can procure cheap rates of fare from Albany to Watkins, and return, over the Albany and Susquehanna R. R. The precise figures I will give next week.

FROM THE SOUTHEAST.

The Lehigh Valley R. R. has agreed to issue excursion tickets at nearly all their stations southeast of Elmira, and from Ithica north to Watkins. The Corning and Geneva R. R. sells half-fare tickets.

MRS GAGE'S LETTER.

FRIEND GREEN: I have waited until after our Rochester anniversary before replying to your note of invitation to attend the Watkins Convention. I inclose you our resolutions—the most Liberal ever going forth from a woman's rights convention. The press and the clergy has attacked them, which is pretty sure evidence, not only that they are right, but that they are needed. The very underlying principle of woman's demands is the right to self-development. Without this right and this power there can be no freedom. The more deeply I examine history, the more fully I see the influence ecclesiasticism has had upon law. As far as woman is concerned, she has not only been debarred from the right of private interpretation of the Scriptures, but in her case there is already a union of Church and State.

After the Norman Conquest, canon law had a very powerful influence in modifying and changing common law, especially upon all points where woman was most interested, as marriage, children, inheritance, etc.

In taking English common law, with all its restrictions upon woman, as the basis of American law, this country has already, as far as woman is concerned, formed that union of Church and State against which all thoughtful persons are arraigned.

So woman, if she but knew it, has far more at stake than man, not only in prevention of greater union, but in the breaking up of that already fastened upon us.

Writers upon law have been very blind in discovering the influence of ecclesiasticism upon legislation. Not until the seventh edition of his famous "Criminal Law" did even Wharton discover its bearing upon the law for crimes. Amos has not yet recognized its effects upon civil law, although closely interwoven with it; and I know of but two writers who have at all noted the especially restrictive influence upon Christian legislation upon woman. These two are Incrine, in his "Ancient Law," and Canon Charles Kingsley, in a letter to John Stuart Mill. A little thought and a little study bring these effects clearly to light.

The time has fully come for woman to think for herself in religious matters, and deeming your association for free religious thought one of great importance and benefit to woman, I shall gladly avail myself of your invitation to be present and take part in the Watkins Convention.

Truly yours, MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

The fact of proselytes abandoning their pagan cultus makes Tacitus stigmatize them as pessimi; yet according to him they adopt Judaism because they are already bad; according to Jesus, their conversion to Judaism makes them children of hell. The pagan Tacitus cannot compete with the intensity of the sanctimonious phrase. If the scribes and Pharisees "compassed sea and land" to make proselytes, they had no private gain from it, no power, no grandeur—ostensibly they deserved honor. To entitle them for it, "Hypocrites and children of hell" is an outburst startling enough. This single clause may justly make us doubt of the calmness of the speaker's mind and the weight of his judgment. But again, the scribes and Pharisees did what ostensibly was a very proper thing—they built the tombs of the prophets, and deplored their murder. Who could have dreamed that this would bring down on their heads violent vituperation from a new prophet? Some thirty to forty years ago some Anglicans in Oxford erected a monument to the three martyrs—Latimer, Ridley, and Cranmer—on the spot, it is said, where they were burned. What should we think if some Protestant Dissenter or Catholic cried out, "Woe upon them for it," and denounced them as hypocrites, who hereby witness that they are children of those who burned the martyrs; and if he were further to address them thus: "Fill up ye also the measure of your fathers! ye serpents, ye spawn of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell (Gehenna)?" Such an orator would seem to us mad. I certainly have no desire to fix on Jesus the responsibility of this most outrageous attack. If any one plead thus: "Fill ye up the measure of your fathers!" is the invention of a later Christian, who looked back on the crucifixion, and imputed hypocrisy to the men, who, after reproving their forefathers for slaying prophets, themselves slew Jesus—there is plausibility in this, especially since, in v. 34, "some of them ye shall kill and crucify" (which, in Luke xi, 49, is changed to "slay and persecute") is evidently absurd. Crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment. It may also seem quite certain that v. 13 did not proceed from Jesus himself, for it belongs to a later time to say that the rulers "did not suffer people to enter the kingdom of heaven." No steps had been taken by them to keep disciples away from Jesus in his lifetime. The words must refer to some after-opposition made by them to the progress of the Christian Church under James, who, nevertheless, addresses his unbelieving brethren, the whole twelve tribes, in a widely different spirit from this; but whether Jesus uttered this oration, or later phantasy invented it for him, in either case it is deplorable to regard the words as sacred. If it is not railing, what is? and it is all unprovoked. No object can be imagined to have been aimed at, if it was said by Jesus, except to goad the rulers to the point of demanding his death. The Jews of that day had already a greater hatred of capital punishment than England, France, or Germany at present. Every effort was made by the tribunals to avoid it, even in the case of atrocious criminals; and with the result that it was extremely rare, and called forth remarkable sympathy.*

But the attacks ascribed to Jesus engender among Christians a very false, a very unjust idea of the native rule, which was gentle, humane, and considerate far beyond that of any contemporaries. It was founded upon the code called Mosaic, itself very good in its day; and this was perpetually softened and improved by the humane comments of devoted and laborious doctors of the law, who came from all ranks of the community, and sympathized with the poor. It is not credible that the administration was in violent contrast to the law. Industry and learning received chief honour; rich men taught their children some industrious art; many of the doctors lived by mechanical industry; there was no military aristocracy, no proud and wasteful monarchy, no unjust absorption of the land by a conquering caste; public education was established and compulsory. Profound devotion to the law and the prophets easily led to too anxious punctilio; but for this they did not deserve to be cursed and damned as hypocrites destined to hell, any more than do our lawyers for subtleties of interpretation. The weakness arises from the effort to get the best out of a fixed code. As far as our means of knowledge go, it is utterly untrue to call them oppressors of the poor. Even the malignant Romans do not accuse them of this. Tacitus distinctly says (Hist. v. 5), "Among themselves their fidelity is obstinate, and their tender kindness prompt, but towards all other peoples they have a foeman's hatred." No evidence whatever is produced against Jewish rule and Pharisaic sentiment, except this very intemperate and ferocious attack—as if it could justify itself? Will any approver of it tell us what good purpose it could answer to reiterate such words as, "Woe unto you, hypocrites;" "Woe unto you, blind guides;" "Ye fools and blind;" "Thou blind Pharisee;" "Child of hell;" "Serpents, engenderment of vipers," etc.; "Ye shall receive greater damnation," etc.? As Æneas in Homer says, "Nothing is so easy as to rail: many an old woman is apt in it." And how frightful a precedent in one who is to be a pattern of conduct to his followers! Not even the Christian theory that Jesus had a preternatural insight into the hearts and motives of those whom he so bitterly assaults will aid us to gather grapes from these thorns. If we were to read such an oration from a Mussulman saint in a land wholly unknown to us, we should pronounce it self-condemned. It is against general credibility that any class of rulers were all so wicked. In the worst times and nations are splendid exceptions, which no just and calm mind would overlook, but only a crude, illinformed, uncultivated,or frenzied unscrupulous orator. What high necessity can be imagined for this cruel speech? What mark has it that it proceeded from love, and was reluctantly uttered? Defiance and hatred breathe through it. Was the apostle James at all aware that his Master indulged in a tongue "set on fire by hell," and kindling all around to evil passion? The question itself suggests that the whole speech is spurious, and I gladly would believe it so; but alas! this tone against scribes and Pharisees, priests and lawyers, pervades all the gospels, diffusing the belief that there never was such a set of hypocrites, oppressors, and blood-thirsty bigots as the Jewish rulers, while ostentatious of religious acts. Yet it is well known that the Roman, Macedonian, and Persian empires were all ostentatiously religious, all cruel in war, and ruinously oppressive in peace. If Jesus had come into close contact with Roman administrators, he might have found their little finger thicker than a Pharisee's loins, and their whips scorpions. What would this speaker have said of Augustus Cæsar's government, if he had known the details? What of any modern European monarchy, not excepting self-complacent England and her laws of land? Without historical knowledge he could not be an equitable censor of the Jewish government. Pure and good administration is so difficult, that it can only be judged fairly by comparison of contemporary nations. The Jewish nation may well complain that they are cruelly slandered by the gospels. The invectives have been burnt into the heart of Christendom, so that the innocent Jews, children of the dispersion, have felt in millennial misery—yes, and to this day feel—the deadly sting of these fierce and haughty utterances.

The gospels are not satisfied with blackening and insulting the rulers, they attack the people also, though these are generally represented as favorable to Jesus. The fourth gospel is pre-eminent herein, holding up "the Jews" as blind, carnal, and miraculously stupid. Its Jesus plays on their stupidity, in order to set forth both his own wisdom and his ample diction in reviling. "If God were your father (says he), ye would love ME; ye are of your father, the Devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do; he was a murderer from the beginning, a liar, and the father of lying." Such language flowing spontaneously forth from a full heart, does not illustrate the wisdom from above, which James so beautifully describes. It is truly odd if the romancer thought this to be the way of winning love. Much rather may familiarity with such invective presented as sacred wisdom, be deemed a school of bigotry. Apparently many a pope has tuned his tongue in unison with this model of meekness, lowliness of heart, and gentleness.

It seems to be a prevalent idea, propagated by the gospels, that the death of Jesus has justly been visited on the Jewish nation, in the crushing, continuous oppression which they have endured from Christians. Jesus is made to reproach Jerusalem for killing the prophets; but how very small is the guilt of Judea compared to that of Christendom! From our Henry V. onward to Mary, England has cruelly burnt to death countless righteous men and women, who had given no provocation, and much longer kept up various persecutions. France is far more guilty; Italy and Spain, the Pope and the Inquisition, worse still. The law of Moses commanded to put to death any false prophet; Christendom has no such excuse; but considering that precept, esteemed sacred, Judea was remarkably mild. At the same time, the charge against Judea which is put into the mouth of Jesus seems to confute itself by anachronism as certainly not his, but a very late fiction. He is made to declare that Jerusalem shall bear the punishment of all the righteous blood which has ever been shed upon earth.

* We read that the ladies of Jerusalem formed a society which provided a mixture of myrrh and vinegar, thought to benumb suffering to the victim. This mixture is mentioned in Mark at the crucifixion, and must have been offered from humanity; but Matthew's informant (learning details of Messiah's history from Psalms fancied to be Messianic) turns it into gall and vinegar, and even puts into his mouth the unworthy utterance that God has forsaken him. "John" trumps up a piece of history out of the Paschal Lamb! The sponge with vinegar must certainly have been offered with humane motive. A dash of vinegar purified water for Roman soldiers—making a wiser mixture than our grog.

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINTEENTH CENTURY.

INTRODUCTION.

Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order (in THE TRUTH SEEKER) a declaration of those things recorded in the Bible concerning the the "holy" men of God—Noah, Abraham, Jacob, David, Solomon, and many others—it seemed good to me also, having a perfect understanding of all these things from the very first, to write unto thee, in order, most excellent Bennett, that thou and thy readers mightest know the certainty of those things relating to the "holy" women of God, wherein thou oughtest heretofore to have been instructed.

Now, Eve, our first mother, encompassed Adam night and day, with many persuasive looks and soft, enticing words, till, in the ardor of his affection, he succumbed to her winning charms, which effect was most disastrous on himself and all posterity. Without which, no clothing would have been needed for a covering; without which, no toil for man or beast; without which, no murderous Cain slaying his brother; without which, no sin, no sorrow, no pain, no death; without which, no knowledge, no reason, no experience, no choice, no progression; without which, a child-like simplicity, a trusting confidence, an unquestioning credulity, would have pervaded the whole human family. God would have never been the stern, inexorable judge, but the merciful, loving father; he would never have cried out in a paroxysm of rage, "Where art thou, Adam?" would never have exclaimed in thunder tones, "Who told thee that thou wast naked?" would never have frightened Adam into accusing his Maker and his darling new-made wife, in order to excuse himself, in such reprehensible language as the following: "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat" (Gen. 3, 12); would never have cursed the serpent above all cattle and beasts (who, it appears, was previously uncursed); would never have commanded him henceforth and forever to go upon his belly, and eat of the dust of the earth; would never, in anger, have said unto Madam Eve, whom once he had pronounced "very good," "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee;" would never have reprimanded Adam for hearkening unto the voice of his lovely wife, and cursed the ground for his sake, and compelled him to eat of it in sorrow all the days of his life; would never have driven him out of Eden, the paradise wherein he had placed him and intended he should remain, but for Eve's insatiable curiosity and Adam's weakness in listening to her seductive wiles. O, that accursed apple! what has it not cost us! O, Eve, thou mother of all living, what a powerful being wert thou, since thou didst hold in thy keeping the destinies of the race; since thou didst change the decrees of Almighty God; since thou (and the serpent) didst pervert the whole order of nature, turn topsy turvy all God's work, upset his infinite, divine plans, thwart his best-made schemes, putting him to his wit's ends, compelling him to pause just where he stood, and begin again and do his work all over! What a power in one snake and one woman!

> "Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat,
> Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
> That all was lost."

O snake, how couldst thou do this? how couldst thou encourage in thy wicked heart a desire to overthrow thy God! O woman! O man! behold thy work! the work we are called to contemplate in these histories of the godly women of the Bible, without whom the Hebrew records would be incomplete, a savior unknown, and man unredeemed!

Pious Correspondence.

Deacon Skidmore's Letter.—No. 2.

Mr. Editur of The Truth Seeker: Yure paper haz cum too hand, and I see yu hav printed my letr. Good for yu. I didn't hardly beleev yu wood be magnanimus enuf too print my hard-shel episl, but I must giv yu grate kredit for liberality if yu are lost in the dark on other subjex. I hav glanst over yure kolums and tho I se Infidelity stiking out in almost evry line, sins yu hav bin kind enuf to giv my letr such a good plase, and in such good, fare tipe, I must aknolej that the kurse iz taken off the hul paper too a grate extent. Yu no "a litl levn levneth the hul lump." So it iz with the grase ov Jezus, and a tru fathe in the saving effikasy ov hiz blud. If a man haz a du share ov theez, we kan put up with a good deel that amounts almost to pure devlment. Now I no thare ar sum fokes in our church that kood hardly be endurd in the sosiety of desent peepl if it waz not for the strong fathe tha konfes in that saving blud. I must one up too yu rite heer in the start that tha wil li and cheet, tha wil oppres the wido, the poor and the simpl; tha wil not pa thare onest dets if tha kan keep out ov it any wa in the wurld, and tha wil slander thare nabors; tha wil borro and not return, and all that and more too ar tha gilty ov evry da ov thare livze, but tha doo aksept the blessed blud of Jezus which washes awa all sin and unkleennes, and we are taut too beleev tha wil be admitted into the kingdom, and wil ware az brite krouns, and sport az much hevnly juelry az thoze hoo try too akt onest.

O, Mr. Editur, that blud iz the gratest thing that waz ever devizd sense the sun shone; tho wun's sins ar az skarlit, it washes them az white az wool; it konverts a bad man into a sante, and turns into anjels ov purity thoze hoo wood not otherwize be fit for the land, nor the dung-hil. I tel yu thares nuthing like that blud. My deer fello-sinner, let me entreet yu too hav an intrest in that blud. Thare iz a fountin ov it larj enuf tu wash the hul wurld if tha wil only step in and be klenzd from thare iniquitys. My dying frend, doo step into this fountin and be klenzd from all yure bad deeds, and all yure unbeleef. Izent it kurius how wun being kood furnish so much blud, so that all the wurld kan bathe in it if tha wil? I sumtimes think ov that, and wunder how it kan be possibl, but then I don't allow myself too dout anything about that blud. It iz my only chans for salvashun in the wurld to kum, and I kan never giv it up. The thawt duz sumtimes kum into my mind if that fountin must not after a while get pretty foul, so many peepl ov all deskripshuns ar washing off in it, and klensing themselvs from so much impurity, but I don't allow myself to think much in that line. I no it iz my duty to aksept all the hevnly truths, and beleev in all the misterys ov godlines. I am led to suppoze that thare iz sum plan by which that fountin kan be kept sweet and pure, tho wun mite think if he giv hiz mind up to karnal reezn that in such hot wether az we hav had lately, it mite begin to smel a litl; but that iz wun ov the buffetings of the devil, and it iz rong to lisn to them.

Speeking about the shortkumings and misdeeds ov sum pius Kristyans, I hav sumthing to tel yu under that hed after a while. We hav in Zion Hil church sum pretty striking examples ov sinning Kristyans, and I woodent wunder if I shood sumtime consider it my duty to let the lite ov truth shine in a litl upon sum ov thare dark deeds. I kant sa I felloship with much ov the doings that take plase in this favord komunity. In the Zion Hil Baptist church we hav 165 members hoo partake ov the sakrament, and not kounting the litl children ov the beleevers, hoo will in the natural corse ov things, the most ov them, becum members after a while. Out ov thees 175 members, 107 ar females, old and yung, and that leevs only 58 ov the male purswashun. It iz a sumwhat melankolly fakt that menfokes, poetikally kalld "the lords ov kreashun," do not take az naturally to relijun az the wimmen do, and I hav meny times thawt that females kan luv Jezus eezier and hartier than it iz possibl for a man too doo. Tha ar luvin kreeshers, enywa, and tha all want sumbody too luv, and Jezus iz a very handy substitute. 2 miles and a haf from Zion Hil, on the Trenton rode, iz Pius Holler, and thare iz a Methodist church, and tha hav got more members than we hav in our church. In all, tha hav, old and yung, good and bad (and I feer the latter ar the most numerus), 217 members, and ov that number 139 ar wimmin and 78 men. Sumhow the Methodists kan alwaze kount up more members than the Baptists or the Presbyterians. Thare iz a sertin klass ov peeple that take very kindly too Methodism. Thare hollering and shouting seems to draw in the rif-raf too a remarkable extent. But while konsiderable can be sed for the quantity ov our Methodist nabers, I kant sa much for the quality. I tel yu tha ar a pretty hard set. We hav got sum pretty tuf kases in our church, but I no more'n 20 in the Pius Holler Methodist church that I wood not hav admitted into Zion Hil Baptist church on eny akount whatever. If the questyun ov thare admishun into our fold waz put too a vote by the rasing ov the rite hand, I wood rase both ov mine az hi as I cood reech aginst thare admishun. I spose I aut to be charitabl too the folloers ov Jezus, if tha doo not partake ov hiz body and blud at the same tabl I doo, but thare ar sum members in ful felloship in Parson Smiler's church (Parson Smiler iz the minister in the Holler) that I wood almost be ashamed too be seen tauking too on the hiwa; I don't want too sa much now about the members ov Pius Holler church, but probably ma hav more too sa after a while. In passing, however, I wil tel yu that wun ov thare members haz bin to State prizn for making a mistake and putting another man's name to a note for 75 dollers; wun haz bin tride in our kounty kourt for a 2 yeer old heffer and 11 sheep being kept 6 weeks in hiz pastyur that belongd too other men, and the kase went agenst him, but hiz lawyer took an apeel, and it iz now pending in the hier kourt, whare evrybody thinks he wil be beet. Sum say it wil kost him over 1,000 dollers. Wun man was sude for slandering Miss Kimbal, and had to pa 50 dollers and kosts. 13 hav ben sude for det. and judgments ar hanging over 9 ov them now; 2 had a regular nok down fite about 250 old rales, and Brother Braddon giv Brother Green a sound pummelling, and tha wer brawt up before the Church, and Parson Smiler gave them a regular lekture. 3 hav bin akused ov steeling, but had no trial. 6 ov the prominent members ov that church doo not pa thare hierd men az tha agreed too, and hav had a good deel ov fussing about it. Thare iz a mitey site ov quarreling in that church, among both the men and wimmin, and the female porshun ov the kongregashun doo beet all kreashun for back-biting and gossiping. Tha not only tawk in a most ungodly manner about thare own members, but tha giv our Zion Hil fokes down the banks too, at a terribl rate.

I mite keep on in this wa for thre ours, tawking about the shortkumings ov the Pius Holler fokes, but I don't think it iz quite rite, and so I refrane; but I must menshun wun pekuliarity, and that iz, having babys without going throu the marrij seremony. Why, in the last ten yeers I hav kounted in Pius Holler church twenty-thre babys that hav bin born and it waz not none for sertin hoo thare fathers wer—tho sum pepl thawt tha kood ges pritty close. I hope I ain't betraing much konfidens when I tel yu that thre ministers hav bin akused ov being fathers ov them. Parson Smiler iz filling hiz third yeer with them, and the old wimmen do sa for sertin that he iz the father ov Nansy Hawkins' child, and Minny Sprage's, and Kitty Foster's. These girls thawt a grate deel ov thare deer minister, and when tha felt az tho the trubls ov life bore hevily upon them, tha went too Parson Smiler for konsolashun, and it iz thawt tha got it. He iz a kind-harted man, espeshally too the yung sisters; he speeks too them very mild, and tha doo sa he haz a wunderful sweet smile. The parson that waz at the Holler before Mr. Smiler waz Bruther Luvwel, and he waz thare thre yeers, also. Thare ar fore litl toheds running about in the naberhood that bare a striking rezemblans too Parson Luvwel, and the noing wuns sa he shurely iz the father. Too ov the mothers wer girls and too wer yungish widos. Bruther Luvwel waz extremely popular with the wimmin fokes, and tha hated to hav him leev, but the men, espeshally thoze that wer marrid and had grone dawters, thawt it waz very wel that hiz time waz up. He iz now sed too be doing a very lively biznis in Midlsex kounty. I hope, for the good name ov the kauz ov tru relijun, that he wil try and keep the baser pashuns a litl in chek. I find that ministers, with all thare advantajes and holy instruxyuns, ar only men, after all, and that when tha hav not the spirit ov God in them tha ar just az eezily led astra az eny komon person.

I wil just remark too yu—but I don't kare about yure putting it in yure paper—that I hav sumtimes had my doubts about the Methodists being ov the tru seed ov Izrael. Tha seem too hav such a strong inklinashun too follo after the lusts ov the flesh that it haz sumtimes been hard to axept them az jenuin Kristyans, and it doo go agenst the grane a litl too kall them brothers in Kriste. But when I remember that tha hav washt in that same fountin of Jezus' blud, and that tha ar bound for the happy land ov Kanyan, just az much az the Baptists, I hav too giv in and one them az brothers and sisters in the gospel. Tha insist that thare church iz just az good and respektabl az ours, but I kan't think so; and thare faults ar so plane too be seen that I kannot help menshuning them wuns in a while. I hope yu wil not think strange ov it. I wil pra God to make them better and more perfekt.

I ges I hav sed about enuf for this time, and wil not detane yu longer; but I must just observ that my dawter Suzan haz just kum into the room. She haz ben looking over yure paper, and sez she likes it betr than she expekted. Sum things, she sez, seem a litl harsh and irreverenshal, but she likes yure boldnes and currij. She sez she did not no there wer so meny contradixyuns in the good old Bible az yu sho thare ar. I hav not red that part yet, but wil before I rite yu agen. Suzan sez, "Pa, I wish, in yure letters too The Truth Seeker, yu wood spel like uther fokes, and not be so od." We know many of our readers will feel obliged to us for asking their particular attention to the conspicuous advertisement of Lawrence & Co., Bankers, in this issue of our paper, headed "A Good Plan." The new combination system of operating in stocks which this house have had in use for several months is attracting much attention in financial circles in all parts of the country, and is the most successful plan ever known. It is rarely such a favorable opportunity presents itself for making money in the New York Stock Market, and we know numerous of our readers will be glad to avail themselves of it. By direct correspondence with parties in New York we learn that the house of Lawrence & Co. is regarded as sound and reliable in every respect.

Add to the power of discovering truth, the desire of using it for the promotion of human happiness, and you have the great end and object of our existence. This is the immaculate model of excellence that every human being should fix in the chambers of his heart; which he should place before his mind's eye from the rising to the setting of the sun; to strengthen his understanding that he may direct his benevolence, and to exhibit to the world the most beautiful spectacle the world can behold, of consummate virtue guided by consummate talents.—Sydney Smith.

Letters from Friends.

"THE CHAMPIONS OF THE CHURCH."

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 21, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I must confess that I was pleasantly and agreeably surprised on reading "The Champions" to find it vastly more interesting than I had anticipated that even thy facile and fertile pen could render it. I never imagined "dry historical characters" could be made to stand out so distinctly and so vividly entertaining as the personages are made to do in this inestimable volume—thy last, longest, finest, and BEST work.

I do believe there are very few subjects which could not be made readable if touched upon by thy magic pen. Thee may well feel a just and honorable pride in all thee has accomplished in the way of writing and publishing tracts, papers, and books. I am sure all thy readers and admirers feel proud for thee, and proud of thee, and one of them feels more than proud!

This book is well fitted to be the crowning work of all that has gone before it, for it shows up by strong, indubitable historical proofs and facts, all the villainy, hypocrisy, craftiness, guile, treachery, and licentiousness of the holy and pious fiends who have been most prominent in advancing, fostering, protecting, and forcing upon people the wickedest superstition that has ever cursed the world—the Christian Mythology!

The long catalogue of cruelties and crimes perpetrated by these "champions," in the name of Christianity, shows this religion to be a vile fraud upon our race! By its fruits shall ye judge it; and if any one can read these 1120 pages of pure facts, carefully collected and faithfully recorded, and then say Christianity has been, or is now, a blessing to the world, it will be because they are totally blinded by prejudice and preconceived opinions, and so cannot see the truth as it is. When such a villain as Alexander VI. can hoodwink and dupe a community, and even a whole country, into making him a "vice-god," and deeming him a perfect embodiment of purity and holiness, virtue and honor, it is time the system that fosters such wicked piety should be shown up exactly as this book shows it up, in all its naked and horrid deformity.

It is not pleasant to read of brutal men and their brutal actions; to read of hearts so base and vile as these "champions" possessed; of souls so insincere, so lost to all that is great, good, noble, and true; to read of cruel sufferings, agonizing pain, and indescribable tortures inflicted upon helpless, innocent, and conscientious human beings, simply because they did not believe in the faith of those cruel, inhuman, and heartless wretches whom the law made the lords and masters of their fates and fortunes.

If it is shocking to the kind and tender sensibilities of a man or woman to read these things, it must surely be hard for one like thee, whose every impulse is for good, to write of them—to hunt out from the records of vileness such portions of the iniquities of the pious old hypocrites, such paragraphs and facts as will do to publish to the world! When I read what awful horrors thee has selected, and think of those vast volumes that are yet untold, I wonder and almost tremble for its effect upon thee. To touch pitch is to be defiled; to roam among crimes and criminals is to accustom one's self to the dark and the horrible. But to unmask hypocrisy and deception, we must first see and know it; and to come out unscathed, we must feel that we are working for a high and noble purpose; and that this spirit alone animated thee, who can doubt that gazes upon the mild, benevolent, noble, and manly face that looks out from the book, as a frontispiece?

Only thy great love for suffering, deluded humanity, thy strong desire to aid and assist in freeing a creed-cursed world, could have induced thee to thus portray the character of such wretches as were these "Defenders of the Faith."

What a contrast the book is to the "World's Sages and Thinkers!" Every one who reads the one should read the other, so they may see the vast difference between the fruits of a religious life and a moral one; between faith and works; between the true and the false; between workers for this world's good and happiness, and those who believe evil, do evil, and continually cause evil to the world.

How like these "champions" were to the reputed founder of their faith—the meek and lowly Lamb of God! talking and prating always of God and the Church, but full of self and selfish interests. They cursed, anathematized, and tortured all who did not believe and do their will. He cursed all who did not believe his words, and called them thieves, robbers, Satan, etc., and consigned them to the everlasting and eternal flames of hell. The popes claimed infallibility, and so did Jesus! The popes offered forgiveness of sin, and so did Christ. The popes put on an outward semblance of meekness and holiness, and so did the lowly Nazarine, but at heart each was working for the papal chair and his special creed. Christ boasted that all the world should one day believe in him; popes have always labored for the same end! If the "champions" tortured and punished for a few years or days, the Savior did infinitely worse—he promised endless and indescribable tortures! No sweet, gentle death-sleep could ever come to put the sufferer out of his torments; there was no hope, forever and forever! Oh! how I do wish everybody could read this book, and would think as they read that the fruits of those bad lives are all the legitimate result of Christianity. I hope they will remember that it is not a chapter of horrors gathered up simply to put down Christianity, but it is every word truth—awful, solemn, horrible truth. For thirty years I have been reading and condeming the faults and vices of Christianity, as viewed from our standpoint. I have read of the wars, murders, bloodshed, and tortures it has inflicted upon suffering humanity, but never, till I read "The Champions of the Church," did I half realize the monstrous and endless list of enormities which were done in the name of religion, by its defenders and propagators. I do hope the book will find readers all over the country. It contains more real facts against Christianity than any volume I ever read, or any ten volumes. It should be in the hands of every Liberal, and every Christian should read it and judge whether it is worth his while longer to defend such a disgraceful institution, and one so injurious to the well-being of his race. The introductory pages are full to the brim of valuable information. The whole body of the work is crammed with facts, quotations, and convincing arguments and testimony, and the concluding remarks are telling and conclusive, indeed.

To do justice to such a work as "The Champions of the Church," one would have to read and re-read, and carefully digest the whole. To over-estimate its value and importance is impossible. So all we can do is to congratulate thee on thy success, and bespeak for it a large and ever-increasing sale and popularity. Thine, appreciatively,

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

BRO. BENNETT: We had a rousing indignation meeting in old Faneuil Hall last night. The hall was packed to its utmost capacity. Every speaker seemed inspired for the occasion. Red-hot shot were fired into Y. M. C. A., Comstock, Judge Clark, and Clifford ranks, from 8 o'clock until near 11. New York retrieved its honor. It lost it in sending that modern Torquemada—Anthony Comstock—from scandal-begetting, nest-hiding, hypecritical Brooklyn to teach us morality by law; but when Mr. Wakeman and Prof. Rawson worked so nobly and eloquently for the imprisoned Heywood, we decided that New York had redeemed herself. Dr. Foote, Sr., and his amiable wife, were also here, but the doctor is entirely too modest. He secreted himself in the gallery, and did not come out of his hiding-place until the meeting had adjourned. This is laid up against him, and if he is caught in Boston again he shall do penance, by speaking a whole evening.

The ex-Rev. Francis Ellingwood Abbot was present at the meeting, but he declined (not publicly, however) to raise his voice in behalf of the oppressed.

Laura Kendrick has established regular meetings in Boston. Her friends all have strong hopes of her success. We would like nothing better than to see her settled as the permanent pastor of the Stirpicultural Church.

Benj. R. Tucker has taken hold of Bro. Heywood's Word, and "The Word is made flesh, and dwells among men." The Word, always spicy, has lost none of its vigor under its new management.

I am still riding my greenback hobby. I commenced it in 1867, and now I must confess it looks a little as though, for once in my life, the popular side was getting around toward me. But you need have no fear of my becoming popular. I hold heresies enough to damn me in the estimation of a majority who float on the tide which sets in toward greenbacks.

Hoping that you and THE TRUTH SEEKER may live forever, I am, as ever, MOSES HULL.

STERLING, IOWA, July 28, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND: "The Champions of the Church" was duly received, and it has occupied my particular attention during the past week; and I find it a storehouse of knowledge well adapted to Liberals of every shade, with weapons of offense and defense so much needed by Liberals at the present time. It is a good outfit of historical facts, and, secured as it is for a small sum, will enable even an unlearned person to hold his own in argument against priestly bigotry and superstition. It shows up the inconsistencies and cruelties that have been taught and practiced since the introduction of Christianity; how one sect has put to the rack and torture their fellow-men for difference of thought and opinions in creeds, whenever and wherever the power to do so could be obtained by intrigue, force, or fraud. The history of witchcraft and its victims, in every Christian country, is sufficient to make a man exclaim, There is no devil that could compare with those created in the image of the gods; and all the gods combined could never invent or create the atrocious cruelties that have been introduced by the "human form divine." The introductory article is an instructive lecture of itself, and I call "The Champions" by far the best book that you have published yet, and one without which no Liberal library is complete.

Yours truly, THOS. B. JOHNSON.

ST. CATHERINES, CANADA, July 28, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: Please accept the $1.00 I inclose with this, one half for two copies of Jean Meslier which I had and sold, and the other half for a copy of Kidder's "Secrets of Bee-Keeping," paper cover, which copy please send by return mail.

Your reply of the 20th inst. to F. L. Moffet, headed "Spiritualism and Atheism," has given a very decided Atheist, a particular friend of mine, great relief and satisfaction. In his former life he was a Methodist preacher, possessed of a strong mind, a very extensive reader; in fact, read himself from orthodoxy to Atheism; but he has since had a lurking desire to harmonize the Spiritual philosophy with it; yet, with all his reading, reasoning, and investigation, he could not do so. But on reading said reply he hastened to me to return the paper and inform me that you had in that reply placed the matter before him in a light in which he had never seen it before, and it seemed a relief to him, looking now to him, as it does, as if the two may, peradventure, be made to harmonize.

The thought, after an active and varied life on this earth, that we shall realize no future existence is saddening. In view of the knowledge we have of a positive existence here, I, for one, do not feel justified in denying a future existence of some kind, although we may have no positive proof of it. Reasoning from analogy is admitted correct at the time. In my elaborate spiritual investigations I have obtained a large amount of intelligent matter, and in asking from what source it came, the answer invariably was, From spirits. Now, if it does not come from that source, I must candidly aknowledge that I can account for it in no other way, and I have made every effort that my faculties would admit of to do so. Your replies to Mr. Pindar are excellent, and receive the sanction of my Atheist friend every time.

Thine as ever, C. B. THOMPSON.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

Liberals of the West! Are you going to attend the great Freethought gathering which will convene at Watkins, N. Y., August 22d? There should be many a sturdy Liberal of the West at that meeting. It should be a national, not a local or sectional convention. Each of you who can spare the time and means can and should help to give to it such a national character. Attend this notable gathering near the beautiful Watkins Glen and help to make it the greatest Freethought demonstration ever known in this country or the world. There you will meet your fellow-Liberals from all parts of this great land; there you will listen to the words of eloquence and truth as they fall from the lips of America's most able Freethought champions, and there you shall assist to forge still stronger the chain of fraternal union which should bind all the defenders of freedom in one great common brotherhood. When you are there convened and feasting upon the rich mental repast spread before you, do not forget those, our brothers and sisters, whom a stern necessity will not permit to be with you. Above all, do not forget those martyrs to liberty of conscience who now languish in the cold prison-cells of the tyrant. Let no uncertain sound go forth from your midst at this hour. Be practical. Let no mere theoretical questions abide. Deal with the living issues which are now presented for our consideration. Make the Watkins Convention an event in the history of American Freethought. Fall in for a grand forward movement all along the line.

Fraternally, E. C. WALKER.

YPSILANTI, MICH. July 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In last week's number of you paper, brother O. Jones, of Mineral Springs, Ark., asks, in a kindly way, if I understand him, what constitutes money. I would answer, in the same spirit, that money, so far as we as a nation are concerned, is whatever the laws of our land proclaim it, whether gold, silver, iron, copper, nickel, or paper, or any other material; not what the gold and silver diggers would make it, any more than what the farmers would make it by raising wheat, corn, or pork, or digging potatoes, which are worth their price in the market as well as gold and silver. For naught is money till law makes it so. Law says what shall constitute a dollar, and it is right that it should, and that constitutionally, at once, and for all time. As it is not proper that that which is called a dollar should ever vary, let hills and mountains dissolve, but let the dollar never change in value.

As I have stated my opinion as to what power should make a dollar, I will now say what I think it should be made of. As paper is the cheapest of any material, and, when stamped as money, the most easily handled, and as it costs but little to stamp it, I say, Make money of it, and have it irredeemable. Put it out to wear out. Our fractional currency gave full satisfaction as a medium of exchange. And when a dollar or any part of a dollar becomes mutilated, let the Government, at its own expense, through its post-offices, redeem it.

If it should be necessary for us to have gold and silver for foreign purposes, leave it in bulk or bullion, not coining it, as other powers accept it only by weight; then we save the cost of coinage. Give us good, sound, and wholesome laws, that shall bear on all—rich and poor—alike, that our commercial interests may not be controlled by the fluctuations of money; but le tthat be as permanent as the granite rock. Then our finances will easily regulate themselves. Let our greenbacks be a legal tender for all debts, public and private; let our nation call in all her bonds, pay them, and burn them, then never issue more. Repudiate nothing, but pay the last cent, whether in metal or paper, as the honor of our nation may demand. Let the gold and silver mines be managed by the Government, that her vaults may be full for any required demand. Then why are we not that independent nation we claim to be? Place the greenback dollar in the place of bonds; then our debts are paid and our interest saved where we are now paying our millions in interest. I would here state that the value of the "fiat dollar," as our friend calls it, is the value that law gives it, and not what the various commodities give it.

And as good, sound, and wholesome laws should serve us as pilot, chart, and compass for our country's safety, may the Ship of State never be forced to sea without a full crew to man her well, and bring her home in safety to the arms of her beloved people.

Yours for the right, J. NEWELL.

JUDSON, KAN.

FRIEND BENNETT: Here, in this fair land, the very word Infidel seems to fill men and women with horror. An Infidel is regarded as though he were a lawless wretch at war with all creation, with all creation at war against him. For, regarding all books as the work of man, he is regarded as an agent of the devil. For, not bowing to an imaginary God, he is talked about by Mrs. Grundy and believed to be accursed of the Unknowable. Orthodoxy admits one into society; hetrodoxy expels one from it.

Shortly after my arrival here, the Rev. Mr. B., of this place, invited me to ride out with him to see the country. Thanking him for the invitation, I expressed my willingness to accompany him. In a few minutes we were off, and I was enjoying the strange pleasure which new and wild scenery affords the unaccustomed eye. The pleasure was transient, but all the more delightful owing to the sweetness of the hour. It was the hour in which

"Twilight lets her curtain down
And pins it with a star."

And in the azure shade of that delightful hour the boundless, rolling, snow-wreathed prairies seemed like the proud, majestic, wild, foam crested ocean. It was not designed that I should have long to contemplate and admire the wild beauties of nature just then, for my reverend friend was bent on something else. Knowing that a brother of mine, who has resided here for over a year, entertained rather skeptical views regarding the authenticity and divinity of the so-called "divinely inspired" word of God, my reverend friend resolved to know what my views were on the subject. A few point-blank questions, followed by as many point-blank answers, settled the matter beyond a doubt, and probably filled my friend with holy horror. I endeavored to express my views with the most profound, innocent simplicity. My pious, sympathizing friend seemed to think it too bad that a young man like myself should be so far astray, having the tendency to lead others astray also, when, otherwise, I might have had quite a good influence. Darkness setting in, we set out for the home of my friend, where supper awaited our coming. On being introduced to the family, we sat down to the table of good things, and reverently bent our heads while my friend gently alluded to my lost condition, pleading that I might be brought to the fold of Christ; then thanking God for his goodness and mercy to us all, etc., we began to eat. My reverend, pious, holy friend spoke in a manner well calculated to impress us with a sense of his superior wisdom—lamenting my "blindness and folly." He lectured, conjectured, wondered, and pondered; but all in vain. For the more we talked the more he felt impressed that his efforts were only useless. I afterwards learned that he regards me as irretrievably lost.

The report soon spread that I was a skeptic or Infidel. One young friend thought that it was such a pity, for I was not a bad-looking fellow. She evidently thought that an Infidel must, in order to fill the bill, look like a regular cut-throat. Hell-fire and cooked Infidels have rendered me almost popular in my unpopular sphere. Through the exceeding care of the wary shepherd, a natural indifference on the part of his flock has sprung up between us, which otherwise might be supplanted with mutual love and friendship. Reflecting on this, of course, makes me uncommonly sad. Just read what one of the frolicsome ewes left between the leaves of a book which had been borrowed and was lately returned to me:

"These on the rock are they which, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and these have no root which for a while believe and in time of temptation fall away."

Please publish my reply. If the gentle shepherd expounds its meaning to his flock as he does the meaning of the Scriptures, I might be admitted to the fold; and if not, it is quite probable that I might be admitted anyway.

THE REPLY.

Thus thinking me rootless, you shun me like cold!
What folly there is in believing
Everything that we hear, everything that we're told,
When everything is so deceiving!

Oh, can proof of this life-giving root win thy grace,
And unite us in love's jurisdiction?
With thee, my fair judge, I will enter the case,
When open thou art for conviction.

Just whisper the word—I shall hear it, dear maid,
And obey it, despite all temptation;
I'll receive it with joy when all doubt seeks the shade
Of practical life demonstration.

Not till then can I heavenly transport enjoy;
For everything is so deceiving
That, till left without even a doubt to employ,
There is nothing that's worth the believing.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please announce, for the benefit of friends, that I have secured rates from here to Watkins and return, including a trip up the Seneca Lake from Geneva and return, at $7.25; without the Lake trip, $5.75. Watkins is my native place. I was raised there, in a minister's family, till the age of fourteen; and being acquainted with its romantic scenery and accommodating citizens, I can guarantee every visitor a splendid time.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Eclipse Day, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I wish the privilege of saying a few grateful words to all those who have spoken so kindly and flatteringly in THE TRUTH SEEKER of "The Darwins" and "John's Way." I should rejoice to write to each one of them individually and personally; but both time and stamps are scarce, so I take the liberty of imposing on thy good nature by saying through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to one and all, how much good their words of commendation have done me. They have been an encouragement and a stimulus to greater and better efforts in the noble and glorious work of human progress and human emancipation from the thralldom of a blind and bigoted superstition. We all have a love for the approbation of our kind. We rejoice when we do or say something that meets the approval of others, and especially so when those others are of a class that we honor and respect. I have learned to prize and value many a congenial spirit as I have read the earnest words they have spoken in my pet paper for some pet hobby that I am wedded to. I see in this number now before me a letter from R. M. Casey, who is one af the most earnest and enthusiastic workers that we have in the cause. His sharp, sensible, and spicy letters are always very readable. I say, with him, that I hope something will be done just as soon as possible towards the release of Mr. Heywood from a wrong, unjust, and unlawful imprisonment. He is a good man, and has really broken no law of the land, or done aught that was evil or immoral; and I challenge all those who falsely judged him to show, any of them, a purer, cleaner record than his life-page possesses. All honor to Leland, who so thoroughly shows up those who advocate Comstockism, and exposes so well their weak points. Ella Gibson, too, is doing good work, and her energetic enthusiasm inspires her readers with renewed hope and courage for the cause of universal mental freedom. Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble band of workers! And may the choicest of earth's goods fall into the lap of our leader and champion, D. M. Bennett.

Thine earnestly and truly, ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

SOUTH GARDNER, MASS., July 22, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have received from you a copy of "The Champions of the Church," and find it very, very interesting. Also THE TRUTH SEEKER and the petition to President Hayes for the pardon of E. H. Heywood. I have known something of the Freethought press of this country for the past forty years, and, in my judgment, your TRUTH SEEKER stands at the head. May its banner wave until persecution and prosecution for opinion's sake shall be a thing forever of the past.

I have pasted paper to the petition, and having signed it, am presenting it to citizens for their signature. But I meet this difficulty, they all want to see the document, "Cupid's Yokes." So do I. Can you send me one? also the price, which I will remit in sending you the money for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly, SILAS ADAMS.

CARTHAGE, Mo., July 20, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I really admire your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER; it has no equal. Your position on Spiritualism was proof enough to me that you were, indeed a truth seeker; also it shows that you care more for truth and honest convictions than for sect. If you had not expressed your opinions on Spiritualism, I would not have been numbered among your subscribers. I have investigated Spiritualism every opportunity that presented itself, and am satisfied there is something in it; but what that something is, has never, as yet, been satisfactorily explained to me. I am in belief a Materialist. I believe there is nothing superior to the universe. I shed no tears when I think I existed not before I had an existence on this earth, and I see no reason to fret about the hereafter. If in seeking after scientific truths I am convinced there is a life to lead in a great hereafter, all well and good.

Respectfully yours, W. G. BRISTOW.

WACONDA, KAN., August 1, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I want you to stop pounding that cultured gentleman; is there no shame in you? Just look at his face, all black and blue where it is not red and green! Don't you know very well that he is a green-house exotic, and never was calculated to either give or receive lusty blows? His kind does sometimes produce very pretty flowers, but the least frost wilts them. Just stop, I say, or you will be considered a coward, to strike a man when he's down, and the blood from his nose filling his mouth, and the integuments so swollen around his eye as to show but a small green speck. If you let him alone now, the victory is yours; but give more blows and it will be lost. Thine for discretionary pluck, G. W. CHAPMAN.

MORRILL, BROWN CO., KANSAS, July 23, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I received the "Champions of the Church" some two days ago. You must pardon me for not acknowledging it before, but I was very busy harvesting and kept neglecting it. You made a mistake. I ordered one copy and you sent me two. I am expecting some money every day which is due me, and will remit you the money as soon as I get it—some time next week at farthest. The other I will send you as soon as I can sell it. I will send you my views on the book as soon as I examine it more. As far as I have examined, I like it well and think it should be in every family. Mr. Jamieson is to deliver a course of lectures in Sabethas, commencing the 25th inst. I heard him last Sunday; I like him well. His subject was "Truth." He spoke well and to the point. I wish you could take a holiday and make a trip out here and see our State and deliver a course of lectures as you went along. Why can't you? It will be a change for you; it would do you good. Leave THE TRUTH SEEKER in some able hands for a few weeks. There is many a friend out here who would like to see your old face and shake your hand. Nothing would do me more good. But I suppose we will have to forego that pleasure. You can't spare the time. Your duties call you elsewhere. That you may succeed in all your undertakings is the sincere wish of your friend. J. W. SCOTT.

[REPLY:—We should be extremely glad to make the trip which brother Scott has marked out. We should thereby be able to take by the hand many warm friends whom we highly esteem; but at present our duties are so exacting and continuous that we don't see how we can possibly leave home so long. We have resolved to attend the Watkin's meeting, and that will tax our time to the utmost; our friend must accept our thanks for his kind invitation.—ED. T. S.]

BLAIR, NEB., July 30, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Seeing a copy of the "Champions of the Church" the other day, I made up my mind that I would have one. It is just such a book as has been needed especially by the class of Liberals who are not able to own large libraries of their own, or have not access to public ones. Christianity has never received a harder knock. And if such men as the editor of The Index would work as faithfully and earnestly for the advancement of Freethought, instead of allowing his selfishness to get the better of his sense, more still might be acccomplished. But go on, brother Bennett, no such low, puerile attacks can blacken the good name you have so justly received from nine-tenths of all the Liberals in this country. Inclosed find $3.00 for the book above named. Respectfully, C. D. MARR.

GALION, O., July 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The book "Champions of the Church" came to hand in good order. I am pleased with it as far as I have perused. I thank you for your liberality, and the confidence you placed in me; will remit the price in a short time.

Have circulated the petition for the release of Mr. Heywood, and have procured a few signatures. Have asked none to sign but the most intelligent and best citizens. Some ask me if I know the character of the book (Cupid's Yokes) which Mr. Heywood sold, for which he was imprisoned. I answer that I do not, but have confidence in Mr. Bennett who sent out the petition. I have, however, met but one who declined to sign the petition. I should like very much to procure a copy, if it (Cupid's Yokes) can be had; first, for the use of myself and family; second, that I may answer interrogatories in the Heywood case intelligently. If you can procure me a copy I would be pleased to have you send me one, and I will remit price with that of the other book. Respectfully, W. R. DAVIS.

P.S. Always a steadfast and confidential friend.

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

ROCKFORD, ILL., July 29, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I often see mentioned in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER this subject of "God in the Constitution." Thinking that a few words on this subject might not come amiss, I would like to say something of how it appears. Now, the idea of recognizing some kind of a supreme architect and ruler of the universe in the Constitution of the United States, as it is set before the people by the friends of orthodoxy, may appear all plausible and right to a great many, and even to persons who take very little or no stock in the God idea, or at least in the God idea as taught by religionists, and those who believe in the literal God of the Jews, who, they say, gave to the Jewish nation a code of laws and rules of conduct, which they and all of the human race were bound to literally carry out in order to secure happiness in a future life, and that he did actually send his only son into this world to take upon himself the form of a man, in order that he might snatch a few of the creatures whom his father had made from the grasp of his and his father's most bitter enemy, and thereby save them from a state of endless misery.

I say that the sophistry used by this class is such as if calculated to catch the unwary, even to the procuring their signatures to a petition for this obnoxious amendment to the Constitution, little thinking of to what base purposes such an amendment might be put should it once become a part of our national Constitution; and it is to put such persons on their guard, if any such should be readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to all lovers of the liberty of conscience, I desire to say, that it would require but a small stretch of such an amendment (by such unscrupulous and relentless bigots as Anthony Comstock and the class that are upholding him in his cruel persecutions) to make it a mighty engine for the suppression of political and religious liberty in our nation. It would need but a little twisting of such a clause in the Constitution to close the office of every Liberal newspaper and publishing house in the land, and to close the mouth of every Liberal speaker who dared to give utterance to anything derogatory to the teachings of the Christian churches. Yes, and to deprive every person who does not acknowledge the supremacy of this God and his son Jesus Christ, of the right of franchise, or to fill any office or position of trust in this country, or to sit on a jury or appear as a witness in any court of law.

Such an amendment might appear to be very complimentary to the Christians' God and his son. But it would be hard on freedom of speech and a free press. It most certainly would not require so much stretching and twisting of this (to some so innocent and harmless) amendment to the Constitution in order to accomplish all of the things we have mentioned, as it does require of the so-called Comstock laws, by A. Comstock & Co., to do what they are and have been doing under the guise of suppressing obscenity; and should this amendment ever creep into our national Constitution, or in any manner become a law of the nation, as these Comstock laws have done, it would become a power for evil which would so far overshadow the Comstock laws that they would sink into insignificance and be forgotten; it would be like a thunderbolt from heaven on the head of every Liberal in the land; it would be inconceivably worse than the fugitive slave bill was in '52, which made every man in the nation a hound to hunt and catch runaway slaves. Many of our Liberals smile at the absurdity of the idea that the orthodox are ever going to get this God in the Constitution amendment passed; and it is this feeling of security on the part of Liberals that is helping them; and such men as Comstock and his ilk all over the country are working might and main to accomplish it, and petitions for the amendment may be found all over the country in the reading-rooms of the Y. M. C. A. and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and if we are not on our guard this thing will be sprung on us when we are the least prepared for it. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." F. F. FOLLET.

NEW MARKET, VA., July 20, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is simply impossible to express in words how thankful I feel to you for publishing and thereby rendering accessible to me such a repertory of philosophy and truth as Viscount Amberly's "Analysis of Religious Belief." The day must come when his last three chapters will command universal admiration, as the production of a mind, honest, sincere, and profound—a mind originating from a source more divine than matter, unless matter be a living, intelligent God. I have just finished for myself an analysis of these three chapters; and you must forgive me if I venture to assert that any man who will read these chapters with due attention, if he be a Materialist of the Realistic school, will be forced to see that what he calls matter is identical with what all primitive religion (not theology) calls God; if of the Idealistic, he must see that the God of pure religion is the "Persistence of Force" in philosophy.

I believe you are a true, honest, sincere thinker; you claim to be a Materialist, an Atheist. Read, I entreat you, these chapters, with all the attention they merit, and then consider if you have reason to excuse Lord Amberley, on the score of his youth, before "the advanced thinkers of the day." Most respectfully, J. SALYARDS.

FALSE CAPE, CAL., July 10, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Mrs. E. D. Slenker's stories are highly appreciated by all who read them, Christians not excepted, and they are read by many that would not read THE TRUTH SEEKER. Only for her pen, there would be a missing link in the chain of Freethought publications.

To T. S. Leland send greeting. Seventy thousand thanks for his noble defense of the signers of the petition against the insults offerred by the man of culture.

Our cause it is just,
And conquer we must;
For this is our motto:
In truth is our trust.

A. SWEET.

NAPLES, N. Y., July 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I send you to-day $1.60, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to W. E. Coleman for three months; also to John Dunton, both of this place. I took the first TRUTH SEEKER here, and have been cautiously feeling my way ever since. I hope to announce to you before long a Freethought organization, with all the necessary accompaniments, lectures, papers, and tracts for distribution, etc. These are all carefully marked out on the programme, and shall be fulfilled in due season. I am a mechanic, and depend upon my labor for the support of myself and family, and one must not make too great haste lest he fall.

It is a sorry thought that a man dare not speak his honest thoughts for fear the bread will be taken out of his mouth. "Free America," indeed! If one wants to be popular, he must hold up that bloody old gorilla and lecher, King David, as a man after God's own heart. He must rant about the feats of Samson, and swear by the powers of mud that Jonah did navigate the high seas in a big fish's belly, and scull his live craft with a big fish's tail. He must attend camp-meetings and get doubled up with the power, and then he's all right. Whoop, big Injun!

Yours for common sense, JOHN PECK.

MOULTON, IOWA, July 22, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. While for many years prior to taking it I had been gradually drifting on my own reflections along toward Liberalism, notwithstanding I had been raised a Methodist, and for many years I was a member of that Church; still I was much unsettled in mind as to the determination of what might be termed various points of belief, which your writings have already effectually settled, so that I am now entirely out of the woods of superstition of whatever kind, into the broad sunlight of truth and of free inquiry therefor. May you live long and ever prosper in the good cause which you have so earnestly espoused.

Fraternally yours, JOHN MOULTON.

Abolish the Dark Circle.

MR. EDITOR: Until the Spiritualists abolish the dark circle, their claim to court investigation will be hollow and meaningless. I have read "A Week With the Ghosts," by D. Jenkins, published in your paper of July 20th. We are referred to the distinguished ladies and gentlemen who believe Mr. Mott to be genuine—mayors, ex-mayors, secretaries of war and State, senators, and ex-senators. Is there any assurance that their eyesight is better than ours? Can they see further in the dark than we can? But we are informed that there is a light at Mott's circle. What kind of a light? Let friend Jenkins answer, "The light turned down and placed under a transparency." Where is Mr. Mott in the meantime? Not in that room where burns the dim, religious light, "turned down" "under a transparency." That is too light for Mr. Mott. He sits in an adjoining room, which is dark as a cellar at midnight. Mr. Jenkins says, "Mr. Mott is supposed to be sitting within in the darkness, entranced." Supposed! Is that what convinces so many honorable gentlemen and distinguished ladies? Our friend says there is "sufficient light to easily recognize each other's features." But is there enough to easily recognize Mr. Mott's features? Only by standing within a few inches of his face can you discern it when it appears at the aperture, "covered by a thick curtain on the inside," as Mr. Jenkins admits. With charming, child-like simplicity, Mr. Jenkins says, "The curtain is removed by invisible hands." Of course, the hands are invisible in thick darkness. Are we seriously asked to believe that manifestations under such circumstances are evidences of Spiritualism? Need we be astonished that people who are tired of Christianity, finding the alleged evidences of Spiritualism too puerile for acceptance, become Free Religionists and Materialists? I would respectfully suggest to the citizens of the spirit-world that if they have anything to do with dark circles they had better wait until the "conditions" will be favorable enough for them to manifest themselves in broad daylight. Yours for rational investigation,

Box 1250, Kansas City, Mo. W. F. JAMIESON.

Moody and Sankey on the Rampage.

BY MRS. MARY B. FINCH.

How fiercely the sacred fires crackle,
A-cooking souls in the tabernacle!
We pant for bread, but they sell us a brick,
And glorify God with a lottery trick.
The temple totters which they feebly hold,
But they prop it up with the gamblers' gold.
"Gather them in,"
They sing 'mid the din
(The new silver dollar they would gather in).
For we well know
The power of pelf makes the thing go.

Moody with his rusty armor on Goes forth, a Christian mastodon—
Armor of ignorance ungrammatical—
And Mumbo Jumbo quite fanatical.
Now we hear a saintly, solemn tone,
'Tis a dying note from the Hippodrome;
And Sankey sang
Till the arches rang,
The echoes chorused the organ's twang,
And Moody's roar,
As he stamped the floor,
Brought the "Hub" to the open door.

They flung to the breeze their fading banners,
And formed a "corner" on Boston sinners.
Though murder shroud them in blackest pall,
The blood of Christ will purify all.
A triune God, in his infinite power,
Yields the point at the latest hour.
When the minister comes,
With spiritual crumbs,
And Bible-scented sugar-plums,
And amid the row
And grand pow-wow,
A wretch swings off with a pious bow.

And starts in quest of his robe and crown
That faith had paid for in money down,
High in mid air, on his way to glory,
He meets a traveler, sad and gory,
And discovers at once his murdered victim—
Out of the surging throng he's picked him—
"You joined no church,
So you're left in the lurch;
St. Peter abhors the Infidel smirch;
Your way lies there,
Through the nether air,
While I ascend on a Christian's prayer."

But they met ere long at the golden gate
Of Peter, with Michael as Judge of Probate.
The twain agree 'tis shabby and mean
To employ a whining go-between:
"Depending on others to save your soul
Is the low-born trick of an ogre or ghoul.
We know no plan
Where a murdered man
Can be sent to hell, with the devil's clan,
While the guilty come in;
'Tis a premium on sin,
Most decidedly wrong and extremely thin."

Moody and Sankey, with many preachers,
Have grown quite lame as Christian teachers.
A jargon of theories, as mixed as can be,
Has wrecked their barks on the orthodox sea.
The bars are rent with masterly stroke,
For religion is used to fashion a cloak.
Insane their behavior,
Trusting their Savior;
'Tis a biblical farce of bad-smelling "flavior,"
Their doctrines mar
Our gates afar,
And we hold them all just a little below par.

The theological god is gold,
And Ruin runs riot in the monster's hold;
She rises rampant, with crescent sickle,
And buries her spoils in a tabernacle.
Go teach Earth's children this lesson to-day.
That ministers get their living by pray (prey);
While preying for bacon they pray for their bread,
And prey on the living while they pray for the dead.
Now war's crimson feather
Is calling together
The whole Christian world to prey on each other;
But few shall be given
A front seat in heaven,
And we'll furnish no fuel for Satan's oven."

[Michael retires with his bloody prize, while the newly-converted Christian murderer, feeling very shaky, creeps slyly in. Peter putting his keys in his pocket, goes in also, leaving the gates wide open, remarking as he does so, "We Liberals will eventually have it all our own way, as sure as my name is Peter."]

Recent Discoveries in Nebraska.

REMAINS THAT GO FAR TOWARD ESTABLISHING THE EVOLUTIONARY HYPOTHESIS.

The fossil discoveries in the Rocky Mountains, near Como station, on the Union Pacific Railroad, have proved to be of great importance to the scientific world. Until very recently, geological surveyors in the West, among them Hayden and King, announced that certain fossils of the reptile character found in the formations belonging to what geologists term the epoch of the triassic, or oolitic period, in different parts of Europe did not exist in similar formations in America.

This was a clear contradiction of the claims of evolutionists who, like Darwin, believe that the approximation to the age of man was the result of gradations, and hence where remains of animals exist that differ very radically in their structure from any others, there must of necessity be a connecting link somewhere; in other words, various specimens of animals must have existed which have succeeded those who had a resemblance to the first, which were gradually lost to sight in the changed conditions of nature around them.

Mr. S. W. Willston, the assistant of Prof. Marsh, of Yale College, who has been digging up fossils for several years in the mountains, was in Omaha on Sunday. He said: "I have been with Prof. Marsh now for nearly four years, devoting the summer time to the field, and the winter to classifications, etc. Our labors cover a very extended area, and though extended over a period of nearly four years, the most important discoveries have been made within two years."

Reporter—Your greatest discovery was that at Como station, on the Union Pacific Railroad, I presume?

Mr. Willston—No; the greatest was probably in Colorado; but that at Como was of considerable importance. The remarkable feature of our discovery is that the fossils that were reported as not existing in America had hardly been brought to light in one locality before thousands of tons of remains were simultaneously discovered in different places. Among the leading points are Como, Wyoming, Colorado Springs, Canyon City, and Morrison.

Reporter—Can you give me a general outline of these remains?

Mr. Willston—Yes; they are all petrified. The bones found exhibit animals of the reptile species of nearly all sizes, from that of a cat up to one sixty feet in height. The name of the animal found at Como is what is termed the Dinosaur; it belongs to the reptile species of the crocodile order. The remains give evidence that the animal stood up on its hind legs, somewhat like a kangaroo, and of course its head must have been about as high as the Grand Central Hotel of your city when he stood up. We found one in Colorado that, Prof. Marsh estimates, must have been about 100 feet in length. We found and collected a great many different remains of the same general class, but belonging to different species. We must have shipped from Colorado, Wyoming, and Kansas from 300 to 400 specimens of the dinosaur, and about 1,000 of what are known by the name of pterodactyl. The latter are a species of flying reptile, or dragon, that existed about the same age as the dinosaurs. We found a specimen of one whose wings were from thirty to forty feet from tip to tip. We found seventeen different species of this kind in the cretaceous or chalk formations of western Kansas. We also found remains of six species of toothed birds. Most of these same character of fossil are found, to a lesser extent, in the cretaceous formations of England, and also in Germany. The time when these animals existed must, of course, have been hundreds of thousands of years before the age of man. It was an age when the earth must have been much warmer than now, and when the trees and vegetation of which we find petrifactions in rock of the same formation possessed the same proportionate giant growth as these animals do to the present existing species.

Reporter—It must cost a vast amount of money to keep up a corps making the collections?

Mr. Willston—Yes; the fossil collections of Yale have cost about $250,000.

Reporter—What importance do you attach to your discoveries?

Mr. Willston—There is a great deal. In the first place, there were no such deposits found in America until a little over a year ago, and, when they were discovered, strange to say, they were found almost simultaneously in six different places. They are important in bearing upon the evolution theories, which are fast being accepted by a large body of the scientific world. For instance, in the various species of remains found, we have some that give evidences of having been so closely allied to the bird species by their hollow bones, etc., that but for the fact of their deficiency in the wing provisions, it would be as difficult to classify them as it is to distinguish between some of the higher order of plant and lower order of animal life. Evolutionists have averred that there must be a connecting link between animals heretofore found in this country. Hayden and others reported that none had been found in all their surveys, and hence, now that the discovery is made, it shows at least that, as evolutionists reasonably claim, nature makes no sudden changes. There is no doubt but that the many animals of this formation are the antecedents of the bird creation, or rather it marks the epoch of the gradual mergement or transitory state from walking mammals to the hollow-boned flying species.

Reporter—Am I to infer that you are a believer in Darwin's evolution doctrine?

Mr. Willston—Yes. Still, I confess, there are some very great savants who, though now apparently in the minority, antagonize that doctrine with many very cogent reasons. There was the late Agassiz, whom I regarded as even above Humboldt, and second only, perhaps, to Cuvier as a naturalist. He had a very fine, well-studied theory of his own, and even shortly before his death, while admitting that the evolutionary doctrine was gaining ground under such leaders as Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, and others, he still clung to his own matured views; and his son, who is following his footpath as a naturalist, only in a limited and more specific field, clings to his father's views.—Omaha Bee.

Thoughts on the Times.

The following letter, which we copy from The Investigator, is from one of the oldest, most substantial, earnest, and intelligent Liberals in the country:

FRIEND SEAVER: I was very sorry I could not be with you at Paine Hall during those discussions of thrilling interest to me, and to any man or woman who has any recognized feeling or sense between liberty and slavery, freedom or submission to the villainy and prejudice of Government usurpers. And then I was glad to learn by the reports that so many were falling into the line of battle that is being formed on the "obscenity" question—even at this late hour—that my whole heart went out in admiration and joy.

But no phase of the meetings was half so gladsome as the stand you have so nobly taken on the infamous Comstock raid upon the rights of citizens of Massachusetts. It has been agony to me to see our leading men, such as Abbot, Underwood, Ingersoll, etc., cringing to the Grundy family. Unconditional repeal, and thorough wiping out of that vile brood of vice-hunters, is the only safe ground for you and I, and every good, wholesome Materialist in the country. The nation is getting heartily aroused to the dangers that beset us through the malignity and prejudice of judges and juries. We are really under a legalized one-man power. Any moral or political cripple with money enough—stolen or inherited—to pay bummers and demagogues, can get a judgeship or agency, and then stand to the place assigned, or feel the maul of vengeance.

"These are days that try men's souls"—and bodies, too. Religion and morality in the hands of Clark and Clifford are as dragons' teeth to the remnant of individual freedom and the remaining fragments of constitutional liberty, until to-day we find our best citizens gobbled up and cast into prison, and counted as felons. Had our "headsmen" bent their forces in the right direction in the beginning of these Comstock raids, to-day the public opinion, sentiment, and indignation would have been so well pronounced that the forthcoming indignation meeting in Faneuil Hall would never have been called, and Mr. Heywood would be pursuing his lawful business, throwing his great, generous soul, his logical brain, his sincere purpose, and his literary acquirements into the cause of the "oppressed millions"—the feeders and clothiers and shelterers of the human race.

It was painful to me to see the Liberals in Paine Hall last January throwing away their large opportunities. I saw where we were drifting, and I left the hall with a weight of despair not yet wholly removed, even with all the good words proclaimed in your debates and in your columns. You have done your duty—though tardily—most manfully; and let the storms thunder over the heads of all trimmers and cowards until the whole breed of popularity-hunters are sunk in the sea full forty fathoms deep.

Liberals should not quarrel. Let our editors please bear this in mind. Mr. Abbot of The Index has done much for nicely educated rich folks, while Mr. Bennett of THE TRUTH SEEKER has a mission for the millions. Who made it possible for Liberal religionists to flourish in Boston? Why, Mr. Editor, the hand that holds this pen paid the first fifty dollars ever paid for the introduction and support of free religion in the city of Boston, through draft of William E. Channing, who created that hungering multitude following from town to town, from hamlet to hamlet, the clear-headed and very promising B. F. Underwood, Abner Kneeland, Dr. Charles Knowlton, you and Mr. Mendum, and others, whose deeds and lives have glorified Freethought and paid to unrelenting hate its cost value.

Heywood is in jail; and piety, Church, and Sabbath-school say, "Served him right!" Dedham may be proud of its inmate, for ages will elapse before Norfolk shall reap such honors again. Bruno glorified the stake; Kneeland glorified Leverett street jail; and Heywood has glorified all Norfolk county, and the unction of his sentence shall anoint the eyes of thousands, and the meshes of his handiwork shall stick to the ermine of Clifford like a chestnut burr.

Yours, A. H. WOOD.

A GOOD PLAN.

The best and most popular plan for operating stocks is that of combining capital of various sums, or pooling the orders of thousands of customers and operating them as one mighty whole in which shares are issued, which has been made so successful by the firm of Messrs. LAWRENCE & CO., Bankers, 55 Exchange-place, N. Y., the profits of which are divided pro rata among the shareholders at the expiration of thirty days from date of certificate. By this excellent plan each investor is placed on an equal footing with the largest operator. For example, within a month you made $2,000 upon an investment of $100, upon $25 the profit would be $500. An investment of $10 would pay $50, making 5 per cent. during the month. An investment of $100 would pay $1,000 profit, making 10 per cent.; an investment of $500 would pay $2,500 profit, making 5 per cent.; and so on, according to the market. The firm's circular explains everything. The editor of the Brooklyn Journal says: "The very satisfactory results made in these combinations by friends led us to order 20 shares, and at the final result we made a clear profit of $101.25 after deducting all commissions and our original investment. The firm is in every respect worthy of the utmost confidence. Send for their explanatory circular." Mr. H. F. Giddings has kindly tendered the firm his experience over his signature, as in no event would they use any of their customers' names without such authority:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1878.

LAWRENCE & Co., 55 Exchange Place. Dear Sirs:—Your favor contining your check for $1,376.63 at hand for which I thank you, as it is in excess of what I expected. As to your request for an expression in writing from me, I can cheerfully say that the above result is very satisfactory, and I believe I can safely recommend your combined system to everybody. And further, more, I would say that I first saw your advertisement in a N. Y. paper, and sent for one of your circulars, on receipt of which, as you know, I remitted you $300 for 300 shares in Class C in one of your combinations, and by return mail received your certificate for the same, and during the month received five notices of purchases and sales of different stocks, in all amounting to 4¾ per cent., or $1,275 profit on my 300 shares, after deducting your commissions of $198.87, leaving me a net profit of $1,076.63 over and above my investment of $300. Yours truly,

H F. GIDDINGS,
837 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

An article in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, under date of June 29, 1878, says: "The reports of fabulous profits realized to numerous parties by this plan led us to investigate the matter closely. The system is based on safe business principles, and is the only method by which large operators attain their greatest success. The pools in which their customers are interested are placed on an equality in every respect with the leaders of the street. As the firm's whole interest lies in their commissions, they naturally wish to make their operations aggregate as large as possible. We believe the method of Lawrence & Co. to be the most safe and successful of any that can be found. New combinations and pools are formed every day or two. The firm will send their comprehensive circular, giving full details, to any applicant. One of their old customers, who held a few shares in one of these combinations, after receiving check for his profits, writes: 'Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, N. Y.: Your remittance for my profits, $393.75 is received I again most heartily thank you, &c. Numerous testimonials are contained in their circular." New York Illustrated Times says: "A safe method of dealing in stocks.—The great desideratum has always been to discover some method by which a party, operating on limited capital, can stand an equal chance with men like Gould, Vanderbilt or Keene. A plan has lately been adopted by the banking house of Messrs. Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, that seems to fill the bill completely. The reports of numerous parties who have made large sums of money by this plan, has led us to investigate the matter, and we find the rumors are based on facts. They are also large dealers in all kinds of bonds.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. THE Law of Population,

ITS CONSEQUENCES

AND

Its Bearing upon Human Conduct and Morals.

BY ANNIE BESANT.

A Scientific and Medical Work every way superior to any similar. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. Adapted to the wants of the married, and to the consideration of all mature persons, as it points out the only feasible escape from the evils of celibacy or overburdened parentage. This is the work for which the eloquent author is now suffering persecution in England. It is not the "Fruits of Philosophy," but is more modern and and every way better.

Gems of Thought.

UNDER whatever disguise it takes refuge, whether fungus or oak, worm or man, the living protoplasm ultimately dies, and is resolved into its mineral and lifeless constituents.—Huxley.

RELIGION in Italy has no necessary connection with any one virtue. The most atrocious villain may be rigidly devout, and, without any shock to established faith, confess himself to be so.—Shelley.

BY the combat of nature, by hunger and death, the highest problem is solved which we are able to comprehend—the generation of gradually higher and more perfect species.—Charles Darwin.

SPEAK well of the absent whenever you have a suitable opportunity. Never speak ill of them, or of anybody, unless you are sure they deserve it, and unless it is necessary for their amendment, or for the safety and benefit of others.—Sir Matthew Hale.

WHEN you are in company with light, vain, impertinent persons, let the observing of their failings make you the more cautious, both in your conversation with them and in your general behavior, that you may avoid their errors.—Sir Matthew Hale.

BE a faithful citizen, because the community is necessary to thine own security, to the enjoyment of thine own existence, to the furtherance of thine own happiness. Be loyal, and submit to legitimate authority, because it is requisite to the maintenance of that society which is necessary to thyself.—D'Holbach.

THE idea of right and wrong is born of man's capacity to enjoy and suffer. If man could not suffer, if he could not inflict injury upon his fellow, if he could neither feel nor inflict pain, the idea of right and wrong would never have entered his brain. But for this, the word conscience never would have passed the lips of man.—Ingersoll.

OF matter and force, of mind, man can acquire and understand; but of ultimate nature, essence, or cause of matter, force, or mind, man knows nothing; these things are buried in impenetrable mystery. Every religion setting out though it does with tacit assertion of a mystery, forthwith proceeds to give some solution of this mystery, and so asserts that it is not a mystery passing human comprehension.—Herbert Spencer.

THE life on earth is but the shortest day of eternity. Each succeeding career is longer and longer in duration, and forever improving in conditions. The soul will never find a lower or more inharmonious sphere than that of primitive worlds. These contain the deepest hells in the universe of God! The way to heaven lies straight through them, on both sides of the grave, for they are not so much without as within you.—Anon.

"IT were better," says Bacon, "to have no opinion of God at all, than such an opinion as is unworthy of him; for the one is unbelief, the other is contumely; and certainly superstition is the reproach of the deity. Plutarch saith well to that purpose: 'Surely I had rather a great deal men should say there was no such man at all as Plutarch, than that they should say that there was one Plutarch that would eat his children as soon as they were born.'"—Harriet Martineau.

BE just, because equity is the support of human society! Be good, because goodness connects all hearts in adamantine bonds! Be indulgent, because, feeble thyself, thou livest with beings who partake of thy weakness! Be gentle, because mildness attracts attention! Be thankful, because gratitude feeds benevolence, nourishes generosity! Be modest, because haughtiness is disgusting to beings well with themselves. Forgive injuries, because revenge perpetuates hatred!—D'Holbach.

DO GOOD to him who injureth thee, in order to show thyself more noble than he is; to make a friend of him who was once thy enemy! Be reserved in thy demeanor, temperate in thine enjoyment, and chaste in thy pleasures, because voluptuousness begets weariness, intemperance engenders disease; forward manners are revolting; excess at all times relaxes the springs of thy machine, will ultimately destroy thy being and render thee hateful to thyself, contemptible to others.—D'Holbach.

HEOLOGY is a great moral cesspool, in which the seeds of insanity take deep root and bear bitter fruit. Infidels would infinitely rather teach nothing than to teach a bundle of absurdities and impossibilities. If they cannot see, hear, and smell the Lord, neither are they deicides and cannibals. They do not crucify their savior, and feast upon his flesh and blood one day in seven; nor do they thank their Heavenly Father for having committed adultery to bring about the monstrous absurdity and infinite impossibility of the incarnation, and that of the Trinity.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

HAT you would not like to have done to yourself, do it not unto others. When you labor for others, do it with the same zeal as if it were for yourself. That which you dislike in superiors, do not practice it towards inferiors; and what you dislike in inferiors, do not practice it towards superiors—this is the law for measuring others by ourselves. To become the superior man, I must serve my father as I wish my son to serve me; I must serve my elder brother as I wish my younger brother to serve me; I must serve my prince as I should wish my minister to serve me, and I must behave towards my friend as I would wish him to behave towards me. True politeness consists in never treating others as you would not like to be treated by them.—Confucius.

Odds and Ends.

MR. BROWN'S MISFORTUNE.

The saddest wreck in all our town
Is Mr. Patrick Henry Brown.

He is a bachelor, so called,
And happens to be very bald.

One glorious Fourth, his doctors state,
Friend Brown resolved to celebrate.

Then in a shady grove he heard
The screeching of the noble bird;

Anon he saw the rockets fly
Athwart the humid summer sky;

Anon he heard the trumpet's blare,
And saw the pinwheel's lurid glare.

He was enchained, entranced, amused,
Encharmed, engrossed, enwrapped, enthused!

With glowing patriotic feet,
He sauntered forth down Olive street.

Gosh but it's fearful hot!" he said,
Unbaring his bald, awful head.

Oh, hapless and relentless fate!
Oh, doomed and decorated pate!

An urchin from the porch above
A torrent of torpedoes hove—

They rained upon that fated head—
All bare and bald, as aforesaid.

Crash followed crash—pop followed pop—
Brown felt induced to calmly drop.

And as he lay upon the ground,
The stars danced merrily around.

Beware, O man with hairless pate—
Beware as how you celebrate!

LOW, FLAT LAND.

There was a man and his name was Brown,
And he lived about a mile and a half from town;
And this here feller was awfully down
In the mouth, for his crap wuz like for to drown,
Becuz his 80 was low, flat land.

His very midriff it aked and pained
As he notised how the weather rained and rained;
And his dratted 80 it couldn't be drained,
And his corn wuz yeller, and the weeds they gained,
And the tadpoles threatened for to take that land.

If a cloud came up as big as a gourd,
Why, that was enuff, and it ripped and roared
As if all the water that ever wuz stored
Since the days of Noah had suddenly poured
On that miserable 80 of low, flat land.

The weather buro it wuz all in a muss,
And instid of gittin better, the weather got wuss;
And Brown 'lowed he wouldn't raise nuthin but pus-
Ley, and he didn't do nuthin but cuss
And mope round the edge of that low, flat land.

But Missis Brown she usen for to smile,
And she sed she thought it wan't wuth while
Fur a human for to let their temper spile,
When Providence wanted for to moisten the sile,
And drip a little water on that low, flat land.

And so, while Brown he poked and slumped,
His wife she wan't a partikle stumpt;
And into the weeds this woman she jumped,
And all summer long she fairly humped
Herself to make a crap on that low, flat land.

And when the corn-gatherin time came round,
Instead of the crap all gettin drowned,
Thar wuz 60 to the aker on that low, flat ground;
And Brown sed he reckoned as how he found
It wuz more in the woman than it wuz in the land.

—Monmouth Review.

A MAN having fallen down in a fit in a tailor's shop, an envious rival said, "That's the only fit ever seen in that establishment!"

A LITTLE stealing is a dangerous part, but stealing largely is a noble art; 'tis mean to rob a henroost of a hen, but stealing thousands makes men gentlemen.

A WRITER in a prominent high-toned journal says that in Japan a lady is not afraid to go into the public bath before gentleman whose thoughts she knows are pure. These ladies must be mere strippings.

IN Judge McArthur's court in Washington the other day, a lawyer called the judge's attention to the fact that a certain case had been upon the docket for a decade. "I know it," said the judge, "but the case has not decayed."

AN Irishman with a heavy bundle on his shoulder, riding on the front of a horse-car, was asked why he didn't set the bundle on the platform. He replied, "Indade the horses have load enough. I'll carry the bundle."

THE average girl is too delicate to do housework, but she will go through a game of croquet in the summer, and when she has finished go through a dollar's worth of cake and ice cream in a manner to make a young man with a limited purse shiver in terror.

AN undertaker being asked by a lady who was employing him at some household work, whether he would have a glass now or wait till he had finished his job. "I'll be takin' the glass noo, mem," said the artisan, "for there's been a power o' sudden deaths lately."

AN old Highland clergyman, who had received several calls to parishes, asked his servant where he should go. The servant said, "Go where there is most sin, sir." The preacher concluded that was good advice, and went where there was most money.

Vol. 5. No. 33. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, August 17, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

ALWAYS put off till to-morrow whatever you can't do to-day.

ANY man pays too much for his whistle when he has to wet it fifteen or twenty times a day.

PEOPLE who are pious only during camp-meeting season are properly called "grasshopper Christians."

THE parson in the pulpit stands,
His locks are thin and gray;
He bends his head, he clasps his hands,
And springs upon his pray.

SOME irreverent, unbelieving reprobate has inquired if the early Christian Fathers used to take summer vacations in the style of modern clergymen.

GO TO the mosquito, ye idle and shiftless; consider his industrious ways and learn some gumption.—On second thought, you need not go. The little fellow will be pretty sure to call upon you.

THE potato blight in the south of Ireland threatens to be very serious. The offensive odor, which to those who have reached five and forty must in many cases bring back recollections of the terrible years 1846-48, is distinctly perceptible.

AN elder of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, William Brown, was sued by a young girl for breach of promise of marriage and seduction. The case was tried in Edinburgh the other day, when the jury gave the plaintiff $2,500.

THE persistent wretch who is always asking, "Is this hot enough for you?" will get his reward some day. When a dark-complexioned old person, with horns and a tail, shall lead him in, asking, "Is this hot enough for you?" he will understand it all.—Courier-Journal.

A LITTLE daughter of a Connecticut clergyman was left one day to "tend door," and obeying a summons of the bell, she found a gentleman on the steps who wished to see her father. "Father isn't in," she said, "but if it is anything about your soul I can attend to you, I know the whole plan of salvation."

THE devil, uncaged, is going around like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. But the watchmen whose business it is to take care of him, what of them? Why, they have deserted the walls of Zion, and are away hunting and fishing and talking pretty small-talk to the sisters in the country.

A YOUNG man from the rural districts in search of information has written inquiring if anything about card-playing is written in sacred history. Yes, certainly. Moses led for the children of Israel, and when they got to Jordan they passed; Solomon ordered up the temple; Balaam held a jack; and the seven priests before Jericho took the city by playing their seven trumps.

SANKEY has accepted an invitation to go to England, and will sail in the latter part of September. It is expected that he will remain there for some months, holding services of song. On his return he will join Moody, who will meantime spend the time as quietly as he can in Baltimore, giving himself principally to study, but occasionally holding services in the churches of that city.

THE editor of the California Christian Advocate is "ferninst" the California State University because it is "Godless." What troubles this good man is not that the University has no God, but that the God of the University will not make it into a kind of Methodist Book Concern. It annoys him also to think that the Deity who cares for the University is the same Deity that looks out for the Baptists.—The Argonaut.

THE faithful shepherd is now taking his summer vacation, three months, at the expense of the flock. Strange how little cultivation the spiritual vineyard seems to require during the sweltering days and nights of summer. How long will it require for intelligent Americans to learn that if they can get along three months in the year without the expensive luxury of shepherds they can the other nine months also?

A CANADIAN paper says that, as the telephone makes it possible for sounds to be canned, the same as beef, lobsters, fruit, etc., missionary sermons might be bottled and sent to the South Sea Islands ready for the table, instead of the missionaries themselves. That would be decidedly cheaper and better than sending out sleek, fat, and lazy clergymen, who are sent out at the expense of hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars.

BISHOP WHITTAKER, of Virginia City, has been on a tour through the towns of Tybo and Ward. He says at Tybo he could get no building to preach in but a gambling-house, and in response to the litany, instead of "Amen," an excited listener, with his pantaloons stuffed in his boots, cried "Keno." At Ward a horse-race had been announced for the afternoon, but at the bishop's earnest request the racing was postponed till the religious services were over. The whole congregation went from the church to the race track.

IT has been asked by an inquisitive person whether it was probable when Adam and Eve were yet in the Garden of Eden, and our fair young grandmother knew there was not another soul in all the wide, wide world save herself and her snoring husband, Eve ever went to sleep without first looking under the bed of moss and leaves "for a man," and rousing Adam from his first nap, after a day without toil, to ask him if he was sure he had locked the front door. Will some clergyman impart the desired information?

A CORRESPONDENT writes us relative to a Rev. J. M. Boon, Methodist preacher at Dora, Kan., who has recently been proved guilty of taking improper liberties with the sisters of his church. Charges were preferred against him, and he was found guilty on all the charges, as several of the sisters bore positive testimony as to the improprieties he had been guilty of, but the dignitaries of the church refused to chastise him, and he was forced to leave. He will doubtless now hold himself out as a "Boon" for the sisters in some other portion of the moral vineyard.

COLLINS of Rhea Springs, Tenn., was a heavy drinker. The Methodist Church converted everybody in the neighborhood except him; but he held out for a long time. At last he was converted, and the church let him in on condition that he pledged himself to quit drinking. This he did; but he developed a violent sort of religion. On a late Sunday morning he went into the church and tore up all the books he could get hold of to get the devil out of them. He then imagined that the evil one had gone into his clothes, so he took them off for sanctification, and ran toward the church, followed by a multitude. He knocked down two or three men who impeded his progress up the aisle, but he was finally put in jail. There he beat the jailer nearly to death—for the devil—and he gave the jailer's wife a terrible thumping, taking her for Eve, the mother of mankind through whom all fell from grace.

THE revision of the New Testament is almost completed, and will probably be presented to Convocation in England next year. Already it is nearly all printed, the two universities having given £20,000 for the privilege of printing it, of which they pay £2,000 yearly. Bishop Ellicott, the Chairman of the Revisers, who has presided for six hours daily for four days every three weeks, is said never to have lost his temper or failed to carry his colleagues with him. The revision of the Old Testament will require about three years longer. When the people of Christendom are furnished with the improved word of God, it is to be hoped it will contain much less of crudity, contradictions, and indecency than the present version does. The question that arises is, when these qualities are duly eliminated, will the book be more or less divine than the one we have at present? If it is less divine, will the improvement in the quality make up for the loss of divinity? If it is more divine, is it not singular that God should have allowed for centuries so many million copies of his work to go forth in a confessedly highly imperfect condition?

THE following from the St. Louis Globe, illustrates the natural results of religious superstition and ignorance: "In the dark patch of the late eclipse across Texas, 116 miles in width, there were thousands of ignorant people, both white and black, who had not heard that anything peculiar was about to happen. Many of these people the eclipse surprised at work in their fields. Many ludicrous scenes are reported. Especially on the plantation of United States Senator Coke, near Waco, was it that the negroes went to praying, believing verily that the day of judgment had come. A terrible tragedy in Johnson county may be set down to the eclipse. Ephraim Miller, colored, with his family of wife and four children, lived near Buchanan, in that county, whither he had removed from Tennessee six months ago. On the morning of the eclipse he said he had heard the world was coming to an end that evening, and if so, he intended to be so sound asleep the trumpet of the angel Gabriel could not awaken him. When the eclipse commenced and the darkness of totality came on he ran from the field to his house with a hatchet in his hand. He was followed by a negro woman named Nancy Ellison, who also thought the world was coming to an end. As she got to the house Miller's wife rushed out under the same delusion, and looking up at the beautiful corona of light around the black moon, screamed, "Come, sweet chariot!" at the same time rushing across a cotton field wringing her hands. In the meantime, Miller, wishing to take his ten-year old boy with him to the other side of Jordan, raised his hatchet and split his son's head open. Leaving the latter weltering in his blood and struggling in the last throes of death, the father, on a ladder, ascended to the top of the house. Here, with a new razor, he cut his throat from ear to ear, and he fell to the ground a corpse. His two little daughters escaped by hiding under a bed.

WHAT THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND COSTS.—Mr. Frederick Martin, editor of the Statesman Yearbook, has made a compilation of the yearly expenses to the people for running the Anglican Church. The following are some of the items:

Salary of the See of Canterbury	$72,000
Salary of Archbishop of York	50,000
Salary of the Archbishop of London	50,000
Salary of the Archbishop of Durham	40,000
Thirty bishops	805 000
Twenty-nine deans	300,000
131 canons	655,000
13,800 rectors, vicars, arch-deacons, etc.	26 000 000
5,765 curates, average, $300	1,729,000
5,509 unattached clergy, missionaries, chaplains, etc.	1,000.000
Subsidies by Parliament for school purposes	2,500,000
For indigent clergymen, called Queen Ann's Fund	170,000
Repairs, etc., on $30,000,000 on cathedrals	2,900,000
Expenses on churches, schools, and colleges	287,000
1,100 glebe houses	6,7 0 0 0
300,000 acres of land, interest on	100,0 0
50,000 acres of land for cathedrals, interest on,	50,000
225,000 acres in the hands of incumbents	1,250,000

In this list several items are not included, but Mr. Martin estimates the total yearly expense at over $48,000,000. The far larger portion it will be seen, is engrossed by the aristocratic class, who have little or nothing to do. The curates, who have nearly all the labor to perform, get by far the smallest wages. The working people of England have this yearly sum to pay under the supposition that they are thereby doing God an immense service, and that a great good is being established. The supposition is entirely erroneous. The main thing in view is to support in luxury a body of idle and useless aristocrats whose lives are utterly without value to the world.

Events of the Week.

A WESTERN clergyman suicided last week.

QUEEN CHRISTINA of Spain is ill, and her case is considered hopeless.

QUEEN VICTORIA reviewed the British vessels of war on Tuesday last.

A RUSSIAN torpedo-boat exploded a few days ago, killing thirty-four men.

NEW gold fields have been discovered south west of Fort Custer, Dakota.

THE members of the Chinese Embassy are stopping in Hartford, Conn., at present.

PRESIDENT HAYES is reported to have come out strongly in opposition to Chinese immigration.

A MAN went over Niagara Falls a few days ago. Neither his body nor boat has been seen since.

A REVOLUTION on a small scale has broken out in Spain. The revolutionists demand a republic.

THE Rev. Francis Lee, of this city, has been arrested and imprisoned for indecently assaulting a girl in Central Park.

THE yellow fever death list in New Orleans for the past week was sixty-six. Number of new cases, 233.

BOTH houses of the New Hampshire Legislature have agreed to allow women to vote at school meetings.

THE British Columbian Government has imposed a tax of forty dollars on each Chinaman in that dominion.

THE blacks and whites have been having a little political fracas near Memphis, Tenn. One negro killed and several wounded.

THE post-office authorities are about to transport $7,000,000 in gold from San Francisco to New York by mail as third-class matter.

THERE appears to be an epidemic of crime in this city at present. Robberies, murders, and suicides are of almost daily occurrence.

THE sewing-girls of this city, to the number of 2,500, were given a free excursion to Rockaway Beach by a kind-hearted capitalist last week.

THE Catholics and Protestants of Ottawa have been "discussing." Clubs, knives, and revolvers were the arguments. Ten or fifteen of the debaters were dangerously "convinced."

A TRAIN of cars on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was thrown from the track and wrecked on the 11th. One man killed and several wounded.

TWO MINERS took $60,000 out of the ruins of a burned jewelry establishment in this city after the insurance companies had got through with their search.

CHICAGO shoe manufacturers talk of employing Chinamen to take the place of the striking shoemakers. The Chinamen can be had for about sixty cents a day.

AN express train on the Pittsburgh and St. Louis Railroad, running at a speed of forty miles an hour, collided with a freight train, on the 7th. Four cars were thrown from the track. Fifteen persons were killed and upwards of fifty were wounded.

THE negroes of Long Island have been holding a camp-meeting, at which there was a great outpouring of spirits and some bloodshed. Bibles, black bottles, bludgeons, and razors were in equal demand, but razors prevailed. One of the brethren had his tongue almost torn out, and one man's eye will roll heavenward no more.

A TERRIBLE storm swept over portions of this country on the 9th. In Wallingford, Conn., thirty people were killed and forty houses, including a Catholic church, were destroyed. All business is suspended, and Wallingford is in mourning. Great damage was done in Washington on the 10th by a storm. In northern New York great damage was done and railroad transit was temporarily suspended. Two churches and several dwellings were struck by lightning and destroyed at Cape Vincent. The storm also did considerable damage in Boston.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER XI.—CONTINUED.

The death-bed and funeral we pass over, simply remarking that all was quiet, solemn, and decorous. There were no loud demonstrations of grief; no meeting save a small gathering at the home. A few words were spoken by the father, and then, at the grave, the following lines, which had been previously altered from a favorite funeral song for this solemn occasion, were sung by the assembled friends, the family of Mr. Darwin also joining their voices with the rest:

"Farewell, sister! we have loved thee,
Rest now on thy bed of clay;
Clouds are floating high above thee,
And breezes waft our songs away.
Sad, we give thee to the number
Laid in yonder darksome halls;
And above thy peaceful slumber
Many a shower of sorrow falls.

Thou canst not hear our plaintive notes,
Lowly breathed in sad'ning song.
Bleeding hearts are all around thee,
For our love was pure and strong.
Farewell, sister! ne'er we'll meet thee
As we journey to and fro;
Ne'er again in joy we'll greet thee,
Or thy welcome presence know.

But in tender hearts thou'lt find
Thy loved name shall treasured be,
As there, in sacred halls enshrined,
Are dear memories of thee.
Here, by thy last sweet resting-place,
Oft our wandering steps shall stray;
In fancy's dream we'll see thy face,
Pleasant as the summer's day."

Thousands and tens of thousands of pages of books and other periodicals have been devoted to telling of the noble traits and the great benefits to man which have been derived from his association with and the companionship of dogs. And right here, at the close of poor Minnie's brief, bright life-page, and its abrupt termination by a dog-bite, I wish to enter my protest against dogs as a useless encumbrance, a dead weight, and a great evil upon the community. In the first place, no man or woman has a moral right to keep a nuisance—to keep any animal that he can't keep at home, that will forage its living off others; that will take the bread from his children's mouths, and, worse than all, breed disease and death in the community. The sheep killed each year are worth ten times more than all the dogs that ever lived; and the human life that has been sacrificed to dog-bites is of a thousand million times more value than the sheep were. Then there is the fear of dogs that is felt all over the land. There are few of us who have not felt our hearts jump into our throats, at some time or other, from hearing the sudden bark of a dog near us in some lone spot, or where we felt as if we were helplessly exposed to his sharp teeth. And fear, real fear, is one of the most terrible of human sufferings, and often turns the hair snow-white in a few short moments.

Some four years ago I read in The Oneida Circular an article on dogs that made such an impression on me that I have rarely touched a dog since, or allowed one to come on the premises. I will give some extracts from it, as it was a regular scientific article, and therefore worthy of credence and preservation:

"According to Professor Verrill there are twenty-five different kinds of parasites which find a home in the various organs of the dog. There are only three that are very destructive and common among domestic animals. These are found in their mature state only in the dog, but occur in the larval state in sheep, cattle, and man.

"It is perfectly safe to say that at least twenty-five sheep are killed by parasites derived from dogs for every one killed by the teeth of dogs, and that more than fifty persons die from the same parasites for every one that dies of hydrophobia. And yet the heedless practice of fondling such animals goes on from day to day, and from year to year. The loss of human life alone, to say nothing of the amount of suffering caused every year by these diseases, more than counterbalances all the good that all the dogs in the civilized world can possibly do. This may seem to be an exaggerated statement, but we are compelled to believe it by the statistics which follow:

"Dr. Krabbe found the echinoccus tape-worm in twenty-eight out of one hundred Icelandic dogs which he examined. In England this parasite is well known, and measures are constantly employed to prevent its increase. The hunting hounds undergo a course of medical treatment once in three months for the purpose of removing it; yet, in spite of these precautions, it is estimated that five hundred persons die annually in Great Britain from this

... Iceland, where the ... of this parasite are most favorable, there are at all times about eighteen hundred patients suffering with severe forms of this parasitic disease—a number equal to about one-fortieth of all the inhabitants. In some districts the proportion of diseased persons is said to be one in every seven, while scarcely a family can be found without two or more cases. It is estimated that one-sixth of all the deaths in Iceland are due to the diseases caused by this parasite.

"The tænia echinoccus, or, as it is commonly called, the echinoccus is the only parasite of the dog which is dangerous to man. To get a clear idea of its life and development we will begin our observation of it where it most frequently presents itself. This is in the form of tumors in sheep, pigs, horses, cattle, and man. These tumors occur in various forms and sizes; some are simple, others are made up of an aggregation of small tumors. In their simplest form, or when young, these tumors contain a roundish cyst or membranous sac inclosing a watery fluid. More frequently the cysts become compound by a process of budding, either upon the outside or inside, or both without and within the membrane of the original cyst, so that its size goes on increasing indefinitely until it sometimes becomes as large as a child's head. If the membrane of one of the cysts be examined when fresh with a microscope there will be seen attached to it by means of slender stalks numbers of small oval or rounded heads looking something like fruit on a miniature plant. These heads line the membrane both internally and externally, and by a process of budding develop new cysts which in their turn produce buds. Each of the oval heads is a hollow sac, which contains the real head of the young tape-worm. As long as these cysts remain in a living animal new heads are constantly forming, so that if the animal or man live long enough to develop a large tumor, it will finally contain many thousands of these minute tape-worm heads.

"If at any time a dog eat any part of an animal containing such tumors, and swallow either the cyst or the detached heads, the inclosing membrane will be digested and the heads liberated. These soon fasten themselves by means of small hooks to the living membrane of the intestine, and there attain their full size, which is only about one-eighth of an inch. Unlike the beef and pork tape-worm, which becomes long with hundreds of joints, this has but three joints when mature. The last joint, which is much the largest, contains both male and female organs, and is capable of self-impregnation. After this has matured and discharged its eggs, the next two develop and discharge their eggs in like manner. A dog in this condition is constantly discharging and scattering thousands and millions of the extremely minute eggs of this worm wherever he goes. They are scattered among the grass in the fields and pastures; they get into the water of brooks and springs; they are liable to adhere to fruit which has fallen, or to lettuce and other garden vegetables.

"These eggs, when taken into the stomach of an animal or a man, are acted upon by the gastric juice, and immediately hatch. The embryo is a very minute worm, different from the parent, and provided with hooks, by means of which it bores its way through the lining of the intestines into the blood-vessels, and entering the circulation is carried to all parts of the body, where it develops into the peculiar cysts and tumors which I have described. Dr. Cobbold has calculated the number of progeny that might proceed from one egg during a generative cycle, and it amounts to the enormous sum of one hundred and fifty billions!

"These tumors, as before remarked, occur in various organs of the body. When lodged in the brain they are most dangerous, soon causing insanity and death by their rapid growth. When they occur in the lungs and liver they often prove fatal. When the lodgment is in the vesicles or near the exterior of the body they may be removed by a surgical operation. When in the internal organs there is generally no remedy. The true nature of the diseases caused by this parasite is seldom known until after the death of the patient, when a microscopic examination reveals the truth."

INDUSTRY is the business of men. It is a dignity, and only idleness a disgrace, a wrong, a curse. If you earn nothing by head or hand, by heart or soul, then you are, and must be, a beggar or a thief, and neither pay for your board or lodging.—Theodore Parker.

WE live in the nineteenth century, when science is already knocking at every door, not excepting the church door; flashing light into the dark corners of superstition and bigotry regardless of the owls and the screaming of the bats that inhabit them. It is useless to lock and bolt the door, for science carries the club that can demolish every barrier. In vain you hide in the dark, for her lamp makes day of the blackest night. Build to the skies, she will soar and scan the very top stone; dig center-deep, she will dive to the foundation. Heaven is not too high for her fetterless wing, nor the fires of hell hot enough to prevent her most searching examination.—Wm. Denton.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

Of still greater, nay, the very greatest importance to the hypothesis of spontaneous generation are, finally, the exceedingly remarkable Monera, those creatures which we have already so frequently mentioned, and which are not only the simplest of all observed organisms, but even the simplest of all imaginable organisms. I have already described these wonderful "organisms without organs," when examining the simplest phenomena of propagation and inheritance. We already know seven different genera of these Monera, some of which live in fresh water, others in the sea. In a perfectly developed and freely motile state, they one and all present us with nothing but a simple little lump or an albuminous combination of carbon. The individual genera and species differ only a little in the manner of propagation and development, and in the way of taking nourishment. Through the discovery of these organisms, which are of the utmost importance, the supposition of a spontaneous generation loses most of its difficulties. For as all trace of organization—all distinction of heterogeneous parts—is still wanting in them, and as all the vital phenomena are performed by one and the same homogeneous and formless matter, we can easily imagine their origin by spontaneous generation. If this happens through plasmogeny, and if plasma capable of life already exists, it then only needs to individualize itself in the same way as the mother liquor of crystals individualizes itself in crystallization. If, on the other hand, the spontaneous generation of the Monera takes place by true autogeny, then it is further requisite that that plasma capable of life, that primeval mucus, should be formed out of simpler combinations of carbon. As we are now able artificially to produce, in our laboratories, combinations of carbon similar to this in the complexity of their constitution, there is absolutely no reason for supposing that there are not conditions in free nature also in which such combinations could take place. Formerly, when the doctrine of spontaneous generation was advocated, it failed at once to obtain adherents on account of the composite structure of the simplest organisms then known. It is only since we have discovered the exceedingly important Monera, only since we have become acquainted in them with organisms not in any way built up of distinct organs, but which consist solely of a single chemical combination, and yet grow, nourish, and propagate themselves, that this great difficulty has been removed, and the hypothesis of spontaneous generation has gained a degree of probability which entitles it to fill up the gap existing between Kant's cosmogony and Lamarck's Theory of Descent. Even among the Monera at present known there is a species which probably, even now, always comes into existence by spontaneous generation. This is the wonderful Bathybius Hæckelii, discovered and described by Huxley. As I have already mentioned, this Moneron is found in the greatest depths of the sea, at a depth of between 12,000 and 24,000 feet, where it covers the ground partly as retiform threads and plaits of plasma, partly in the form of larger or smaller irregular lumps of the same material.

Only such homogeneous organisms as are yet not differentiated, and are similar to inorganic crystals in being homogeneously composed of one single substance, could arise by spontaneous generation, and could become the primeval parents of all other organisms. In their further development we have pointed out that the most important process is the formation of a kernel or nucleus in the simple little lump of albumen. We can conceive this to take place in a purely physical manner, by the condensation of the innermost central part of the albumen. The more solid central mass, which at first gradually shaded off into the peripheral plasma, becomes sharply separated from it, and thus forms an independent, round, albuminous corpuscle, the kernel; and by this process the Moneron becomes a cell. Now, it must have become evident from our previous chapters, that the further development of all other organisms out of such a cell presents no difficulty, for every animal and every plant, in the beginning of its individual life, is a simple cell. Man, as well as every other animal, is at first nothing but a simple egg cell, a single lump of mucus, containing a kernel.

In the same way as the kernel of the organic cell arose in the interior or central mass of the originally homogeneous lump of plasma, by separation, so, too, the first cell-membrane was formed on its surface. This simple, but most important process, as has already been remarked, can likewise be explained in a purely physical manner, either as a chemical deposit, or as a physical condensation in the uppermost stratum of the mass, or as a secretion. One of the first processes of adaptation effected by the Moneron originating by spontaneous generation must have been the condensation of an external crust, which as a protecting covering shut in the softer interior from the hostile influences of the outer world. As soon as, by condensation of the homogeneous Moneron, a cell-kernel arose in the interior, and a membrane arose on the surface, all the fundamental parts of the unit were furnished, out of which, by infinitely manifold repetition and combination, as attested by actual observation, the body of higher organisms is constructed.

As has already been mentioned, our whole understanding of an organism rests upon the cell theory established thirty years ago by Schleiden and Schwann. According to it, every organism is either a simple cell or a cell-community, a republic of closely connected cells. All the forms and vital phenomena of every organism are the collective result of the forms and vital phenomena of all the single cells of which it is composed. By the recent progress of the cell theory it has become necessary to give the elementary organisms, that is, the "organic" individuals of the first order, which are usually designated as cells, the more general and more suitable name of form-units, or plastids. Among these form-units we distinguish two main groups, namely, the cytods and the genuine cells. The cytods are, like the Monera, pieces of plasma without a kernel. Cells, on the other hand, are pieces of plasma containing a kernel or nucleus. Each of these two main groups of plastids is again divided into two subordinate groups, according as they possess or do not possess an external covering (skin, shell, or membrane). We may accordingly distinguish the following four grades or species of plastids, namely: 1. Simple cytods; 2. Encased cytods; 3. Simple cells; 4. Encased cells (Gen. Morph. i, 269-289.)

Concerning the relation of these four forms of plastids to spontaneous generation, the following is the most probable: 1. The simple cytods (Gymnocytoda), naked particles of plasma without kernel, like the still living Monera, are the only plastids which directly come into existence by spontaneous generation. 2. The enclosed cytods (Lepocytoda), particles of plasma without kernel, which are surrounded by a covering (membrane or shell), arose out of the simple cytods either by the condensation of the outer layers of plasma, or by the secretion of a covering. 3. The simple cells (Gymnocyta), or naked cells, particles of plasma with kernel, but without covering, arose out of the simple cytods by the condensation of the innermost particles of plasma into a kernel, or nucleus, by differentiation of a central kernel and peripheral cell-substance. 4. The enclosed cells (Lepocyta), or testaceous cells, particles of plasma with kernel and an outer covering (membrane or shell), arose either out of the enclosed cytods by the formation of a kernel, or out of the simple cells by the formation of a membrane. All the other forms of form-units, or plastids, met with, besides these, have only subsequently arisen out of these four fundamental forms by natural selection, by descent with adaptation, by differentiation and transformation

By this theory of plastids, by deducing all the different forms of plastids, and hence, also, all organisms composed of them, from the Monera, we obtain a simple and natural connection in the whole series of the development of nature. The origin of the first Monera by spontaneous generation appears to us as a simple and necessary event in the process of the development of the earth. We admit that this process, as long as it is not directly observed or repeated by experiment, remains a pure hypothesis. But I must again say that this hypothesis is indispensable for the consistent completion of the non-miraculous history of creation, that it has absolutely nothing forced or miraculous about it, and that certainly it can never be postively refuted. It must be taken into consideration that the process of spontaneous generation, even if it still took place daily and hourly, would in any case be exceedingly difficult to observe and establish with absolute certainty as such. With regard to the Monera, we find ourselves placed before the following alternative: either they are actually directly derived from pre-existing, or "created," most ancient Monera, and in this case they would have had to propagate themselves unchanged for many millions of years, and to have maintained their original form of simple particles of plasma; or, the present Monera have originated much later in the course of the organic history of the earth, by repeated acts of spontaneous generation, and in this case spontaneous generation may take place now as well as then. The latter supposition has evidently much more probability on its side than the former.

If we do not accept the hypothesis of spontaneous generation, then at this one point of the history of development we must have recourse to the miracle of a supernatural creation. The Creator must have created the first organism, or a few first organisms, from which all others are derived, and as such he must have created the simplest Monera, or primeval cytods, and given them the capability of developing further in a mechanical way. I leave it to each one of my readers to choose between this idea and the hypothesis of spontaneous generation. To me the idea that the Creator should have in this one point arbitrarily interfered with the regular process of development of matter, which in all other cases proceeds entirely without his interposition, seems to be just as unsatisfactory to a believing mind as to a scientific intellect. If, on the other hand, we assume the hypothesis of spontaneous generation for the origin of the first organisms, which in consequence of reasons mentioned above, and especially in consequence of the discovery of the Monera, has lost its former difficulty, then we arrive at the establishment of an uninterrupted natural connection between the development of the earth and the organisms produced on it, and, in this last remaining lurking-place of obscurity, we can proclaim the unity of all Nature, and the unity of her laws of Development (Gen. Morph. i, 164).

IGNORANCE once covered the land like a pall, and Nature's preachers discoursed for ages to deaf souls. The thought, as it slowly rounded itself in man's brain, had no power of projection from the mind that gave it birth, but lay there shrouded, and died with its possessor. By the development of his inherent nature, man grew into speech, formed signs for sounds, shaped the reed, and then the feather that dropped from a passing bird's wing; from the waving flag by the river side, first, and then from a nation's tatters, brought forth paper, and made the wisdom of one the property of the many. He ransacked the sunless caves, and brought to light the iron and the lead, and formed the printing-press, the multiplier of thought, the long-wished for lever that moves the world.—Wm. Denton.

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

We will now turn our attention to the condition of the world when Christianity began its career, and up to the time that it commenced to exert a general influence in the Roman Empire.

At the very outset we shall be confronted with the statement that when Christ appeared, and during the continuance of pagan influence, the moral and religious condition of the Empire was lamentable; that gladiatorial exhibitions in which men were slain for mere pleasure were common; that slavery of the most terrible form was general, and cruelty and barbarity toward the slaves was the rule; that the condition of woman was one of extreme degradation; that concubinage and prostitution prevailed everywhere; that suicide was common; that religion was a puerile superstition which favored the looseness and licentiousness of the times; that the world was rapidly going into barbarism, and that in its condition was presented an irrefutable argument in favor of the necessity of a revelation from God to prevent the extinction of every vestige of virtue in the world.

I reply that these representations, so often made, convey to the mind unacquainted with the period to which they refer a very erroneous impression as to the state of society and the condition of the Empire under paganism.

It is true that gladiatorial exhibitions disgraced Rome in the most brilliant periods of her history. But it is neither just nor fair to allude to this aspect of Roman life as an illustration of insensibility to suffering or of want of humanity characteristic of the times. This brutalizing amusement was, it should be remembered, an anomaly in Roman civilization. The gladiatorial shows were orginally human sacrifices performed at the tombs of the great, to appease the manes of the dead. After losing their religious significance, they were still kept up as a means of encouraging a military spirit among the people, by presenting before them frequently spectacles of courageous death. They thus became a custom, the propriety of which the people never stopped to consider, and sanctioned as they were by age, and rendered familiar to the people, they were witnessed with pleasure, when spectacles no more barbarous but unconsecrated by age would have excited their commisseration and called forth an indignant protest. Numerous illustrations might be given of the humanity of the age, in striking contrast to the apparent disregard of human suffering and of the sanctity of human life, manifested in sustaining gladiatorial combats. I will give but one: It is related that an accident having occurred at a rope dance, in the time of Marcus Aurelius, the Emperor ordered that thereafter at such amusements a net should always be spread below the rope, to prevent the possibility of a similar accident in the future.

All civilizations have their anomalies. Up to a time within the memory of us all, in our own country, human beings were dragged up to the auction block and sold to the highest bidder. The father and mother were separated from their children, and, if the interest of the owner demanded it, from one another. Marriage among the slaves was recognized by the master only so long as it enhanced the money value of the slave. Slaves escaping into the free States were caught and returned to their masters by the authority of the national Government. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that negroes could not be citizens, and one of its most distinguished and incorruptible Chief Justices declared that "the negro has no rights that the white man is bound to respect." Christian clergymen declared that slavery was sanctioned and ordained by God, and for years the influence of the Church as well as the power of the State was exerted to sustain it, defend it, and perpetuate it in the "free" republic of America.

How glaringly inconsistent all this was with the general character of the American people, North and South alike; a people whose hearts were touched by the appeals of the Greeks, the Poles, and the Hungarians when they were struggling for freedom, and by the miseries of distressed Ireland when she was suffering from famine; whose hands have ever been open to the calls of suffering, from whatever quarter; whose generosity and thoughtful regard for the unfortunate have been demonstrated by their establishing asylums for the insane, hospitals for the sick, and institutions for the poor in every State of the Union. A writer who should, two thousand years hence, endeavor to show that the people of the United States in the nineteenth century were devoid of sensibility or tenderness of heart, or regard for human rights, from the fact that slavery existed in the country and was sustained by the political and religious agencies of the times, would not take a more superficial or unjust view of the American character than does the Christian theologian of the Romans when he dwells on the horrors of the gladiatorial shows, and points to them as proof of the absence of regard for human life. Just as familiarity with human slavery accustomed the people of this country, especially in the Southern States, to its revolting practices, and its age, established character, and supposed necessity and usefulness blinded the most honest and conscientious minds to its real nature and influence, so familiarity with the Roman combats and their existence for ages accustomed the people to view them without those feelings of pity and indignation which such spectacles under other circumstances would have aroused.

There is another fact to which Christian writers make no allusion. In the first century, and even before it, there was a growing sentiment among the better class of society against these barbarous exhibitions. Some of the pagans denounced them as they were conducted in their time, while others, among whom Seneca and Plutarch may be mentioned, denounced the whole system in unqualified terms. While they possessed a fascination for the multitude, and were patronized by the fashionable and the great, as bull-fights have been in Spain eighteen centuries later, it is evident that they were, in spite of their time-honored character, viewed with regret by no inconsiderable portion of the Roman people.

In regard to slavery in pagan Rome, the representations of the clergy are generally based on a few extreme cases, related by Roman historians or referred to by Roman satirists, as instances of extreme cruelty. By no means do they give a correct idea of the condition or the ordinary treatment of the servile class. The fact is, the slave in pagan Rome was not necessarily the degraded being that he afterwards became under Christianity. "The physician who tended the Roman in his sickness, the tutor to whom he confided the education of his son, the artists whose works commanded the admiration of the city, were usually slaves. Slaves sometimes mixed with their masters in the family, ate habitually with them at the same table, and were regarded by them with the warmest affection" (Lecky's Hist. of Morals, vol. i, p. 304).

Although marriage among slaves received no legal recognition, it was sanctioned by custom, and the separation of families was not common, as it was in Christian America in the nineteenth century. The Roman slave could own private property, and although by law it reverted after the death of the slave to the master, it was not uncommon for masters to permit their slaves to dispose of their property by will. By industry and good behavior a captive might hope for his liberty in about six years. The freeing of slaves was at times so common that it led to great confusion and danger. In many cases the slaves refused to accept freedom when it was offered to them, and the attachment of slaves to their masters was shown during the civil wars, when they stood by them in the most trying times, accompanied them in their flight, and exerted all their ingenuity and even sacrificed their lives to insure the safety of their masters. Speaking of the fidelity of slaves, Lecky observes, "This was, indeed, for some time the pre-eminent virtue of Rome, and it proves conclusively that the masters were not so tyrannical, and that the slaves were not so degraded, as is sometimes alleged" (Hist. Morals, vol. i, p. 305).

Epictetus was a slave: he was made free and was not considered unworthy the special regard and friendship of an emporer. There was, no doubt, much cruelty connected with the institution, yet ill-treatment of slaves was not the rule but the exception. According to Seneca, the master who acted unkindly to his slaves was pointed at and insulted in the streets. The application of torture to slave witnesses, we are informed, was extremely rare, and carefully guarded by legal restrictions. Even under Nero a judge was appointed to hear the complaints of slaves, and to punish masters who treated them with cruelty or failed to furnish them with the necessaries of life. Kindness to slaves have been inculcated by philosophers and moralists for centuries. Plato and Aristotle, Zeno and Epicurus, had enjoined it in the most earnest language; whole pages of Seneca are devoted to showing the duties of masters to their slaves. But enough has been said to indicate that the common representations of the defendants of Christianity regarding slavery in the Empire, are quite incorrect. It is apparent, as Mr. Lecky remarks, that "the slave code of imperial Rome compares not unfavorably with those of some Christian nations" (Hist. Morals, vol. i, p. 308).

Legal Argument.

A Letter to the Officers of the Third Liberal League in the City of New York,

IN RESPONSE TO AN INVITATION TO ADDRESS THEM.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

GENTLEMEN: I feel greatly honored by the invitation to address your Liberal League upon the questions raised by the petition against the Comstock Postal Laws of 1873, which was so largely signed and presented to Congress at the last session. But while I appreciate the importance of the subject, I find that a public address would be inconvenient; and I hope that you will accept my answers to your questions by this letter and the inclosed address at Faneuil Hall.

You refer to the petition as having been drawn by me, and "wish to know in what respect, if any, my views have changed in regard to it."

My answer is that the subsequent discussion, and particularly the decision of the Supreme Court in the Matter of Jackson, have changed my views only to increase the conviction that the ground taken in that petition is the only safe one, unless the people are willing to give up their constitutional guarantees of liberty of person and of the press. You probably inquire about a "change of views" because some have intimated that the petition was "hasty, ill considered, and ill advised." Let me assure you, on the contrary, that the petition was carefully considered and revised by several lawyers, publishers, artists, and others, Liberal and otherwise, before the responsibility, which was deeply felt, of sending out for signatures was taken. Although Mr. D. M. Bennett's arrest was the occasion that called it forth, it was not his work nor that of any one person, but rather of a committee of consultation to whom the matter was by him entirely left. The whole subject was then so thoroughly examined that I do not hesitate to say that no law case nor important phase of the question has been since presented that was not before them. The only important facts that have since occurred have been the conviction and imprisonment of Mr. Heywood under the law, and the decision in the Matter of Jackson, in which the Supreme Court of the United States (by an obiter dictum) apparently sustained its constitutionality.

Another impression should be removed, which is to the effect that the petition was sent out simply as a Liberal party movement, designed to aid one particular class of the people. It was intended to be above all partisan or sectarian spirit, purposes, or "traps." It aimed to combine a general public sentiment so as to carry out the motives of those great souls who made the Constitution "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." There is not a word in it that should prevent its being signed by any citizen, no matter of what belief or unbelief.

It is a matter of regret that this petition, and the most important matter it presents, has been left to the management of Liberals only, and even among them has been made a subject of editorial rancor and rivalry by those who have failed to rise to the height of the question involved. It is only to such persons that it appears as especially a Liberal movement or a Liberal "trap." This trap suggestion well illustrates the narrow-mindedness that is to be avoided in approaching questions of this character. We are told that if you dare to oppose these laws you will "fall into the trap" of allying yourselves and all Liberalism with "obscenity." But suppose you do not oppose them? Do you not then ally Liberalism with bigotry and fatal betrayal of liberty? Is not the latter "trap" the worse of the two? But why turn this into a trap question? It is not a choice between Scylla and Charybdis. Let us keep in mid-water and on the high sea, trust to pure motives and the breezes of liberty, and "traps" "to the right of us" and "to the left of us" may be safely left behind to catch those who set or think of them. The Liberal party or sect, like every other in a free republic, will find its justification and victory only in so far as it makes for the good and welfare of the whole people. That liberty of the person, of speech, and of the press are the great means of effecting this welfare is the tradition that has come down to us associated with the names of Otis, Washington, Patrick Henry, Franklin, Jefferson, Madison, and Paine, and which it was the purpose of the petition to help to continue. The belief has been cherished that this tradition was embodied in the Constitution and its amendments, so as to make those liberties the fundamental law of the land. The question is whether these liberties can be "construed out" of the Constitution by Congress and the courts, while the people are blinded by appeals to their prejudices against Liberals or their disgust against obscenity.

In the true point of view, this is not a question of obscenity, but of liberty. The spirit in which it is to be approached is found in these memorable words of Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

But as to the attitude and importance of the questions involved, I think I could give no better answer than to send you a report of my address delivered at Faneuil Hall, Boston, on the 1st inst., at the great "Indignation Meeting" there held to consider the violation of the freedom of the press by the arrest, trial, and sentence, under this law, of Ezra H. Heywood, the editor of The Word, now published at Cambridge, Mass. I send this address, instead of writing further, also because its main points were most heartily approved by the large and intelligent audience that filled the old Hall to overflowing; and this approval gives it a weight beyond my individual opinion. Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant, T. B. WAKEMAN.

August 8, 1878.

To COURTLANDT PALMER, Esq., President, and Other Officers of Third Liberal League, etc.

Address of T. B. Wakeman

AT THE INDIGNATION MEETING, HELD AT FANEUIL HALL, BOSTON, AUG. 1, 1878, TO REMONSTRATE AGAINST THE VIOLATION OF THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS IN THE ARREST, TRIAL, AND CONVICTION OF EZRA H. HEYWOOD, EDITOR OF "THE WORD," AT BOSTON, MASS.

Citizens of Massachusetts, and therefore by Birthright Friends of Liberty:

You have met indignant that one of your number, an editor against whom no man, woman, or child has ever complained of injury, who has not been unfaithful to the old Commonwealth or the Nation, has been imprisoned, as if a common felon, by the United States. You come under a sense of wrong, as your fathers did, to this old Cradle of Liberty, to ask why and how this wrong has come and to consult as to the relief and remedy.

The answer is that the wrong has come from a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and of that very liberty the blessings of which our fathers declared, in its Preamble, they intended to secure by it to themselves and their posterity. This violation has come indirectly and ostensibly for the very worthy purpose of suppressing obscenity. Let me say at the outset, that I respect the motives of the persons who have formed the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and who have contributed to sustain it, but they have selected an improper "agent," and used means unlawful, unconstitutional, and unworthy of them. Your President has introduced me as the author of the petition so largely signed to have these laws in question repealed, and I wish, therefore, publicly to put my foot upon the libel that I, or others who have signed that petition, have so done as the abettors of obscenity or from a desire to give it aid and comfort. The question has become one of constitutional liberty and freedom of person, speech, and press, to which a few dirty pamphlets in the mails are as nothing. We are all agreed upon the question of obscenity—no one has a good word for that—but the issue is one of liberty, of constitutional liberty, and upon that we must take sides at once or it will be forever too late. People, however well intended, must not be allowed to imitate the bear which kept the flies off his master's head by smashing it with a stone. The imprisonment of an editor for anything he may print, except libel, is one of the most dangerous stretches of power possible in a free republic, and worthy of our gravest consideration. We must, therefore, under the Constitution, look closely as to the means and purposes with which this deed has been done. We shall find that the means are laws which have been passed by Congress; that by obiter dictum they have been sanctioned by the United States Supreme Court, and that in effect they take the very heart out of the Constitution.

When next we inquire as to the purposes, the "Agent" of the society which has procured these laws to be passed, informs us distinctly that it is "to stamp out the free press." His words, approved by the society, are these—I read from the last printed report of that society—"Another class of publications issued by Freelovers and Freethinkers is in a fair way of being stamped out. The public generally can scarcely be aware of the extent that blasphemy and filth commingled have found vent through these varied channels. Under a plausible pretense, men who raise a howl about 'free press, free speech,' etc., ruthlessly trample under foot the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint."

This purpose, so plainly avowed, is well illustrated by the seal of the society on the cover of their "Report," in which an author or editor is pictured as a miserable convict being shoved into a prison cell, while the grand and virtuous "agent" is making a bonfire of his books. Is not this a libel on our age and century? or have the Dark Ages returned? Certainly we have here a new Index and Inquisition. But if this avowal is not enough, here is a letter lately written to the N. Y. Tribune, in which the "Agent" informs us that "the work must go on." This letter is a perfect picture of illiterate bigotry, and of itself proves that this "Agent" is the last person who should have been selected as the censor and inquisitor of our liberties and of the American press, if such an officer we must have. [The letter was given in a previous issue.]

The danger of this work and these means and purposes lies in their alleged goodness, in their being represented as "God's service," which we have only to recall the doings of Torquemada and Calvin to remember is too often but another name for man's woe, the more so, the greater the sincerity of the worshipers and the interest of their agents. That the majority are sincere as in the case of this society only increases the danger. In fact, in considering this and all social questions, we must ever bear in mind the three grand divisions of society:

1. There are the Retrogrades. Their ideal Eden, heaven, and hope for the race is to bring it back to some past state of society. They are mostly theological, and always praising the past times; "laudatores temporis acti."

2. The Conservatives, who have great enjoyments or interests at stake, and wish therefore to preserve the present as long as they can, and then to go up and enjoy it all over again and forever in a heaven just above, but not much in advance of them.

3. The Liberals, who are generally poor or educated, or both, and therefore often very radical and progressive. Their heaven and ideal Paradise is in the future, for which they are always sacrificing themselves in the effort to make the present conform to it. This effort accordingly keeps them in constant conflict with the other two grand divisions of society, who have generally been in a large majority, and whose self-preservation it has been and is to stamp them out, or keep them in a serviceable degree of humility.

Now, without recalling these divisions, we shall not fairly understand Mr. Comstock's society nor the Supreme Court, nor the Constitution itself. The Constitution is, in fact, the first grand and successful effort in government to harmonize these grand divisions. As such it deserves ever-increasing wonder and veneration as the only plan by which the great antagonistic classes of society are practically made to coöperate to the general good of the whole. The retrogrades and conservatives always combine and give stability to the national life, while the Liberals secure its progress and growth. The static and dynamic powers of society are thus each used and provided for. The conservative classes give a solid framework for order in the legislation and administration, and then the Bill of Rights provides guarantees for liberty of person, speech, and print, which will permit growth, and so renew the order, and prevent a despotism or a Chinese civilization. It was indeed a great triumph of statesmanship to consolidate the States into a Nation for general purposes, so that they and their people should preserve their safety and liberty only the more securely under the general shield of the Constitution; but it was a result that the most advanced philosophers and socialists may now wonder at, to find social order and progress practically reconciled. To find order resting upon liberty, which constantly renews and enlarges order, even when it seems to fall. In other countries, as in France, for example, there has been little progress without revolution. The static element always seeks to "stamp out" the Liberals until social convulsions result, with all the outrages consequent upon repression. Do not think this is an idle dream or a glittering generality; the Constitution is its practical embodiment. By it the people and States join in establishing a government to administer certain special grants of power for specified objects, but all for the general purpose of making liberty the fundamental law of the land.

To illustrate, by coming to the very point in question, there is a grant among others, that Congress shall have power "to establish post-offices and post-roads," and then to this and all similar special grants there is one of the incidental powers "necessary and proper" to execute them. (Constitution, Art. 8, §§ 7, and 12.)

Now these are the only words in the Constitution on the subject of the post-office. It is admitted by all to be no general or sovereign grant, placing Congress in the position of the British Parliament. The only powers granted are such as are necessary, useful, or, as Chief-Justice Marshall said, "Appropriate to the end" of establishing, that is, of keeping in operation the post-offices and railroads. One may well be lost in astonishment at the fertility of the constructive faculty that can find in these simple words the power for the United States courts to sit upon the decency or the morality of Mr. Heywood's pamphlet, and to fine and imprison him, it might be for ten years, if it is found repugnant to the taste of the presiding judge. Ordinarily small fines of $20 to $100 (except for robbery or gross obstruction) are found sufficient for postal purposes—just enough to remind people of the necessities of the service. The framers of the Constitution, and those who adopted it, were exceedingly and justly fearful of two things;—the granting of criminal jurisdiction to the general Government, and the use of these "incidental" or implied powers. Congress was not even allowed to define the crime of treason to the United States, and the special crimes they could punish were expressly named, as counterfeiting, felony on the high seas, etc.

For all post-office purposes these implied powers are easily ascertained and unobjectionable. But the point is, whether these implied powers can be used, not for any postal purpose, but as the authority for criminal statutes of the most terrible and yet indefinite nature, to effect what is supposed to be moral purposes. Can implied powers be used for purposes beyond the objects of the expressed power for which they were implied? Can implied powers become a source of original criminal jurisdiction outside of the ends for which they were implied as necessary? Can the part exceed the whole? The requirements or "conveniency" of the postal department does not need nor require this extraordinary power. The post-offices and post-roads have been run for a century without thought that they needed such powers or protection. The exclusion of matter lessens the utility and income of the department, and in so far frustrates the object of the Constitution. Exclusion has therefore been made hitherto only on account of weight or injurious or dangerous character of the articles excluded, etc., on the grounds of the necessity or convenience of the service. This is evidently the only true and constitutional ground. With the meaning of the documents inclosed the post-office has nothing to do, and if they have not, Congress has no authority to punish for sending them. The test of the implied power is, that it should be necessary or proper, i. e., useful and "appropriate to the end," i. e., required to effect the object for which it is implied, and where this necessity ceases the power ceases, for it has no ground to stand upon. An implied power can never be an ulterior power.

The case is well presented by Judge Story in his work on the Constitution in regard to the power to "establish post-roads." Could Congress under this clause construct through the States vast systems of roads, over which the mail could be run, and thus make it authority for unlimited internal improvements? The answer is plain: Congress cannot use this power as a pretext to construct internal improvements, or to effect any other ulterior purpose, but it may use it when, where, and however it may be necessary or proper for the object of postal communication.

The meaning of mailed matter has nothing to do with the post-office, nor that with the meaning. There is no necessity nor "conveniency" of the service that is subserved by this penal law. Therefore it has no support in the grant of the Constitution, and it is a sheer, bold, monstrous pretext and usurpation.

It should be remembered that postal questions are far different in this country from what they are in England, where Parliament can do anything except, as it is said, make a man of a woman, or a woman of a man; that is, physical impossibility is the only limit of Parliamentary power. There the power over the post-offices and people is comparatively unrestricted. But our general Government has only the special powers granted in the Eighth Article of the Constitution and such implied powers as "are necessary and proper to carry those special powers into effect."

The simple and single word to "establish" post-offices and post-roads was in no wise intended to grant to Congress the British ulterior power of using them after they were established for objects not committed to Congress at all, but specially reserved to the people of the States, by Amendments 9 and 10. That no such ulterior power was ever intended is clear from history. One of the greatest difficulties in procuring the adoption of the Constitution arose from the fear of these implied powers. Every clause was gone over and over in the Convention that framed the Constitution, and in the Conventions of the several States, to discover how these powers might be wrenched to destroy the liberties of the people. It is very significant that no one ever then supposed that this power "to establish post-offices and post-roads" could be other than such as should be simply devoted to that end. Luther Martin and Patrick Henry, who went over every word to find objections, saw none in this clause, and the authors of the Federalist (in No. 42) make their only reference to the subject in these few words: "The power of establishing post-roads must in every view be a harmless power, and may, perhaps, by judicious management, become productive of great public conveniency. Nothing which tends to facilitate the intercourse between the States can be deemed unworthy of the public care." This plainly means that the postal power must be always, and in every way harmless, since it was only for the public "conveniency" of facilitating intercourse between the States. Little did those patriots dream that a hundred years hence a grant in every point of view so harmless, would grow by construction of an implied power into a terrible penal statute that has nothing to do with the "conveniency" of the post-office, or of the people, or with facilitating their intercourse, but which seeks to prevent and limit all these for the ulterior object of supervising morality. Had the possibility of this ulterior power been suspected then, the Constitution would never have been ratified. Let any one who doubts it turn over the pages of Elliot's debates on the Constitution (especially the Virginia convention), the Federalist, and the second volume of George Ticknor Curtis' "History of the Constitution."

Thus, from the words of the grant and their history, it is clear that no ulterior power of statute-making lurks in the "establishment" of post-offices and post-roads.

So this grant was understood and executed as "harmless" until 1836, when alleged attempts to circulate insurrectionary matter among the Southern slaves brought a message from President Jackson to Congress on the subject of excluding such matter from the mails. Mr. Calhoun was made Chairman of a special committee in the Senate, and the subject received careful consideration. He evidently wished for the power to exclude from, and to supervise the mails in the interest of slavery; but to his great honor, be it said, he saw and declared plainly that the Constitution did not give Congress the power, and he would not claim it. The most he could ask was that by the "comity of nations" the United States would restrain postmasters from delivering such matter in the States which had made its circulation illegal. The question was discussed fully in a Senate of unequal ability, and even this limited restraint proposed by Mr. Calhoun was held by a vote of twenty-five to nineteen to be impossible under the Constitution. (Con. Globe, 1836, pp. 36, 150, 288, 237–9, etc.)

In the debate Henry Clay said: "When I saw that the exercise of a most extraordinary and dangerous power had been announced by the head of the post-office, and that it had been sustained by the President's message, I turned my attention to the subject and inquired whether it was necessary that the general Government should under any circumstances exercise such a power, and whether they possessed it. After much reflection, I have come to the conclusion that they could not pass any law interfering with the subject in any shape or form whatever. The evil complained of was the circulation of papers having a certain tendency. The papers, unless circulated, and while in the post-office, could do no harm: it is the circulation solely—the taking out of the mail and the use to be made of them—that constitutes the evil. Then it is perfectly competent to the State authorities to apply the remedy. The instant that a prohibited paper is handed out, whether to a citizen or to a sojourner, he is subject to the laws which compel him either to surrender or burn it."

Mr. Clay then proceeded to demolish the claim that Congress could legislate to carry into effect the laws of twenty-four different States or sovereignties, and said ironically, "I thought that the only authority of Congress to pass laws was in pursuance of the Constitution."

To the question of Senator Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, to the effect that the post-office power did give Congress the right to regulate what shall be carried in the mails, he replied in the negative, saying, "If such a doctrine prevailed, the Government may designate the persons, or parties, or classes who shall have the benefit of the mails, excluding all others."

During the debate, one of the safest of Senators, your own "Honest John" Davis, said:

"It would be claiming on the part of Government a monopoly—an exclusive right either to send such papers as it pleased or to deny the privilege of sending them through the mail. Once establish the precedent, and where will it lead to? The Government may take it into its head to prohibit the transmission of political, religious, or even moral or philosophical publications, in which it might fancy there was something offensive; and under this reserved right, contended for in this report, it would be the duty of the Government to carry it into effect."

The debate and vote on this subject were conclusive. For even the modified right claimed by Mr. Calhoun few voted with him but his faithful friends of slavery from the South, and James Buchanan; while with the majority were the great names of the Senate, including Benton, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, and—grandest of all, a name ever sacred in this Hall—Daniel Webster.

The debate was, as I have said, conclusive. Through all the dark night of the slave power, through all the dread necessities of the Rebellion, if the mails were ever violated, it was without the form or countenance of law. The post-office, in law and theory at least, and I believe generally in fact, has since remained the common and impartial servant and friend of all.

I have cited this debate, and may recur to it again, for two reasons. First, because if you look at the right, reason, and common sense of the matter, it is indeed conclusive; and, second, by one of the most astonishing legal somersaults ever turned, the Supreme Court of the United States has made this very debate bring out the very opposite conclusion to which the senators arrived.

If we inquire how this result has come, as in the case of most of our social evils, we must remember the consequences of our civil war. Under the war-powers of the Constitution the Government had to use incidental and implied powers to effect constitutional but extraordinary ends; and so, through the revenue, excise, postal, income, and other laws, a system of supervision of the people was inaugurated, with a network of artificial crimes and penalties, as though the Government could do anything that seemed to it expedient. After the war the habits and precedents it induced have, to a great extent, remained. In no other way can the extraordinary mass of legislation that this "Agent's" society has obtained from Congress, and some of the State legislatures, be accounted for. These laws were, in effect, passed surreptitiously. The mass of the people never heard of them until they were being enforced. They therefore have no weight as deliberate laws of the Nation or the State. They are the private laws of the society which obtained them to be put upon the statute books without the knowledge of the rest of the community. In all cases affecting the people generally, the referendum, or at least public notice and discussion, is necessary to make the laws in any proper sense the acts of the people or the nation. In 1872 the society obtained from Congress an act that the tickets and circulars of illegal lotteries should be excluded from the mails under a fine of $100 to $500. When the power of the society was consolidated, in 1876, they had the word "illegal" stricken out of their statute, so as to exclude all lottery matter from the mails, whether legal in the States or not. Under this act A. Orlando Jackson was induced by a decoy letter of this "Agent," under the false name of J. Ketcham, to send him a lottery circular by mail. The agent thereupon had Jackson arrested, indicted, and tried at New York, in the U. S. District Court, for sending a lottery circular through the mail. He was found guilty, and was fined $100 and imprisoned until payment. To test the law, his very ingenious and able counsel, A. J. Dittenhoefer, Esq., of New York, had, before the trial (there being no appeal from the decision on the trial), applied upon petition for writs of habeas copus and certiorari to inquire into his preliminary imprisonment. The petition was denied by the U. S. Circuit Court, and so the matter was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Observe that the sole question, aside from the technical and very doubtful one as to the power to issue the writs at all, was as to the legality of these postal lottery acts of 1872 and 1876. The ground taken by the petitioner's counsel was that Congress had no grant of power to pass the acts in question, and therefore they were unconstitutional and void. That was the sole and only question before the court; all beyond the decision of that question was obiter dictum. The briefs of the counsel on both sides of the case, which lie before me, present nothing further. The law of 1873, under which Mr. Heywood is imprisoned, was not before the court nor argued at all, nor was the effect of the amendments to the Constitution prohibiting Congress from passing any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or forbidding the seizure of property without warrant, upon either of these laws, argued or presented to the court at all.

It was assumed by the court without argument, that lotteries and the "press" must share the same fate, as though lotteries were the press, and not business adventures, and not included at all under the amendment of the Constitution securing freedom of the press.

But let us now look for a few minutes at the main points in the decision of the court. Mr. Justice Field of California delivered the only opinion in which the court is supposed to concur. At the start he disposes of the main issue of the case, the only one actually presented and argued, by a singular assumption. It is this: Because the validity of legislation regulating what should be carried in the mails as to weight and form and postal charges, has never been questioned, and since such regulations have varied from time to time, therefore he infers, "The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded." This begs the whole question; for it assumes that matter has been excluded for non-postal reasons. Any argument from legislation and usage is at best of doubtful value, for time does not justify usurpation, but to be of any service whatever, it must be shown that the legislation and regulations have covered ends beyond and ulterior to the purposes and ways and means appropriate to the end of establishing post-offices and post-roads. The counsel for the petitioner claimed that for one hundred years,—from the foundation of the Government up to

The New Age.

BY W. S. BELL.

The age in which we live is not only a new age, but it surpasses all others of the past in its higher form of civilization. Not that modern society produces in every department more wonderful products of art or genius than were evolved by the civilizations of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, but that on the whole the civilization of Europe and America produces higher social conditions, and on the average nobler types of humanity than have ever before been attained by the human race.

We find many monuments of genius amid the ruins of the past, but as a general thing among ancient people the masses were sunk into the dust. There was something brilliant in the culture of Greece; her literature and art remain still instinct with life and beauty.

The world has not yet ceased to turn its eyes towards the land of Phideas and Demosthenes in search of beauty and eloquence, and to Rome, the martial conqueror of the world, for lessons, courage, and civil law. But the love of the beautiful, as developed by Greece, and the lofty courage of Rome, together with her civic institutions, were more showy and dazzling than humane or progressive.

The culture of Greece was the result in a large measure of her geographical position. She dwelt under a sunny sky. Her coast was washed on three sides by commercial seas, which led far inland by bays and rivers. The Greeks were a maritime people. Commerce developed her naval force, and thus she became a ruler of the seas. Hence her activity, courage, and wealth, the necessary elements of a powerful civilization.

The lovely climate developed the taste for the beautiful.

Mr. Buckle has clearly pointed out that the "aspects of nature," the mountains and plains, the seas and deserts, the snow-capped peaks, and the tropical garden lands, all have a tendency to develop certain characteristics in their inhabitants.

The mountains always produce a hardy and brave people, while the milder climates produce softer races. Hence we find in the temperate climate the highest form of civilization. Whatever form ancient civilization assumed, it possessed no spirit of progress. Change was an evil. Everything was permanent, and such a thing as altering the well-established laws or institutions was not thought of. "The law of the Medes and Persians which altereth not," displays that most universal spirit of ancient people to be opposed to change. The Egyptians had no more thought of changing or modifying their religion than they had of overthrowing the pyramids. The Chinese, with their caste system, are fit illustrations of a non-progressive people. Everything is to-day with them as it was a thousand years ago, and as it will be in a thousand to come if they are to remain by themselves. But they cannot. The diffusive spirit of the new age cannot only find Livingston in the wilds of Africa, but it can and will find the North Pole, and it will also in time stir and stimulate China from center to circumference with the spirit of progress.

In these older forms of civilization the individual was lost sight of, all members of society exerted for the State, for the king and priest. The people had no rights which kings or priests were bound to respect. In those times the people did not talk of "rights," of "equal rights," but of customs and service, of usages, traditions, and "sacred things." Nor did Christianity seek to greatly modify this common sentiment. The Church began its career of tyranny by preaching on the duty of obedience, personal submission, contentment, and resignation. Wives were to be subject to their husbands "in everything." Slaves were to obey uncomplainingly, their masters, and count their masters "worthy of all honor," and citizens were to be subject unto the powers that be, for they were "ordained of God." Kings and tyrants then ruled by divine right, and priests gathered in the money into the treasury of the Lord, and the poor people perished because they had no rights which gods or priests felt bound to respect.

How changed is all this now in most enlightened nations. Man has become an individual demanding and winning his rights. Pretty soon there will be another individual, a woman, who shall struggle up to this higher plane of humanity, and secure her rights. Already rulers admit the authority and rights of the people. We no longer hear of the "divine right of kings" to rule the people, but everywhere the immortal words of the immortal Lincoln are reëchoed, "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Kings and presidents now condescendingly acknowledge themselves "public servants."

The Modern Story of the Forty Thieves.

WRITTEN FOR CHILDREN OF A LARGER GROWTH.

BY MRS. EMMA ESTABROOK.

Once upon a time, in a little village, there lived two brothers. Frank, the elder, was considered by far the smarter of the two. He could trade off more knives with broken blades, could get through more lessons without study, and out of more scrapes without punishment than any three boys of the same size in school. In fact, he was a regular little scamp; and what seemed so strange, instead of being made to see the meanness of such tricks, he was allowed to think them an evidence of smartness. Frank would never have to work for his living. Oh, no! he was too smart for that; while George, good, honest George, had come to think himself quite inferior to his brilliant brother. And if at times there did come a feeling of resentment at the injustice done him, it was instantly suppressed, for George was generous as well as just.

Both brothers attended the same school, keeping about equal in their studies, for though George was the younger of the two, he had early acquired the habit of close application, and a lesson once learned was never forgotten. Both boys passed a creditable examination, George especially; but people showed their usual discrimination.

Time passed on. George entered a large manufactory as apprentice. Frank tried law, then medicine, then clerking; but law was too confining, medicine was so stupid, and in the store they actually expected him to pack bundles like any chore boy. Then, too, about this time he was becoming "interested" in a certain young lady.

We will pass over this interesting period of his life, simply saying that he displayed the usual earnestness in making a fool of himself. In due time he was married; and through the influence of his father-in-law partly, and his father-in-law's money particularly, he became partner in a large retail store. At first he lived solely for pleasure, his father-in-law's money proving the "Open sesame" which admitted him to the highest and most aristocratic circles.

Then came a change. He began to realize the immense power of money combined with apparent respectability, and from being a careless, selfish man he became grasping and avaricious. He now began to display the same genius for trade which characterized him as a boy. He fairly astonished the older members by his aptness in disposing of damaged goods. In the course of time he became sole proprietor; joined the church, rented the costliest pew, gave liberally to foreign missions (having the subscription lists published), and in fact became a "pillar of the church." And if the woman who did the family washing for fifty cents a week did have her doubts as to the genuineness of his religion, what did it matter? Was he so very different from other church members? If he was not a Christian, then who was?

About this time he became possessed of several thousand dollars surplus capital. Casting about for a good investment, and being a Christian, and therefore a philanthropist, he decided on a savings bank, where poor people might deposit their hard-earned wages instead of squandering them in comforts for themselves and families. He at once formed a company of forty of the so called best men and pillars of some church. Well, the Bank, or the House of the Forty Thieves—it doesn't matter which you call it, they being one and the same—was established, received the usual amount of deposits, ran the usual length of time, and came to the usual end. One morning a placard was placed in the window bearing the simple yet dread word, FAILED.

The news spread rapidly. Frantic men and women rushed to the bank demanding their money. They were told, with many deprecating waves of the hand, that it was a sad business, very sad; but no one was to blame; that everything possible should be done, even to sacrificing personal property, to satisfy their just demands; and would they quietly disperse until such time as a settlement could be made? So they went away—what else could they do—and after a while, when the excitement had given place to a dull despair, a settlement was made of twenty cents on the dollar.

Most of the men went bravely to work again, some few took to drinking, two committed suicide, while the Forty Thieves published a card stating that "a train of unforseen circumstances, providential no doubt, had combined to cause the failure of the bank." They then gracefully retired to private life, until such time as they might safely come before the public again.

Meanwhile George, too, had found the "Open sesame;" but with him it was brains, not money, which opened all doors. From being an apprentice he had risen to be inventor and manufacturer of a celebrated motive power. But as I have already made my story too long, I will not stop to follow George through the successive steps which raised him to his present position. But I must relate one event or series of events which exerted a powerful influence over his subsequent life. At the time when his influence was beginning to be recognized in social circles, there occurred one of those periodical revivals of religion, and at this particular time George became very much interested in religious matters. Going home one evening after an interview with one of those zealous but indiscreet young converts, he resolved to investigate the matter, and, if needs be, to change his whole course of life; though, to tell the truth, he could not see why a change of heart should be so very necessary in his case.

Taking down the Bible, with a little guilty flush at his long neglect, he began to read here and there, when he chanced to come across a verse which instantly arrested his attention. It was this:

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction."

He looked again. Yes, there it was; nothing could be plainer. He fell into a deep study; the open book on his lap, his eyes fixed on vacancy. Presently he arose, and going into the sitting-room, where his wife was quietly at work, he went up to her and placed his arm about her, saying, "Annie, I've been thinking how much more we might do for others if we would."

"Yes, George," said she; "the suffering among the poor is dreadful. See; I am making this for poor Mrs. Jones. You know she has no one to help her, now her son is dead."

George drew her a little closer, saying, "I see you don't need a change of heart, little wife."

She looked up surprised, asking what he meant; but George only laughed and began talking of other things. The next day he was again interviewed by the zealous young convert, and from a simple difference of opinion as to what religion really was, there arose a serious quarrel. To be brief, George was made the subject of sermons, and prayer-meetings were called for his especial benefit. But the Lord was either satisfied with George's views, or else thought him too far gone in sin. Most of the church members took the latter view of the case.

But true worth and honesty are bound to conquer in the end, and so it was in George's case. Meanwhile his business steadily increased. Strange how the Lord prospers the wicked. Now, a few years before the failure of the bank, George had been persuaded into investing in stock, so he lost heavily. When the news of the failure came, and he became aware of the true state of affairs, he went home very thoughtful and had a long talk with his wife, which resulted in their giving up several plans and giving the money so saved to the relief of those who could least bear the loss of the fruits of years of self-denial. This was done very quietly; but such things will leak out. Frank said he always knew George was a fool. Envious people, who were themselves too selfish to imitate such an example, shrugged their righteous shoulders, saying they "always knew George was—er—not exactly foolish, but so odd, eccentric, you know."

Now, I did intend to make George a governor and Frank president of an insurance company, but I know I have exhausted your patience, kind reader, so I will close my simple little story in the good old-fashioned way, that is, with a moral. Yes; with two of them, and with "They all lived happy forever after."

Moral No. 1: An ounce of brains is worth a pound of money, but the money helps the brains along mightily.

Moral No. 2: Whatever you are, don't be a sham.

Liberty.

How hard it is for the world to learn what liberty is! The conquerer and the conquered, the invader and the invaded, all claim alike to be fighting for "liberty." In the late war the South, with a population half slaves, and the North, with her hosts invading and desolating the South for the declared purpose of a coerced union of the States, claimed to be fighting for the blessings of liberty and free government. The revolutionists of 1776 were called rebels; with success, they are now deemed patriots. The revolutionists of 1861 were called rebels; with defeat, they are now deemed traitors. So you see the character of the term "rebel" depends upon success and whose ox is gored. But, exclaims one, "The South had no cause to rebel." That is what England said to Ireland, and Scotland, and the Provinces. That is what Russia said to Poland, and Spain to Cuba. That is what the oppressor always says to the oppressed. Who should be judge in the matter, the aggrieved or the aggressor?

To me there are three self-evident facts embodied in natural liberty:

1. Every adult person has the right to perfect freedom in all things consistent with the life, liberty, and property of others.

2. Whatever two or any number of adult persons agree upon touching each other, no other parties have any right to interfere with.

3. Minors and the insane should be protected by humanity from all that is wrong; and the only guide we can have in the matter is the voice of the majority.

While the majority have the right to protect minors from what they think wrong, they have no right to force upon minors what the minority think wrong. I have no natural right to teach my children Atheism, Spiritualism, Mormonism, as truth; nor has the majority, the public, or government, the right to teach them Christianity or any other creed as truth. Teach children nothing as truth but self-evident truths. All else as information; leaving their judgment unbiased when they arrive at maturity. With these views of liberty it is easy to see where I stand, from the question of self-government down to the "obscenity" laws,

Everybody from Maine to Texas will tell you they believe in self-government, but it takes a majority of the people of the United States, the majority of a State, or at least a district, to constitute a "self." That is not self-government at all, but makes the individual self dependent upon the will of some majority.

The question of government or no government (aside from family government) belongs to the individual. He can give up that right for himself but not for posterity. The quality and conduct of governments belong to majority rule. But the majority should rule consistent with the natural rights of the individual.

In regard to the so-called obscenity laws, my views are as follows: Whether constitutional or not, they are contrary to liberty. The greatest liberty consistent with the rights of all is the safest plan always. Protect the young, but not by abridging the natural rights of the adults.

What may always be poison to the mind of my child may be food for the learning of useful knowledge to me. The world differs so in regard to good and bad, right and wrong, it is not safe to legislate for adults only concerning self-evident facts in morals. The government has no right to discriminate from a moral standpoint between printed matter, pictures (sealed), or anything that is allowed to pass through the mails. Any one should be punished that exposes to public view or gives or sells to minors knowingly any kind of vulgar scenery or books.

The law in regard to prevention of conception is unjust. Prevention and abortion are very different things. One is murder, the other no more so than taking quinine to prevent a chill. The self-harm it may engender should be left an open question, like the use of whiskey or calomel. It is a private affair that belongs to the individual. I will go still farther (and in doing so I may meet the opposition of every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. But they are my honest views, and he or she that cannot respect honest opinions publicly expressed is no Liberal).

I see no consistency in condemning the nefarious practice of the Restell's, when every physician in the land under some pretext or other, can do the same thing with impunity. Again, is it not the same in principle as selling rum, opium, tobacco, and coffee for any other use than medicine. Are not the users (unless minors) of the medicines, the guilty parties? Yours for repeal, O. JONES.

What Shall We Tie To?

BY S. P. PUTNAM.

At a ministers' meeting, one of the brethern said that we had been "browsing" over the universe long enough; we ought to "tie up." To this we agree. But the question arises, What shall we tie to? What fixed spiritual material have we to depend upon? Suppose there was but one church in the world—the Unitarian; that it was fully established; what should we preach about from Sunday to Sunday? Would some, or all, find their occupation gone unless there was something "to kick against?"

We might ask the same question of our orthodox brethern; what would they talk about if there were no heresies, no "sin"? if there were nothing to pull down—only the work of building up? There is enough, evidently, for a church militant to do; but is there anything for a church triumphant? Will it "browse," or "tie up"? The fact is, we are all afloat so far as positive truth is concerned. The orthodox are just as unsettled as we. They can't define their position. They can't say what they really believe. They are only certain of what they don't believe. They are sure of their denials, but not of their affirmations. They have tried to find "stopping places"; but no sooner do they get fairly anchored than off they go. The "mighty stream of tendency" will not let them abide.

After all, the question is not, Shall the Unitarian church exist? but, Shall the universal Church exist? Will the "spirit of the times" finally hurl it upon the rocks, and its broken timbers, in the "dry light" of science, be fit only for kindling wood? Will the "meeting-house" be turned into a factory, and its soaring spire be useful only because it tells the time of day and which way the wind blows?

We talk of the non-progress of the Unitarian body; but all branches of the Church suffer as intensely as ours. Everywhere there is disorganization, retreat, at times despair. All want something to "tie to," but can find no abiding place. The whirligig of time does not seem to have any respect even for the "safest creed." The most ponderous doctrine, like "poor Jo," is obliged to "move on."

I do not think the Church can tie to any set of doctrines, or principles, or declaration of faith, or statement of truth, however simple. It can only tie to a function; to a form of practical work. Its function, its "post of honor" to tie to, is the social development of the race under a high moral purpose.

There are social developments other ways, by other means; but to make men moral by a more beneficent society is the work of the Church. Morality depends upon sociability, or fellowship. Crime, or any sort of selfishness, is anti-social. Everything, no matter how trivial, that brings men together in neighborly relations, makes for righteousness.

But there should be a permanent moral effort in this direction. It should not be a matter of mere pleasure or culture. The virtue of the social instincts must be recognized, and these unfolded because of that virtue. The Church is set for this. It began as a mighty socialistic movement, and as such it must continue or die. It must get rid of other offices it has undertaken and failed in, and stick to this. It must help bring men together, not as professors of the same creed, but as members of the same body; as friends, neighbors, seeking in the communion of a common nature for incitements to noble living. This was the strength of the Church in the beginning and it is the strength of the churches to-day. All are drifting unconsciously into social organizations. The "creed" takes the background, and the parlor and kitchen-fire come to the front. The cooking-stove is almost on a par with the pulpit, and the cup of tea with the sermon. The congregations are beginning to feel that they are not simply to be "preached at," or formally declare, "We are miserable sinners"; but that they must talk with one another, shake hands, and be friends.

People are not sociable enough. They are not sufficiently acquainted in ways of good-will; though in ways of gossip and scandal the acquaintanceship seems to be quite thorough. But to do away with gossip and scandal as well as with coarser crimes, there must be a finer intercommunication, not in ways of mere belief, but of common daily living. To do this with intent moral purpose is the office of the Church; and I can see no end to this brotherly and affectionate mission.

Such is the function of the Church in the realm of the Known; it is humanity. But in and through this it has a function as regards the Unknown, or "Unknowable."

There are three attitudes towards the Unknown—indifference, fear, trust. The attitude of indifference is considered the proper scientific attitude; but only few can hold this, and they only at the expense of the highest movements of the heart. Almost all have the attitude of fear; and, alas! the Church has too much insisted upon this attitude. The true function of the Church, however, is to maintain the attitude of trust. This was the faith of Christ, and this is faith in him. We are not to define the Unknown, but simply believe in its essential goodness, its fatherhood. The Church has failed in its definition; it has made "confusion worse confounded," and has well deserved the rebukes and sneers of science. The Church cannot tie to any fixed theology. Its work is simply to remove fear of the Unknown; to proclaim out of the intensity of its life that the Eternal is Our Father; that the underlying power whence all things flow, that holds life and death in its grasp, is a power that makes for righteousness; that it is good according to and transcending our highest ideas of goodness, and that we can trust in it wholly, serenely, triumphantly.

As men know more of each other in moral endeavor and intercourse, they will know more of God; through human communion we shall come into the divine communion.

Let the Church hereafter cease to define or explain, but devote itself to the moral unfolding of men as friends, as brothers; and through this moral unfolding it will show forth the Everlasting Goodness. Theologies are useful for the time being; but we cannot "tie to" them, even the best. There can be no permanent "science" of God; but there can be a life of God, broadening and deepening in the love we have for one another; and out of man's life to make God's life, in perpetual admonition and onward impulse, is the ever fresh work of the Church—a work to be pursued in the "infinite patience of God."—Boston Investigator.

Woman's Rights and Wrongs.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Unfailing in admiration of your courage in publishing the articles pertaining to the social and sexual questions, I have never found the time to express any opinion regarding them.

Nothing has seemed to me so great an outrage on the part of Anthony Comstock as the arrest of Mrs. Dr. S. B. Chase. All of his acts have seemed mean, but this one seemed fired with peculiar animus, and I felt it more keenly because I was so familiar with the ideas this woman was striving to teach. Any man who could read her "Responsibility of Sex," and not rise from its perusal a nobler and better man, must most certainly be one who has eaten orthodox garbage until all his wholesome nature is changed, reason a dead letter, and common sense a crime against God.

First, let us admit that the charge is true, that Mrs. Chase did advocate the limitation of offspring by chemical check or any harmless preventive that places the natural functions under woman's own control. Then let us approach this subject with pure heart and clean hands, discuss it in a manner befitting a subject so important as the birth of a human body to hold a living and (as I believe) an immortal soul.

So long has man dominated over woman, that for her to dare invade the field of thought, and attempt to teach that she has any right in this direction, will cause every epithet of cruelty and ignorance to be hurled against her.

Fœticide is known to be the prevailing crime with modern women; the church member, the most guilty among the number; for Freethought has taught woman her own power, and Spiritualism teaches women that this is one of the most heinous of all crimes. The long, weary care, pain, and toil of childbirth fall on the mother, and by the frequent births of children any freedom or chance for mental culture is, in a great measure, debarred, and too often the sons, if not the daughters, outgrow the mother intellectually. In the ever-widening field of knowledge women are steadily advancing; and all honor to that woman who shall say, "I am able to place even the limited power in the hands of my own sex of protecting themselves sinlessly against often enforced maternity." If Mrs. Chase can do it, honor to her.

This subject is beginning to attract attention everywhere where free thought is known; and just in proportion to the length of time it has been tabooed, so will it be the more radically discussed. One Mrs. Besant, in England, this year, and a Mrs. Chase in America, will be tenfold increased in a few years, and women, free, can be no more enslaved.

Men fancy they know every crook and turn of a woman's nature. When was it ever the interest of the master to study the nature of the slave? And yet, during the existence of slavery, if a man had been told that his slave knew his nature better than it was possible for him to know his slave's, he would have laughed you to scorn. It has been to woman's interest to study man, for he ruled her destiny in all things. The true nature of woman has never been called forth, and when it is (and in her entire freedom it will be), man will stand awed before the creature over whom he has dominated so long.

One of the very first difficulties to be overcome by the reformers is the false modesty that the Church has so long fostered in the bosom of its followers that it causes them to regard all as vile that is natural, and to lie to their innocent children about the very facts that it is a necessity for them to know. We reap steadily the fruit of this ignorance, and it is this that the reformer is destined to overcome. Looking to the openness of discussion now carried on in many leading secular papers, and contrasting it with the prudery of twenty years ago, we have reason to feel hopeful of the future.

The wisest physician has concluded that the best medicines to be used are pure air, exercise, sunlight, and cleanliness. The scientist and philanthropist, working hand in hand, will begin to discuss honestly with the people the right propagation of the human race; not in advocating the theory of the stirpiculturist, but teaching the men and women of the land that the sickly and infirm have no right to send into the world beings to be cursed by their infirmities, and so aid in robbing asylums and hospitals of their inmates; while they who are fitted to bear children can become large-hearted enough to be willing to love the generous-hearted and forbearing man and woman "as themselves," and give of their children to be loved and cared for, and to beautify the homes of others. I know that to the well-taught selfishness of Christianity such a millennial condition is undreamed of. But I am well assured that in the far future of a race spiritualized by the freedom of its women, there will exist a condition of society, and a spiritually elevated race of beings, that the average mind of to-day can scarcely conceive of, and a monogamic marriage as far in advance of the present as is the present ahead of the old polygamous system will be a settled fact.

The world moves, and we are striding on far and fast. The age demands a new morality, based on a nobler conception of human duty. We are so inured by custom and habit to accept all that public officials do that we scarcely see, or, seeing, dare criticise, the vile acts of immorality and fraud perpetrated in our public service. "It is hard indeed to say in what shape the fierce future will come upon us, but come it will; for 'when robbery is universal, violence and murder cannot be far away.'" But in all the sadness that fills my heart over the ruin and decay of a once grand republic, there rises a fierce, glad spasm of joy, a jubilation in the thought, It helps to free my own sex from the long-worn chains of past superstitions. Only the freedom of the slaves, and the slave elevated to the position of law-maker over her and her children, ever aroused the woman of the South to the fact that women were virtually slaves, without voice in any matter, though the tax-roll voted them millionaires.

I thank God that I was rocked in a heterodox cradle, by the hand of a man. He taught me to hate slavery when he was master of many; but, like all noble natures, he saw that it degraded the master even more than the bondman. He hated the set forms of creedal worship, for he saw in it a slave worshiping a master, and the brutal idea of slavery in any form was hateful to him.

I know many will combat my ideas, in thought if not with pen. But there is truth, and time will prove it, that "when women cease to be weak, men will cease to be wicked." One family is a type of a world. In my own, every member (eight in number) thinks as I do; and this goes far toward proving that woman is the molder of character. Men are rendered strong by her strength, or mean by her weakness. Withdraw them from the Church to-day, and it topples at once to ruin. And yet what is their influence, the influence of wealth, of fashion, and of display? We are so intoxicated with the earthly now that to dream of the heavenly seems little short of madness. But come it will, this ceaseless dream of mine; this ever-increasing thirst for the holy and the divine can be slaked at the infinite ocean alone.

This life was given for discipline—to subjugate the brute nature to the spiritual, and grow higher and closer toward the angelic brotherhood. How many strive for this high ideal? Do they not rather bandage the eyes of the spiritual, and bow its head beneath the strong hand of the lustful giant, force it to sit in the dim recess of the soul, and listen, with sighs of pain and tears of anguish, to the coarse jests of its brutal brother? Vain its soft pleadings to deafened ears. The syren voice of vice drowns the cry. But we wait; we wait. E. L. SAXON.

Suppress Vice but not Free Speech.

There seems to have been a large and spirited meeting at Faneuil Hall, Boston, on Thursday night, to remonstrate against the imprisonment of a man named Heywood for circulating a pamphlet which advocates loose notions of the relations of the sexes. Elizur Wright presided, and speeches were made by a number of persons denunciatory of Anthony Comstock and his methods. While all good citizens desire a vigorous suppression of impure literature, the Society for the Suppression of Vice would do well to move cautiously in suppressing works which are merely expressions of opinion. Touch upon the right of free publication, and hundreds and thousands of people become interested at once upon the side of the accused. The prosecution and imprisonment of Heywood was, in this sense, seemingly a grave mistake. It has given him and his pamphlets a notoriety and his views a circulation which would otherwise never have been obtained. The trouble is, that when an organization is once formed the superintendents and agents are under a constant spur to call attention to themselves and their work, and after they have successfully attacked really objectionable publications they are very apt to proceed against persons who only hold objectionable opinions. Then, too, the methods by which Comstock gets his evidence are not such as commend themselves to public morality. Tempting people to do wrong and then arresting them is not the kind of business any law-abiding community can countenance. It inevitably leads to abuse. The Society for the Suppression of Vice would do well hereafter to be more discreet in the prosecution of cases which bring up the right of free discussion, for by straining the law they only injure the cause they have at heart.—Graphic.

Mr. Wakeman's Argument.

Much of our space is given up this week to the able argument of our townsman T. B. Wakeman upon the constitutionality of what are known as the Comstock laws. We hope every reader will give this argument a careful perusal. If they do, we think the larger number will come to the conclusion that the seventy thousand who had the temerity to petition for the repeal or modification of those laws did not commit a great moral wrong. A careful weighing of the argument will make it clear to most minds that a repeal of those laws is what the Liberals of this country want and must contend for, and that those who passively or positively advocate those laws are to that extent working to fasten upon the necks of the Liberals of this country a collar and chain of despotism and intolerance most onerous to be borne and destructive to the very principle of individual liberty.

The Meeting at Watkins

Commences on the 22d inst., and will continue four days. The prospects are that it will be the largest assemblage of Liberal thinkers that ever convened in this country and perhaps in the world. It is to be hoped that every friend of truth and progress will be present, at least a part of the time, who can make it convenient to do so. We hope to meet there and shake by the hand thousands of sympathetic friends.

There will be many excellent speeches delivered there, and we are thinking of having them regularly reported and printed in book form. They will be highly prized by thousands who will be unable to be present as well as by large numbers who will be present and will be more than glad to possess a copy of the eloquent speeches on that grand occasion. We have decided to publish those speeches if a sufficient number of friends and patrons will bespeak copies. The expense of the enterprise will be considerable and a goodly number of the books will need to be engaged in advance to justify the outlay. The time is now short before the Convention takes place; let every person who wishes a copy of the speeches of that Convention send in their names at once. The volume will probably contain from 400 to 600 pages and will be worth from $1.00 to $1.50. How many want it? Friends let us hear from you at once.

The Watkins Convention.

Dr. J. M. Peebles will speak on "The Origin and Spiritual Unity of all Religions," at the Watkins Convention.

Luther Colby, Esq., of Boston, editor of the Banner of Light, is expected to be present at the Watkins Convention.

The Liberals of Wyalusing and vicinity met Sunday, Aug. 4th, and made arrangements to attend the Watkins Convention in a body.

Mrs. Grace L. Parkhurst, of Elkland, Pa., will speak on "The Harmonial Philosophy," at the Watkins Convention.

Mr. W. J. R. Hargrave, editor of the Freethought Journal, of Toronto, Canada, is expected to be present at the Watkins Convention, and he urges the Liberals of Canada to attend.

The Liberals of Ithaca will attend the Watkins Convention by the way of Geneva. By the L. V. R R. and steamboat on Seneca lake the round trip is only $2.50.

Prof. William Denton, the geological lecturer, of Boston, writes of Watkins Glen: "The place you have chosen for the convention is a delightful one, and would attract a geologist at any time."

The S., G., and C. R. R. will sell excursion tickets from Corning to Watkins and return for 75 cents, and from Geneva to Watkins and return for $1, to persons attending the Watkins Convention.

The old-time Hutchinson family, consisting of John W., Miss Fannie B., Mr. Henry J., and Miss Lilly Hutchinson, have agreed to be present and entertain the Watkins Convention with their popular singing.

Arrangements are being made for a grand social dance at the Opera House at Watkins on Saturday evening, Aug. 24th, the proceeds to go towards the paying of the necessary expenses of the convention.

Rev. A. L. Alcott a Presbyterian minister now preaching to a Presbyterian Church at Mansfield, Ohio, and who is fast "evoluting" out of orthodoxy, has promised to attend the Watkins Convention. We hope Liberals will extend to him "the right hand of fellowship."

Those intending to attend the Watkins Convention over the Northern Central R R., the Philadelphia and Erie R. R., or the Pennsylvania R R. should send at once, to H. L. Green, Salamanca, N. Y., for the necessary order.

Those who desire good rooms at hotels and boarding-houses at Watkins better order at once, as they are being rapidly taken by those going to the Convention. The "Lake View House" and the "Glen Park Hotel" are two of the best, each of which has put down its rates to $2 per day. Others are only $1.

the lottery laws in question, there had been no legislation or regulations except such as were appropriate to the end, i. e. to the running and utility of the Post-office Department, and that the attempt to go beyond this in 1836 was found to be unconstitutional in the debate we have referred to, and which he presented to the court. The learned Judge himself by the instances of "weight," "form," "postage," etc., really confirms this, for all such matters are plainly appropriate only to postal ends. But he argues because Congress has regulated as to these matters appropriate to the end, therefore it may do so generally, and as to matters that are not appropriate to the end; that is to say, because Congress is authorized to include and has included certain articles that conduce to the utility of the service, therefore it may exclude others for reasons that have nothing to do with the service, but with certain supposed moral and religious ends. The conclusion should be exactly the reverse, for usage can only prove the legality of acts and regulations in conformity with it, not of those opposed to it. The fact is that the unbroken and unquestioned usage proves, as far as usage can, the conclusion directly opposite to the one drawn by the learned Judge.

In order to sustain the conclusion he reaches, laws, decisions, and regulations, showing that from the adoption of the Constitution down, it had been the usage of the Government to go beyond the necessary and proper ways and means for running the postal department would have been in point; but no such laws or facts are pretended or found by court or counsel. From the opposite facts presented and even stated by the court, exactly the wrong conclusion has been drawn. The correct conclusion is that Congress has power to exclude for postal purposes and reasons and for no other. All other exercise of power of exclusion is a sheer usurpation.

The learned Judge having thus disposed of the counsel and his case in the way he should not, takes the whole case and more into his own hands. He does this because the wrong conclusion already reached by him brings him as he intimates into apparent, and as we think, into direct conflict with the Bill of Rights of the Constitution, known as the Ten Amendments. How, for instance, can this supposed power of Congress to exclude for non-postal purposes be reconciled with the clause, "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Or, again, "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized."

That the Constitution was never intended to give the ulterior powers claimed is evident enough from these and other clauses which are utterly inconsistent with them. The learned Judge, having by reversed logic found these powers in Congress, finds them to be useless unless he can enforce them consistently with the Bill of Rights, "and here" he truly says, "the difficulty attending the subject arises." But the same kind of logic is equal to the emergency, and in this way;—he finds rightly that sealed letters and packets are prohibited from being opened and searched while in the mails; also, that transportation and circulation of unsealed printed matter cannot be interfered with, for they are essential to the freedom of the press.

These are sound and healthy premises, and we expect the only logical conclusion, to wit, therefore, Congress can pass no laws excluding such matters from the mails except for postal reasons, because such laws would abridge the freedom of the press and be void.

But again the learned Judge has drawn exactly the wrong conclusion. He says, "If, therefore, printed matter be excluded from the mails, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress."

It is difficult to imagine a worse specimen of reasoning than this. The "therefore" works exactly the other way. Because transportation and circulation through the mails are, as he says, necessary to freedom of the press, therefore Congress cannot abridge them or take them away. No other conclusion is possible.

But the learned Judge, to get around his own absurd conclusion, adds that if Congress does abridge and take them away, then it cannot forbid the transportation in any other way. This only makes the logic worse; it grants that the exclusion is an "abridgement" and then seeks to obviate that conclusion by saying that Congress must'nt take away its transportation as merchandise! That is, the press, before and since the adoption of the Constitution, has circulated its "letters, newspapers, and pamphlets" by means of two hands—one, the mail, the other, as freight; now says the learned Judge, Congress cannot pass any law abridging the freedom of the press, which is its circulation, but if it does and so cuts off one of its circulating hands, it must leave the other. As though cutting off this right hand was no abridgement! The correct conclusion is that Congress cannot cut off either of these hands. Certainly leaving one is no excuse for lopping off the other. Every attempt to make sense of this part of the opinion must be hopeless. Shakspere needed but a touch of this reasoning to finish the character of Dogberry, and crown his own genius as the poet of absurdity.

But one step in absurdity not only leads to another, but surely leads to unpleasant contrast with people who are not absurd. And so the learned Judge finds that his singular logic brings him into a position of direct opposition to the great jurists and statesmen who had settled the question the other way in the Senate in 1836. He brings all of these great men, however, apparently over to his side by a legal somersault as absurd, false, and amusing as his former conclusions and logic. He says it is evident that the views of these great men "were founded upon the assumption" that Congress had not this power, because the postal grant to Congress is exclusive, and enables Congress to prohibit the transportation of newspapers and pamphlets over postal roads by any other way than by the mails. Now, he says, we will just turn back on the Senators and capture their ground by making this great court hold just the contrary of their assumption. "We don't think," he says, "that Congress possesses the power to prevent the transportation in other ways, as merchandise, of matter which it excludes from the mails." Now, first, this is absurdly irrelevant. The only question before the Senators was as to postal transportation, and that is the only one in hand now. Transportation "as merchandise" is entirely another affair. It belongs to commerce, which is under the control and regulation of Congress by another special grant. But in the next sentence the learned Judge grants the very ground of the Senators, to wit, that Congress has exclusive postal power, i. e., power "to put down rival postal systems in the carrying of letters, newspapers, and pamphlets." If, therefore, Congress excludes such matter from the mails, except for postal reasons, it can and does take away the use of the post-offices for ulterior reasons, which is the very usurpation the Senators complained of; and also it abridges the freedom of the press, which it is expressly forbidden to do. How absurd to say Congress may do both of these things because it has not restricted commerce in freights. Mail matter is sent under the postal laws "for intelligence;" freights are sent as merchandise for entirely different purposes. Newspapers, etc., "as merchandise," may affect the junk dealers, but have nothing to do with the freedom of the press. Congress cannot gain the right to exercise ungranted and prohibited powers under one clause of the Constitution by declining to exercise a power which it happens to have under another clause. It gains no power to pass Alien and Sedition laws because it refrains from suspending the writ of habeas corpus. Yet one of these is as much related to the other as commerce is to the postal grant and service.

The learned Judge does not say, but his argument, to be good for anything, implies, that the Senators denied the existence of this ulterior power only because they believed in this exclusive postal power and did not have the wit to make this "merchandise" discovery. We may safely grant they did not make it. They were not equal to its incoherence. It may be regretted that it was not mentioned, for it has the flavor of an Irish "bull," and would perhaps have relieved the bitterness of one of the first phases of the great slavery struggle.

But the position which the argument of the learned Judge thus assigns to the Senators is not, in fact, correct. They founded their conclusion against the power of Congress to exclude for non-postal purposes not only upon the exclusive character of the postal grant, but also, and chiefly, upon the grounds taken by every sensible man since, to wit, that the power is not included in any grant to Congress, and would also be a plain violation of the Bill of Rights. The argument from the exclusive power of Congress was but one, and only a minor, argument, although good in their hands, as we have shown. The extracts already cited show that they took deeper and broader grounds; and extracts confirming it could be readily produced, from the same debate, to great length. Indeed, Mr. Calhoun himself finally said that the claim for this alleged power had been abandoned by the friends of the President.

Mr. Davis said, he "denied the right of the Government to exercise a power indirectly which it could not exercise directly; and if there was no direct power in the Constitution, he would like to know how they would get the power of the States—a legislative power at most."

Mr. Webster expressed himself as "shocked" at the unconstitutional character of the whole proceeding, he said: "Any law distinguishing what shall or shall not go into the mails, founded on the sentiments of the paper, and making the deputy postmaster a Judge, he should say was expressly unconstitutional."

He denied that there was any grant of such power, and Mr. Clay, as we have seen, was emphatic on this point. Any who doubt have but to read that debate in the Congressional Globe and Appendix of 1836 to find that the Senators took every ground except the absurd merchandise theory of this opinion.

But lastly, this assumption of the learned Judge is amusingly absurd in its practical results. He makes the Senators not to have known what they were about to little purpose. He would then have obtained power to exclude "the insurrectionary," as now "the demoralizing," matter from the mails by merely prohibiting Congress from passing laws to prevent its being sent as merchandise by express, etc.—and thus it may be sent to any extent. Congress may throw out of the post-office such "objectionable" matter as it chooses on any whim or fancy, but then, he says, it cannot touch the same matter expressed as merchandise over the same postal route. But if the same matter can be carried by express, why limit the income and utility of the post-offices by throwing it out of them under such terrible penalties? Why should this simple difference between postal matter and merchandise subject the sender to ten years' imprisonment? Mr. Calhoun doubtless did not think of this stroke of statesmanship!

Having thus wonderfully ciphered out the power in Congress to pass these ulterior laws, his former absurdities bring the learned Judge to the practical difficulty that they cannot after all be enforced without manifestly violating the Bill of Rights. He undertakes therefore to devise and advise how it may be done—information of especial value to the "Agent" who had the laws passed, and receives half the fines. The two ways especially sanctioned by this learned Judge are, the post-office decoy system, and the post-office espionage system. Two plainer violations of the Bill of Rights, two meaner outrages upon liberty, decency, and morality, have never been perpetrated among our people. The learned Judge did not invent them. They are old instruments of the Christian Inquisition, but the "Agent" under these laws was the first to introduce them as modes of administration of our Constitution, and the learned Judge is the first in this country to throw over them the benignant smile of judicial approval. This he does in a very smooth and graceful way. He admits that it would not do to examine into "letters and sealed packages" without warrant in the search for prohibited matter, but he says these regulations "may be enforcedupon competent evidence obtained in other ways, as from the parties receiving the letters or packages, or from agents depositing them in the post-office, or others cognizant of the facts." "And as to 'objectionable' printed matter, which is open to examination, the regulations may be enforced in a similar way, . . . and in some cases by the direct action of the officers of the postal service. In many instances those officers can act upon their own inspection, and from the nature of the case, must act without other proof, as where the postage is not prepaid, or where there is an excess of weight over the amount prescribed, or where the object is exposed and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print. In such cases, no difficulty arises, and no principle is violated, in excluding the prohibited articles or refusing to forward them. The evidence respecting them is seen by every one and is in its nature conclusive."

The "Agent," who is also the special post-office agent of the Government under this law and decision, operates a decoy system in this way. He sends letters of apparent approval for any article, paper, circular, or advertisement, and when received by mail if he thinks it is "objectionable," although the letter or packet was sealed, he has his correspondent arrested and locked up, and if it is a lottery circular, or "offensive to the decency" of the United States District Judge before whom the Agent brings the case, he as judge of the law practically orders a verdict of guilty, and may send the victim to prison for ten years, with a fine of $5,000, and there is no appeal whatever provided in such cases, and one-half of the fine goes to the Agent "who put up the job."

Or again, if you send any newspaper or printed matter, the case is worse, for in addition to the decoy system, this special agent, or any other "officer of the postal service," instead of being limited in his postal duty to seeing that the weight and postage is correct, and that it does not contain matter subject to letter postage, has also imposed upon him the moral duty of censor of the press, that is, he is, "upon his own inspection," to see that the printed matter is not objectionable, "as in case of obscene picture or print" or in cases of lottery circulars, etc., etc., and if he finds that it is "objectionable," then "no principle is violated" in his "excluding the prohibited articles, or refusing to forward them." But suppose you do not know or believe the matter you may have thus sent is "objectionable," and so you go innocently to inquire why it has not gone to its destination? Then the "agent" is waiting for you, arrests you at once; there is no certainty that the delicate "decency" of a U. S. District Judge may not be offended; then you may go to prison for ten years, under a fine of $5,000, and the agent is rewarded for his diligence by half the fine, and you have no appeal.

This is the kind of work that was done in the cases of Lant, Jackson, Heywood, and others I could name; and the "Agent" is waiting for your indignation to subside to push on "the work" of "stamping out" the free press under the approval of the highest court in the land!

If laws that have these results do not "abridge the freedom of speech and of the press" how can it be done? How "secure" you are in your letters, papers, and effects, when you entrust them to the "officers of the postal service" to find that they are stopped without warrant, or taken out as a decoy or trap to get you into States Prison by use of them as evidence, and to enable the informing agent to get half of any imposed fine! Under this decision the pretense of safety of papers and liberty of circulating are worse than vain. The very muniments of personal liberty are a snare and a delusion, for they are turned into instruments for its destruction. The story is that the garrison who surrendered to a Turkish Pasha were solemnly assured by him that not a drop of their blood should be shed. After the surrender he immediately ordered every one of them to be hung, and so kept his promise to the very letter. What morality is it that induces a Judge of the Supreme Court to keep the precious guarantees of the Bill of Rights in the same way?

Yet it is in the name of "public morals" that this result is reached. He concludes by the consoling assertion that "the object of Congress has not been to interfere with the freedom of the press, or with any other right, but to refuse mail facilities for the distribution of matter deemed 'injurious to the public morals.'" Then for the first time the hitherto undisclosed reason for going beyond the issue presented by counsel and the case—the motive for this long obiter dictum—appears; the learned Judge at last by force drags in the act of March 3, 1873, the one under which Mr. Heywood was convicted, and renders it constitutional as far as his word can do it by way of illustration, without its being in issue before the court or the subject of argument. To do this he quotes the main section of the law of 1873, and then settles the whole matter in two sentences, which when we consider the importance of the consequences, fill us with astonishment. He says:

"All that Congress meant by this act was, that the mail should not be used to transport such corrupting publications and articles, and that any one who attempted to use it for that purpose should be punished. The same inhibition has been extended to circulars concerning lotteries—institutions which are supposed to have a demoralizing influence upon the people."

All the learned pretense of "reasons" is here swept away. It is at last plainly avowed and averred that Congress has the power to exclude, and to run the post-office for moral and ulterior grounds, and for and on those grounds only to punish with any penalty it may name, even of life, any attempt to send any thing or publication through the mail that it may "deem" or "suppose" to be "injurious to public morals" or of "demoralizing influence."

As our President said here to-night, if this is the law, the Constitutional Bill of Rights is not worth "two brass buttons," nor one. "All that Congress may mean" by any other act will be to exclude "libelous and seditious" publications, as under the Sedition Law, or "incendiary and insurrectionary" publications," as under Mr. Calhoun's law, or, as soon may be the case, all "revolutionary," "communistic," "socialistic," "destructive," "riotous," "blasphemous," "irreligious," etc., etc., articles and publications, just as, in its unlimited power and wisdom, it may at any time ordain, with penalties of fine and imprisonment, or of life and death. And yet all this will have nothing to do with the freedom of the press or the liberties of the citizen! If you examine you will find that the First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth, which are the main Articles—the very substance—of the Constitutional Bill of Rights, are violated by these laws and this decision, and that if they are to stand, this Bill of Rights is not worth the paper upon which it is printed.

But not only is the Constitution and freedom of the press and people overthrown by these laws and this decision; the United States courts receive thereby an unconstitutional, dangerous, and most indefinite enlargement of their criminal jurisdiction. The case of Mr. Heywood ought to bring this danger home to you. Our fathers feared nothing more than this. The United States courts were regarded by them as, in fact, what they are—foreign tribunals to the mass of the people. The judges sit for life, without responsibility to the people; few lawyers know the practice; the juries are so selected that they are "packed" in effect if not by design. The districts are so large that even in the same State the accused rarely has a "jury of his peers or vicinage;" and, most surprising of all, in this criminal class of cases there is no appeal whatever! Think of one fallible man, under the most indefinite of laws, with the absolute power of fine and imprisonment, and even, in some cases, of life and death, in his hands, and no appeal! As those who were present at the trial and sentence of Mr. Heywood describe the outrage, it reminds me of one of Judge Jeffrey's trials, and illustrates well the dangers to which I refer. The Judge decided practically the law and fact; and when the jury hesitated, he wrung a verdict from them by a charge "in a roaring passion." Two judges sat and gave the victim "a double dose" because he had not promised to give up his constitutional right to send his pamphlet "as merchandise," and would not repent of having sent it at all—thus acting, not even as officers of this infamous law, but beyond it and as executioners and "confessors" of the new Inquisition. As Jefferson and Henry and Luther Martin said, 'The United States will be constantly gaining power by construction and the people constantly losing;—judge you in which way the balance will run. Where an inch is given an ell will be taken.' The lesson is that if you would not have Liberty leave you she must be guarded in her home among the States and people, and not be trusted out to United States judges and officials.

"But what," says the "Agent," like another "Statesman" of New York, who stole our money—a trivial matter to our liberties—he says, "what are you going to do about it? I have the law and the courts, and the Supreme Court itself."

What we do, will depend upon what we are. If unworthy of our liberties, we shall lose them; if we rise to the height of the issue, we shall place them upon a firmer foundation than ever. Do not be appalled because the Supreme Court is against us; that may be the very condition of success. "Two things you can do when you are beaten," said a famous New York judge to a young lawyer; "one is to appeal; the other is to go down to the tavern and abuse the judge." But in the Supreme Court we are told there is no appeal, and so Faneuil Hall has been kindly granted to us by your Common Council instead of the tavern.—Think a moment! is there no appeal? In all great cases in a republic, in all cases touching the rights and liberties of the people, who are the final judges of the law and the fact? Plainly the people themselves! The Supreme Court, being always retrograde and conservative, is almost sure to get on the wrong side whenever issues of liberty and progress are presented. They go for the old and for power; the people go for the new and for liberty, and in such cases they and their government have never failed to reverse the court. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon questions of popular rights and liberties are the Apocrypha of our constitutional law. The reversal of them has almost become a rule. Let me recall a few prominent cases none can forget.

John C. Calhoun said that up to his day "only one great constitutional question had been settled, to wit, the unconstitutionality of the Alien and Sedition laws, and that question had been settled 'against the Supreme Court.'" Judge Story sought to parry this thrust by showing that these laws were never really before the court. True; the Republicans knew enough to keep them out of that court, and thus to avoid an adverse decision; for decisions were, in fact, rendered in favor of those laws in every other Federal court.

Then came the question of the United States Bank. Andrew Jackson said, when the decision sustaining the constitutionality of the United States Bank came, "Now Marshall has made his decision, let him enforce it." The people sustained "Old Hickory." The country was saved from the dominion of a moneyed aristocracy, and the court's decision took its place in the Apocrypha with the Sedition Law.

Then came the slavery agitation. If this question of "insurrectionary matter" in the mails had come before the Supreme Court then, there is little doubt but that it would have registered the will of the controlling slave power.

Of the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave law and of all of its infamous details "the court had no doubt." Then the Dred Scott decision—who can forget?

Then the habeas corpus decisions against Lincoln and the war power of the Constitution; only by disregard of which decisions the Nation lives.

Then came the first legal-tender decision, when General Grant, who had saved us from the rebellion, lost all patience and had to save us from this court by taking off two judges bodily, and putting others there who could see that the war-contracts of the Nation were constitutional and had to be kept.

And now, at last, comes this Jackson-lottery-postal case—in many respects the most insidious and dangerous of them all.

What shall be done about it? The decisions of this court always, of course, settle the cases decided as to the litigants. It is settled, for instance, that Jackson had to pay his fine to get out of jail. But that is all—unless the people choose to let it settle more. The Supreme Court is a final legal tribunal in the cases before it, but not a final social, political, and, above all, not a theological, religious, or moral tribunal. It settled that Dred Scott was a slave, but the people thereupon decided that every other Dred Scott should be free. That the post-offices are decoy traps and under the "moral" espionage of the officials is the sum of this decision. The people

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

So far Jesus might have spoken, unjust and extravagant as is the sentiment. If he had added, "From the first to the last martyr of righteousness," that also he might have said. But what is evidently intended to express this last idea, is couched as follows: "From the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar." These words Jesus cannot have spoken, if (as appears almost certain) the Zachariah alluded to was slain in the war of Vespasian against Jerusalem. There is in the book of Chronicles a Zachariah who is stoned to death by order of the king, in the court of the temple; but he was a priest, son of Jehoiada, not of Barachiah. (The king was in feud with the priests, having called them to account for the temple-moneys, and was himself killed in turn.) Also, so many alleged prophets or righteous men had since been slain that his name would not carry with it the thought evidently intended, "from the first to the last." There is in Isaiah viii, 2, a Zachariah, son of Jeberechiah, of whom nothing further is known. But in Josephus (Jewish War, iv, 5, 4) we read of a Zachariah, son of Baruch. In Greek, Barachiah and Baruch would easily be confounded, as indeed Hoshea and Je-hoshea are in Hebrew. As this Zachariah, son of Baruch, was slain in the temple just before the final destruction of the Jewish State, a late writer might name him as the last martyr in Jerusalem, and ingeniously put together the phrase, "From Abel to Zacharias;" but Jesus, who died a generation earlier, could not. Even so, it is malignant to say to the Jews collectively, "Ye slew Zacharias." Roman cruelty drove the Jews to despair, insurrection took place, and each side was bitterly exasperated. Religion (according to the obvious interpretation of the law) forbade any willing submission to a foreign prince; hence an intense combination of religion and patriotism raised up a sect of zealots, who became the chief supporters of insurrection. Under adverse war they went mad, and like the Parisian fanatics in the first revolution, suspected of treason all who did not join them, especially rich men. Zacharias was rich, as well as a man of high, unsullied reputation. Even when they packed a jury they could not get him condemned, hence two assassins killed him in the temple. There is no other man known in history to whom this verse can allude. If so, it shows how late, how ignorant, how rash, is the composer of a text passed off on us as sacred truth. From the last obstinate agony of this cruel war, Romans learned to abhor the whole Jewish nation. Christians (sad to say), though included in the abhorrence as spurious Jews, have imbibed the same unnatural and unjust aversion for a people who at that time were the salt of the earth, who have even bequeathed to Christianity nearly everything in it that is valuable.

It is to me astonishing that any should be dull to the fact that the morality of even the more credible gospels is inferior to that of Paul; inferior, indeed, to that of Plato, Aristotle, the Stoics, and Cicero, in its very foundation. The core of sin is in selfishness; to deliver us from a pernicious egotism is the problem of pure morals. To teach that honesty is the best policy is all well in a politician; the law of a State which is not theocratic cannot go much beyond this. But a spiritualist who tries to eradicate worldliness by teaching what you will get in another world for your virtue cannot succeed. Selfishness does but become more longsighted. Greek philosophers taught that virtue was to be loved for her own sake; that no reward was desired by the virtuous man but virtue herself; that to do a good deed was not goodness, unless it were done from a love of goodness. The good man necessarily rejoices in good acts, whoever performs them. Being delightful to him, they are an end in themselves, and not a mere means to something beyond; though they generally do lead to further desirable results. Thus virtue did not need pleasure or happiness or reward as "an appendage," but had the happiness and reward in herself. The Stoics ran into exaggeration as to the necessary happiness of the good man and his superiority to external things. No error can be harmless, but this error was on the right side, the error of a lofty mind; and the tone of the collective Greek philosophy (excluding that of Epicurus) was nobly unselfish. To be praised by praiseworthy men was esteemed a worthy object of desire, as praise of a parent to a child; so, if they had believed (as a few of them did believe) that God has moral affections and pays attention to human conduct, his approval would have appeared to them the right object of desire. Now, in the precepts presented to us as those of Jesus, of course there is much that is right (what else could be, from any one trained under Hebrew wisdom?) yet the unselfish precepts are the rare exception; the appeal to selfishness is ordinary. The Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v–vii) is generally referred to as a gem of excellence, yet it is full of flaws; not even the beatitudes stand criticism. Indeed, first of all, we have to settle the text. Is Luke right, or Matthew? Luke, instead of "Blessed are the poor in spirit," has, "Blessed are ye poor; and woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation," which is a miserable sentiment. Also, instead of "hungering after righteousness," he makes Jesus bless those who hunger (i. e., are starving), and curse those who are full. The difference is startling and scandalous. Shall we suppose that Luke is right and Matthew wrong? or that Luke trusted to parchments which wretchedly garbled the words of Jesus? If the latter be the case before us, how untrustworthy, in a moral and spiritual, and not in a mere historical, view is this gospel of Luke! what a trap to a pious disciple! Yet it may be observed that Luke is consistent with himself. As here he makes Jesus cry, Woe on those who are rich and comfortable, but blessing on those that are poor and hungry, without reference to the moral state of either, so is it in the parable of Dives and Lazarus. To this I must afterwards return. But in the last Beatitudes of Matthew, Jesus touches his keynote, Reward (wages, pay). Those who are persecuted for his sake shall have a great reward in heaven; let them therefore rejoice and be exceeding glad. A Stoic philosopher would have replied, that if to be persecuted for his sake be a virtue, it brings its own "recompense" with it; and surely that is a nobler doctrine than to fix the eye on a future reward, which must nurture egotism. In fact, hence arose among Christians a vicious mania for voluntary martyrdom. In their current language, they aspired to attain "the crown." That future reward was so taught by the Jesus of the three gospels as to engender intense egotism is mournfully shown by the callousness with which collective Christendom for long ages together have acquiesced in the belief of eternal torture for those who are not saints. Danger of "the judgment," of "the council," and of hell-fire" (a most obscure triplet) is to restrain us from angry and light words against a brother.* Juvenal tells us:

"Bad men hate sin through fear of punishment;
Good men hate sin through very love of virtue."

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINTEENTH CENTURY.

No. 1.—SARAH.

The history of Sarah, half sister and wife of Abraham, is replete with interest. She is introduced to the reader in Gen. xi, 29, and her death is recorded in Gen. xxiii, 1, 2.

As the wife of Abraham she is held in high estimation, but as the mother of Christ, then yet to be, she is regarded with little less veneration than his immediate mother, the Virgin Mary; for as there must be a Messiah, so-called, he must have a human ancestry, therefore bible-makers and creed-mongers early set themselves at work to manufacture a parentage for this distinguished individual. Hence we find constructions to that effect as early as Abraham's time, placed upon declarations said to have been made by God to Abraham, thus, "I will make of thee a great nation; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Sarah therefore becomes an important personage in the great drama of human salvation, as she was an actress of no mean position or qualification in the glorious scheme already devised. To study her character, and criticise her life as the mother of the Hebrew nation and the future redeemer of the world, is not only our right but duty in the premises.

Abraham and Sarah had no children, and the promise that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude and should inherit all the land of Canaan forever seemed to the aged couple a long time in the fulfilling, and though Abraham has been counted as the "father of the faithful," he grew impatient and asked the Lord if "one born in his own house might not be his heir?" God assured him, "He that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir," which so pleased Abraham that he offered a sacrifice then and there, and received a promise and prophecy in detail from the Almighty so special and wonderful as to throw all modern manifestations of spirit intercourse completely into the shade.

But soon came Sarah's turn to distrust, and so despairing did she become that she gave Hagar, her Egyptian maid, to Abraham to be his wife. The result was her mistress was despised in her eyes, and Sarah dealt hardly with her, and she fled into the wilderness where an angel (the first on record) found her and told her to return to her mistress, and submit herself under her hands. She did so, and bore Abraham a son when he was four score and six years old, which son was named Ishmael.

After many promises, prophecies, and preliminaries by the Lord and angels, oft repeated, when Abraham was 99, and Sarah 90 years old, Isaac the child of promise was born by a miracle—so alleged—on account of old age in the parents (Rom. iv, 19), though in Gen. xxv, 1, we read that after Sarah's death, and Issac had grown to man's stature, and taken him a wife, Abraham married again and became the father of six sons, and no mention of a miracle on account of old age, though he was forty years older than when Isaac was born by a miracle! Notwithstanding, Isaac is frequently styled Abraham's only begotten son: "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son" (Heb. xi, 17). According to the record, Isaac was the only son of Sarah, while Abraham had seven other sons distinctly enumerated, but Isaac was the child of promise in whom all nations of the earth should be blest.

But there was also trouble in the families of these pre-historic old Mormon patriarch fathers, and so, again, Sarah became incensed at Hagar and Hagar's son, Ishmael, at the feast, the same day Isaac was weaned. And she said unto Abraham, "Cast out this bondswoman and her son; for the son of this bondswoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac," and to please this imperious, jealous, unjust woman, who had herself given her maid to Abraham to wife, the faithful patriarch did as the godly Sarah commanded; besides God told him to obey her, "As in Isaac shall thy seed be called." So he again sent her away into the wilderness. The romance is a very pretty one, and would grace almost any work of fiction where indecent expression was no objection, and where Anthony Comstock was never known.

But to proceed: This noble woman and worthy patriarch, who was rich in flocks and herds and this world's goods, and who had 318 trained servants born in his own house, made no provision for his child—then fourteen or fifteen years of age—and his mother other than to take bread and a bottle of water, putting it on her shoulder and sending her away into the wilderness. Shame! oh shame! on such a transaction, and more shame on modern readers and believers who will prate about Abraham, the father of the faithful, and Sarah his beautiful, holy wife, who is held up as an example for all virtuous, godly women to imitate.

St. Paul, in his First Epistle to Peter (chap. iii, 5, 6,) says, "For after this manner in the old time, the holy women also who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands, even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord; whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement." Yes, and we women to-day are all taught to copy after Sarah, who "trusted in God," and obey our husbands even as she did hers. It would be well to inquire when and how Sarah obeyed her lord, and how far she trusted in God.

It will be remembered that this interesting and lovely woman was so fair to look upon that while traveling in foreign countries, her lord repeatedly denied that she was his wife, and that twice she was captured under the supposition that she was his sister; and that in the first instance, when Pharaoh, king of Egypt, sent out and took her into his house, he did not become aware that she was another man's wife till the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues, because of Sarah, Abraham's wife (Gen. xii, 17.)

And that in the second instance, Abimilech, king of Geror sent and took Sarah also, and as in the first case, God visited the sin and falsehoods of Abraham and Sarah on the innocent instead of guilty, but that Abraham prayed unto God; and God healed Abimilech, and his wife, and his maid servants (Gen. xx, 17). When Abimilech discovered his mistake he said, "Lord, wilt thou slay also a righteous nation? Said he not unto me, She is my sister? and she, even she herself said, He is my brother; in the integrity of my heart and innocency of my hand have I done this." The only excuse that this holy patriarch could make was, "Because I thought surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife's sake. And yet, indeed, she is my sister: she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother, and she became my wife. And it came to pass when God caused me to wander from my father's house, that I said unto her, This is thy kindness which thou shalt show unto me; at every place whither we shall come, say of me, He is my brother." And she obeyed him. Twice he asked her or commanded her to tell a lie, and twice did her lie, endorsing his, inflicting trouble on the innocent, though they escaped without even a reproof. And this subjection to husbands, lie and all, is commended in Sarah by Paul as worthy of imitation.

And such a lie! True, virtuous wives of to-day, how would you like such a coward for a husband? A husband who would surrender you to another for fear of being slain for your sake! How would you like his policy in order to save his life, at the risk of yourself being taken by a stranger and kept in his house? How would you like the subjection of wives to husbands to the extent of being an active party in the indecent and criminal deception? How would you like a faithful Abraham for a husband, who could trust God when he was tempted to offer up his only begotton son, even Isaac, accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead (Heb. xi, 19), and yet could not trust God to preserve his wife from the men of the land without fear of being slain for her sake? Deny his wife and ask her to aid him in the falsehood, the coward! Disown her, the miserable poltroon, and she, virtuous woman, consent to it, and Paul commend for it, and the clergy of the present day endorse the pretty tale and relate it as if it was recommendation to him, to her, and to Christianity instead of a disgrace! Why, men do not disown their wives now if they lose them. They fight for them; they defend them! And this is the way Sarah trusted in God.

* Whether "Thou fool" or "Thou rebel" be the truer translation is contested; but since Raca is Hebrew, probably so also is More; then it clearly means Rebel; perhaps equivalent to the modern "Thou heretic!"

What a picture of chastity does this account present to husbands and wives of the nineteenth century, who call themselves Christians, and who endorse the book and hold up faithful Abraham and holy Sarah as patterns of exemplary matrimonial purity and fidelity.

Read Genesis, chapters xiii, and xx, and ask yourselves if the Society for the Suppression of Vice ought not to have been looking after the progenitors of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, since his great-great-grandpa, and his great-great-grandma, strongly leaned towards Mormonism (Abraham had concubines by the score, see Gen. xxv, 6) and their character scented mustily of modern variety, called by some free-love.

Abraham and Sarah were the ancient nest-egg of the atonement, for the Messiah was prophesied through the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Judah, and the house of David; and it is a part of the intention of these articles to show this so-claimed lineage in its true light, therefore, the reader is requested to bear this in mind while perusing "The Godly Women of the Bible."

Hold not out the inducement of heaven to me, by promising that I shall lie in Abraham's bosom! Abraham's bosom, indeed, the coward! Would I lie in such a man's bosom on earth, then why in heaven? His arms must already be full, and if not, there is no place there for me! Sarah might be jealous and thrust me out, as she did Hagar; thrust me out of her lord's bosom, and out of heaven; and God, as in the Hebrew story, might tell me to submit.

No, no! I have no respect for either Abraham or his wife Sarah, and neither had the angel, it appears, for instead of visiting Abraham, who "was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold," he came twice to poor, wretched, desolate, despised Hagar in the wilderness, the bondwomen, and consoled her. And I would prefer to be the maltreated cast-off slave, the bondwoman, rather than the rich, proud, haughty, hard-hearted, jealous, unjust mistress, with her coward husband and lies; the mother in whose seed all nations should be blessed in a Messiah; the holy godly woman who is to-day idolized as a pattern of probity and excellence and for whom thousands of Christian mothers have named and christened their darling little daughter-babies. SARAH.

MR. EDITUR: I set myself down to rite yu my third letter, with a hart ful ov trubul and anxiety. Thare iz so much Infidelity in yure papers that it almost makes my hare stand on end to reed them. Sum times I almost feel that I hav made a mistake in entering into a kontrakt to reed yure paper for thre munths, and to rite yu a letter evry week. But I am not the kind ov man to put my hands to the plow, then look bak. I made the bargen in good fathe, and and I shal stik to it if it kills me. But I must asshure yu that I hav had a grate rastling time with myself. I hav prade urnestly for lite from on hi to gide me in the path ov my duty. I hav got up 2 ours before da, and wauked the flore til dalite, and then I hav nelt and prade the best wa I new how that I mite not do anything to bring kondemnashun on myself or do the cause ov tru relijun any harm.

I hav grate fathe in prare. Whenever I am in trubul, or if I am at a los to no my duty, I never fale to kry out to my God that he will gide me arite in all things. Our Savyur sed, "Ask and ye shall reseev; nok and it shal be opened unto yu;" and I hav not a dout ov the truth ov that promise. So I hav prade and prade that yure paper need not darken me so as to put out the lite ov the gospel in my sole. I find a good many things in yure paper that stagger me a little. I must sa sum ov it sounds very rezunabul, and I hardly no how to anser sum ov the arguments I find thare. I must admit I did not no there wer so many knotradikshuns in the Bible az yure paper points out. I must sa, too, that Mr. Frothingham and Mr. Underwood, and sum ov the other riters, tauk in a very sensible wa. When I waz reeding them peeses over I thawt to myself, "Now, I don't beleev that Elder Goodly wood tauk much better than that himself."

Yes, yu hav sum good things in yure paper, but thare ar sum that seem awful wiked to me. Thare ar the letters from the devil; tha are terribul. True enuf, the old fello tauks pretty wel, and sez sum very sensible things, but then he's the devil after all, and he haz no biznes to rite for a paper that desent peeple rite for. It shoks my pius senses when I think ov it, that Deeken Skidmore and the devil ar riting for the same paper! Hoo wood hav thawt it? But Suzan haz releeved my feelings to a grate extent about the devil. She haz ben reeding over hiz letters, and she sez she don't beleev it iz the same devil that trubbled Job with so many boils and afterwards waz wun ov the fellos that karried our Savyur threw the air and shode him all the kingdums ov the erth from a high mountin, and wun ov the same that got into Mary Magdalen and gave her no little trubbul, to sa nothing ov the 2 thousand hogs that got the devil into them and rushed down into the se and drowned themselves. I hav more than wunse thawt that my hogs wood not be such big fools if thare wer ever so many devils about.

Yes, Suzan stiks to it that it ain't that old devil at all. She sez yure devil iz a gentlemanly sort ov fello and haz a pretty good edukashun and noze what he iz tauking about. She sez she kan lern a good deel from yure devil, and it's her opinyun if he duz kall himself "Splitfoot," that if eny body kood se hiz foot, it ain't split at all. She just thinks that it iz sum person riting thoze letters and putting the devil's name to them. Suzan iz most alwaze rite, and I haf think she iz in this. I hope she iz, for I don't kwite want to be in the same kanoo with the devil, and riting for the same paper. I don't want to be on kwite so familyur terms with him az that. Wun thing I hav notised: there iz no smel ov brimstone about hiz letters. I hav put my noze klose to them, and smelt hard, and koodn't smel the leest mite ov sulfur. That, with what Suzan sed, releeved my mind, for I am shure if thoze letters wer really from the devil, they wood hav the smell ov brimstone about them.

Oh, I must tel yu: Kaptin Smith waz over heer yesterda afternoon, and we had a long tauk. He is ever so glad bekauz I am taking THE TRUTH SEEKER and am riting for it. He sez it's the best thing I ever did. He sez he noze wel enuf that yure reeders wil be plezed with my letters just az much if I don't beleev az tha wood if I did. He laft and ha ha'd out loud and shook hiz sides good. He sed when he saw my name in yure paper, and that I waz going to take it and rite steddy for it, he felt az good az tho he had found a 50-dollar bil. He sez if he had a milyun dollers he wood giv evry sent, and begin the wurld anu, if evry family in the kuntry kood take THE TRUTH SEEKER and reed it. He iz a good frend ov yures, and sez yu ar doing more good than all the preechers put together. He sez hiz hird man, James King, reeds yure paper and likes it ever so much, and the Kaptin sez Jim iz so glad that Deeken Skidmore iz a subskriber and rites for it that he iz willing to giv a munth's work for nothing. The Kaptin sez the paper wil make anuther man ov me; that when I hav red it a fu munths I wil gro, and that my mind will expand; that I will thro awa sum ov the narro vuze I hav held to, and that I will think and feel different.

With all hiz unbeleef, Kaptin Smith iz a very fine man. He haz ben living in this naberhood about 15 yeers, and I hav herd ov no meen akt he haz dun. He haz no fathe in our relijun, and he don't giv any thing to pa the preechers; but he paze hiz dets like an onest man, and hiz word iz az good az hiz note. If Kaptin Smith shood tell me he wood pa me 100 dollers on Kristmas da, I wood feel just az wel az tho the munny waz in the bank. I think so much ov the Kaptin that, so far az I am konserned, I wood be perfektly willing to take him into our church if he wood aksept a fu ov our vuze or subskribe to a fu ov our artikles ov beleef. If he wood only pretend to beleev, it wood be enuf for me, for I no he iz a better man to-da than haf ov the members ov our church, not eksepting Elder Goodly himself. The Kaptin wood be an oner to eny church or eny kommunity. But he sez he will never join eny church or eny sosiety that klames to hav a reveeled relijun or found thare beleef on supernacheralism. He don't beleev in eny thing supernacheral, and haz not for 20 yeers. It most makes me shudder sumtimes to heer the Kaptin tauk about what he kalls the old fables and what ridikulus nonsense the churches kling to. If he wan't such a fine man I shoodn't kare to be frendly with him or to hav him visit my family; but hiz konduct iz all rite, and I am proud ov hiz akwaintance and frendship.

Kaptin Smith iz not a rich man, but he iz wel off. He ones 99 akers ov fare land, 15 ov which iz in timber, and don't o a doller to any man for it. He don't beleev in morgajes nor poor fenses. He duz beleev in deep plowing and a good kote ov manure. He sez he had ruther hav 30 lodes ov manure to the aker than all the prares and pius blessings that kood be piled on to it. Yu se, he iz a regular Infidel, and that iz all enybody kan sa agenst him. But he haz good krops, razes good kattel, sheep, and hogs; he livz peesably with hiz nabers; heduz az he agrees, and lets others attend to prare and praze. If a man kan get to heven that wa, it ma be all wel enuf; but I hav my douts.

My wife kum home 2 or 3 daze ago, and Suzan and I wer glad to se her. Muther found Sally and Steven in good helth and doing midling wel, tho Steven komplanes that trade iz very dul. He sez the farmers ar bying kaliko and sundres with grate kaushun; but krops ar kuming in pritty wel, and evrybody expekts better times in the fall and winter. I mite az wel tel yu that our dawter Sally haz bekum a muther. She haz a litel sun wun week old, and tha wil kall him Steven, after hiz daddy. That waz the cheef rezun why my wife went over thare. Thus, yu se, I hav another grandchild. Sally and the baby ar doing fine, and the daddy iz probably wun ov the happiest fellos alive. I kan remember very wel how proud I felt wunse on a similar okkashun; but after a while the novelty wares off. So Steven will find it.

Wife haz given me a pretty good lekture sinse her return. She sez she beleevs I hav about gone krazy to bring an Infidel paper into the hous, and to bekum a regular kontributor to it. She sez that iz a pritty wa for the 1st deeken ov Zion Hil Baptist Church to akt. She ekspekts nothing else but what the church, Elder Goodly inkluded, wil be down on me for heresy. She beleevs I wil be kalled up before the church for my kondukt, and, if I am not turnd out ov church, I wil be disgrast and my offis taken awa from me. "Do yu think," sez she, "that Zion Hil Church wil sit stil kwietly and let its 2d offiser run off and join the Infidels and help run thare paper? I tel yu what it iz, Joel Skidmore, yu hav made a grate mistake. Yu had better lose the best 3-yeer-old heffer in the wood-lot. I shan't feel az tho I kan hold up my hed among fokes, and when we go to church I shal feel like waring a hevy vale, so that the Elder's wife and Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Dubbleda kannot reed my shame. Enything else than being an Infidel's wife or an Infidel frend's wife, or the wife ov a man who rites for an Infidel paper!" She taukt sumthing about divorse, but I kept still and let her go on, and when she got threw she stopt without my saing a hard wurd. Whot I did sa I wil repeet to yu and yure reeders, and I don't kare hoo noze it. I sed I had dun nuthing rong, nuthing but what I had a perfekt rite to do, and whot, perhaps, mite rezult in grate good to yu and yure reeders, and that I did not kare what the members ov the church had to sa about it; I didn't ask them when to li down, when to get up, when to eet, nor when to abstane from eeting, and neethur shood I ask them what paper I shood reed and whethur I shood rite a letter or not. I sed, in addishun, that I did not o wun ov them a sent, nor was wun ov them under any necessity ov going to hel for enything I mite do. I told wife that I had kounted the kost, that I nu what I waz about, and that I shood be master ov my own kondukt. Sally sed she had no dout but what I wood, that I had alwaze shone that dispozishun, and she ekspekted I wood kontinner on to the end ov the chapter.

Suzan herd part ov her muther's lekture, and she thawt the old lady waz a little to hard on me, and she stood up for me like a majur. She sed I waz rite, and all I had to do waz to go ahed. She hoped I wood not mind what Mrs. Jones or Mrs. Brown or Mrs. Dubbleda mite sa. Sed she, "Fathur, yu hav made up yure mind to take THE TRUTH SEEKER for three munths eny way, and yu karry it threw, and I wil stik to yu, tho' Sam Kragehed himself goze bak on me. I saw him looking at a kopy ov it last Sunday nite; he red it in 5 or 10 minits, and he sed, What kind ov a paper iz this eny wa? I sed it waz a paper that beleeved in saing just what it thawt; that it waz a pretty good paper, and that I liked it and intended to reed it. Sam sed it waz a kurius paper to be in a deeken's family, and that he didn't beleev hiz fathur wood hav it eny kwiker than a rattlesnake. I sed, Look heer, Sam Kragehed, that paper don't kost yu nor yur fathur a red sent, and neethur ov yu are obleejed to reed a wurd in it. It sutes my fathur and me to take it and reed it, and we intend to take it just az long az we wish to, and thoze hoo don't like it ma do the othur thing. Sam kind o' koold down at that and sed he ment no offense, and that he had nothing agenst the paper and didn't want to hurt enybody's feelings. Then I sed, I ges nobody's feelings ar hurt, and at that Sam put hiz arm around me and kinder skwezed me til I sed, That's enuf, Sam."

Ah, Mr. Editur, that gal haz got bakbone enuf fur 2 gals, and her mind iz perfektly kleer. When she takes a pozishun, I no it iz about rite, and I am not afrade to stand by her. So yu ma keep on sending yure paper, and Suzan and I wil reed it eny wa. But let me ask yu to temper down yure Infidelity a little. Kant yu draw it a little mild? Respektfully yures,

JOEL SKIDMORE,
1st Deeken ov Zion Hil Baptist Church.

LOVE you none? Then you are lost. Love is the key to felicity; ner is there a heaven to him who has it not.—A. B. Alcott.

Letters from Friends.

ELDER CLARK BRADEN.

It appears from an article in the Freethought Journal, copied by THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 27th, that Elder Braden is hardly a proper person to champion Christianity—from one view; and pre-eminently from another! I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Braden—never met him. But as the Christians of Ottawa, Kansas, after my course of lectures there in June, felt that I deserved chastisement, and as they could not induce the Lord to measure it to me, they sent for Elder Clark Braden as "next best." The debate is appointed for September 2–10. He is considered by many Christians as the ablest defender Christianity has. I know nothing further than the article alluded to reveals of the quarrels between Mr. Braden and his Christian brethern, and care nothing for them. Family quarrels are no new things, as Liberals know, since their own family has become so large, with its brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, and cousins.

Mr. Braden was the choice of Elder Gefferies, of Ottawa, a very estimable gentleman, to meet me in debate. If Christians are satisfied with Mr. Braden it will be on the presumption, doubtless, that he is a gentleman and a scholar.

As to the financial feature, debaters, lecturers, revivalists, temperance lecturers, and preachers, should be paid for time, talent, and work, although when a professional man makes money his chief object, his sincerity is justly questioned. As the matter now stands it would appear that a victory over Mr. Braden would be of dubious honor, if the contest were to be of a personal nature. An explanation from him would, I think, be printed by the Liberal press.

W. F. JAMIESON.

UPPER BEDFORD, P. Q., July 21, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT, Sir: . . . Somehow I can't close this letter without informing you of the death of D. W. Fillebrown of East Highgate, Vt. He died the 16th inst. I first drew his attention to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and since that time he has been a subscriber, and a lover of it. Brother Fillebrown was formerly a staunch Methodist, but emerged from darkness to light about six years ago. Brother Fillebrown was a poor man comparatively, but was always ready to contribute to the relief of the oppressed and downtrodden. I have in my possession a letter from him, stating that he sent you his last dollar to aid you in your defense, soon after your arrest by the infamous Comstock. His funeral was attended by Miss —— Paul of Stowe, Vt., and the large number that assembled at the funeral shows the esteem in which he was held. G. W. GILMAN.

GREENUP, ILL., July 26, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: By the request of friend David Kester, who is quite ill, I drop you a few lines. The Liberals in our village and vicinity are much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. The bold, fearless, and independent manner in which you defend the truth, advocate the right, and denounce the wrong clearly demonstrates the fact that you have been and are now doing more to disabuse the minds of thousands whose minds have been abused by the superstitious old theology than any other man of our day.

Comstockism, bigotry, and superstition, a trinity of trash gotten up by the priesthood of old theology can never injure you or your influence. Go on in your glorious work and in spite of the bitter persecutions you now endure you will finally overcome all opposition, and a victory for truth and correct principles will crown your labors.

Yours in the bonds of truth and humanity,

W. H. OZIER.

BOSTON, Aug. 5, 1878.

EDITOR THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hasten to inclose to you the communication sent by Hon. Elizur Wright to the Boston Evening Transcript, which that paper refused to publish, and which Mr. Wright with characteristic determination paid for as an advertisement. You will I know gladly give it a place in your columns.

When so many young men are showing the "white feather" on this question, it is refreshing to find this veteran reformer standing in the fiercest of the battle, and defying the enemies of freedom to do their worst; all honor to this intrepid soul.

I intend being present at the Watkins Convention and hope to exchange greetings with old friends and co-workers, and meet face to face the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and others, known to me hitherto only by their good works. Sincerely yours, LAURA KENDRICK.

A CASE FOR THE COURTS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: Quoting from my remarks in Fanueil Hall, as reported in full in the Globe of yesterday, you kindly commend my motives, but condemn my logic. Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust. Yours seems to assume that courts never make mistakes, and, therefore, the Comstock law is constitutional and "Cupid's Yokes" is an obscene book. Let that be true, and what follows? By chapter 165, section 15, of the General Statutes, the possession of an obscene book is an offense, punishable by imprisonment and fine. I possess "Cupid's Yokes," and mean to do so, whatever the courts have decided or other people think. If the district attorney of Middlesex, knowing all these facts, does not prosecute me as soon as possible, he will violate his oath of office. Will you show your readers where the flaw is in this logic and oblige. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Medford, Aug. 3, 1878.

MONTICELLO, MO., July 24, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I deem it my duty to inform you that I take much pleasure in distributing your tracts. I would gladly do more in the cause of Freethought were not my present means very limited.

Permit me to say that your views, as far as I am aware, coincide exactly with mine. I would be too tedious were I to give the various steps through which I had to go to arrive at similar conclusions with yours. In brief, I might say that my father (not in heaven, but in the old country—Germany) intended me for the Christian missionary work. I soon found that I could not subscribe to established dogma, and concluded to study the body that I could see, rather than the spirit of which I knew nothing. At first I hesitated between law and medicine, but seeing the difficulties in the way of practicing the former without reproach to myself, I practiced the latter; but I am sorry to admit that outside of the art of surgery and the rules of hygiene, the practice of medicine is but blind superstition. And since there is not sufficient demand for surgery, and the people are not willing to pay for rules on hygiene, I shall be compelled, in the name of truth and consistency, to go at something else, don't know what, probably lecturing or teaching, after a while.

Inquiry into "original sin" led me to the conclusion of a predominance in the world of the animal propensities, and daily observation confirms it. As one thing leads to another, after years of study pro and con, the idea seemed forced upon me, perhaps erroneously in part, that there will be no true happiness on this earth until there is abolished all competitive institutions, with their opposing arrangements; that there will be no end to selfishness and all the myriads of evils arising from it in social affairs, in public, in private, in church, and in the government until money, or property in general, has become subordinate to the higher duties in life and its rewards.

I am inclined to think that everything, so far as it appears now, is gradually bending towards, not communism, but a community or communities of common interest. Pardon me if too rash. Fraternally yours,

J. MULLER.

SPRING HILL, MO., July 25, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I have just obtained forty-three or four numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1877. I have bound them and am reading them slowly and carefully, and so far I am well pleased with your views in regard to man and his destiny and of the Scriptures. I can scarcely thank you enough for your boldness in these matters. I wore the yoke for about four years; it was of the Cumberland Presbyterian pattern. But I became skeptical as to the divine origin of the Bible, and after reading Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," the way was cleared for your arguments in the paper, including the Humphrey–Bennett Discussion, to completely eradicate those foolish dogmas from my mind. I am a poor man, and have but a very limited education, but were I to be deprived of the knowledge I have obtained by reading your views and those of other Liberals, and my mind thrown back into the fog of Christianity, I tell you honestly I would exchange all the accomplishments of education for its possession.

It is a lamentable fact that nowadays Christianity is being used as a cloak for bad men to prowl around under among honest Infidels, not only to deprive them of their hard earnings but of their good name also, as I honestly believe Anthony Comstock endeavored to do in your case. I can testify to the fact that they have robbed me of my last dollar by borrowing it and then taking the benefit of the bankrupt act, leaving me, in my sixty-eighth year, and the almost helpless partner of my life, who is the mother of fourteen children, to be supported by strangers—and yet I am considered a scoffer at religion. I remain,

Your friend and well-wisher, L. F. GABEN.

COSHOCTON, O., Aug. 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send you money for two more subscribers, this post office. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER greatly admire its straightforward, candid handling of all questions, especially when you come into contact with a great amount of "Kul-ure" and "Kumstockism" blended together so closely that it is difficult to find the dividing line. Respectfully, W. S. WOOD.

CENTRAL, S. C., July 25, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: Somebody has sent me W. S. Bell's pamphlet, "The Resurrection of Jesus," and as I seldom receive such favors from any one but yourself, I at once concluded it was you who had placed me under additional obligation, and I hereby tender you my sincere thanks for another manifestation of your generosity. I have during our acquaintance received many tokens of your benevolence, and have often feasted my mind by reading pamphlets and tracts which you sent me gratuitously.

"The Resurrection of Jesus" is (to me an old phrase) a jaw-bone breaker. It is certainly an effectual spike in the old resurrection cannon. No one who reads it can fail to see the good reason and sound logic which fills the entire little work. It should be in the hands of every Liberal family at least. What about our cultured friend? Is he resting on his oars since friend Heywood is in prison? or is he secretly devising plans to beat us in the petition for Bro. Heywood's pardon? Watch him. He will make another cultured summersault, one of these days, and I hope you and Bro. Leland will be ready to take him on the wing before he lights. Fraternally thine, R. M. CASEY.

NESS, KANSAS, July 26, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find two dollars to be applied on my account. In view of hard times I have said many a time, as I have been curtailing expenses, I can do without THE TRUTH SEEKER and will stop it, but every day of my life adds new proof that your bold, truthful, and fearless sheet should be kept afloat, and so I will not withdraw my support from it and help kill the nation's best friend. I have taken it since the first number, and have become very much attached to it. I left off praying to the God of Israel some nine years ago, and ever since have been more and more convinced of the hypocrisy of the leading members of the priesthood and of the stupidity of their followers. Only last Sabbath, at a quarterly meeting of the M. E. Church, I heard the presiding elder try to blacken the name of Colonel Ingersoll and force down the throats of the audience the most ridiculous batch of theology I ever heard. I sighed again for more Bennetts and more Ingersolls to enlighten the people, and more TRUTH SEEKERS to show them the way of reason and common sense. Fellow Liberals, one and all, we owe something to the times in which we live, and we can do something to keep light afloat amid the darkness of superstition. So let us one and all help keep your paper alive, and make glad the heart of its noble editor by extending to him our support and giving him our sympathy amid the inhuman attacks on him from his and our adversaries, Comstock and Abbot. How disgusting, indeed, are the attacks of the latter, and sickening beyond endurance the pretensions of the slimy, sneaking, prying, pretending meddler Comstock. Words are inadequate to express my disgust and loathing for the man and his supporters; and now Brother Bennett, keep your hands clean of the filth in which they play, and stand boldly up and defend yourself from their attacks, and seek not in future any aid from Robbins or anybody, as they think they are the children of God and others children of the Devil; and for your success I will ever pay my share for THE TRUTH SEEKER. HORATIO GATES.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING RECOMMENDED FOR THE GREAT CONVENTION.

BROTHER BENNETT: The following letter from my earnest Liberal friend Trowbridge, of Syracuse, I inclose to you for publication, and second his motion that every attendant at the great gathering purchase one of your "Truth Seeker Collections," and be prepared to "jine in" when brother Trowbridge leads off with his "congregational singing." H. L. G.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., August 7, 1878.

H. L. GREEN, CORRESPONDING SECRETARY, ETC., Dear Sir: I am well aware that your energies are already overtaxed and your time very much limited; but those who will work may, like the free horse, with little care or rest; but there is one thing more to which I desire you, through the Liberal press, to call the attention of the people previous to the great gathering at Watkins.

Prof. Hudson and lady vocalists will add much to the entertainment and enjoyment of those present by their choice sentimental and Liberal songs, and all lovers of music will welcome them with a hearty good will, and receive much pleasure as attentive listeners. But something further may be done promotive of harmony and good feeling, in which a large portion of the audience may with propriety, with great benefit, join occasionally, and pass a few moments in pleasure and improvement of the musical, and also in the elevation of the moral, of our nature.

Our stanch champion of Freethought, the able, courageous, and indefatigable editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dr. Bennett, has taken great pains to collect the best Liberal and Spiritual hymns in use—published in book form, for the sum of seventy-five cents—entitled "The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations;" a copy of which should be in the family of every Liberal in the land. Every person coming to this convention should be able to purchase one of these valuable books of Dr. Bennett, who will be on the ground, and ought to dispose of hundreds of them to use at the convention, and to be taken home to use in our families and in all meetings of the League. The sentiments contained in these songs and hymns are noble, grand, and elevating, sensible and practical. A spirit of good-will, love, and harmony pervades them, combined with truth and reason, that is beautiful to contemplate. Many are set to familiar airs, easily executed, and no doubt there will be those at this gathering fully competent, who will with pleasure lead off now and then in congregational singing, to the gratification of the audience. The invocations, forms for organization of Liberals, and marriage and funeral services, are worth more than the price of the book to those who lose friends and don't wish a pious, bigoted, ignorant, arrogant, hell-fire, orthodox priest, who has become totally depraved, because bereft of his reason, to traduce God, a good life, justice, common sense, and everything that is noble and valuable, with his idiotic, stupid, and blasphemous assertion of the vengeance of his gods. The recitations are valuable to every investigator of moral and religious subjects; and every lover of justice and truth will find plenty of solid, entertaining, rich, and beautiful thoughts that will ennoble and elevate mankind.

Yours fraternally, R. C. TROWBRIDGE.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Aug. 4, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Apropos to the remarks of W. S. Bell on your grand work, "Interrogatories to Jehovah," I may say I fully coincide with his views, as, indeed, it is a book that not alone Liberals, but all "common-sense" people, should possess. As to barking up the wrong tree, as Mr. Bell says, I believe the "dumb dogs" would bark their shins pretty well ere getting close enough to the tree to do any barking at all. The "Interrogatories" are indeed settlers, and no doubt will set some minds at rest on the superstition subject, as I think they are like hot shot and will have some good effect.

I have just got through the "Bennett–Teed Discussion" and Jean Meslier's Will; both are mighty interesting, and you, no doubt, have the advantage in the discussion. Both books are good. Yours for the truth, H. E. JUERGENS.

MOMENCE, ILL., Aug. 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I received the book you sent me, "The Champions of the Church," some time since, for which find inclosed P. O. order for $3.00. Also fifty cents for Dr. Chase for Physiologist.

The "Champions" is so much better than I expected, both in quantity and quality, that I concluded that I needed it for myself to lay away in my library for future reading for my family. I have been confined to my bed now for about four months and am pretty much gone with consumption, having expected to pass away before this.

I am very much disappointed in the great man Abbot, supposing him to be the great leader of the Liberal League. He has shown himself to my mind to be the "wrong man in the right place."

When D. M. Bennett was arrested for doing his duty, instead of rushing to his aid, as we all supposed every Liberal would, we find that his wishes were to get Bennett and his TRUTH SEEKER out of his way, and was so cowardly fearful that Comstock might arrest him that he makes Comstock's cause his own. And when he pretends that Bennett has changed his course of proceeding on the subject it shows the climax of his despair.

Respectfully yours, WM. F. DENNIS.

CENTRALIA, ILL., July 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find three dollars for which please send me the "Champions of the Church."

I have been frequently asked by my Christian friends where the world would have been if it had not been for the Church. I tell them, Five hundred years in advance of what it is, and I want your book to prove it. Yours truly,

G. V. JOHNSON.

BURR OAK, MICH., July 12, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: My long dormant pen springs exultant and unbidden, as it were, to my old and tremulous hand to indite the glad tidings to you, and through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER to its many readers—if you deem it worthy of a place in that holy of holies—of the good time here and now in the promulgation of the gospel of truth and reason by Dr. J. L. York, the great intellectual and oratorical giant, second to none, not even to the immortal Bob. He has just given two thunder-toned and telling lectures in a beautiful grove in our rural district, to an audience of between four hundred and five hundred intelligent and inquiring minds, with marked effects. Where old, rotten, and dying theology has held entire possession, and held forth and proclaimed in undisputed sway since the year 1 the old, stale, and false dogmas that were born in fear and ignorance in the past ages and only kept alive by blind credulity, false fear, superstition, and the suppression of truth and reason by the designing priesthood, lest they should lose their bread and butter, they were thoroughly probed, ventilated, and the rottenness thereof exposed by the Doctor. Glory be to York in the highest! He is a host in himself, a power in the land that is felt and feared by superstitious clans wherever he is known. The light is breaking; the morning dawns; all hail the coming day! I don't really know that we had an earthquake on the occasion, or that the graves were opened; but the very trees over our heads did rattle and shake, and seemed to enjoy and partake of the flow of truth and eloquence that was poured out in a blessed profusion and filled all the place where we were. But some of the old bones absolutely got upon their feet and walked away—whether to the city or elsewhere this deponent knoweth not. But no matter; the old vessels, like myself, must soon pass away; it is the young and rising generation that we are after. They, as a general rule, are more susceptible to new truths, and may yet cast off their swaddling-clothes and burst their mind-crimping bands, wherewith they have been clothed and fed and stuffed from their infancy to the present time by the lazy priests that get a fat living by the sweat and toil of the more honest and useful part of the community. Oh, the worse than useless class! The best thing that can be done with them is to ship them to the Fiji Islands and sell them to the cannibals for barbecues. I know of several great, lazy, fat fellows that would be a prime article. I think the benefit that would accrue to mankind in general, to the world at large, by so doing would more than equal the expense; in fact, I think it might be raised in a great measure by subscription and donation by the better part of society. There are many all over the world who are fully conscious of the great benefit that would accrue to society and thrift throughout the civilized world by such a reform measure. The waning Christian society have lived their day, and last spring, in mutterings of deep damnation—of black Infidelity, Tom Paine, Voltaire, and hell-fire and flame and destruction to the totally depraved race of mankind in general, and especially hereabouts—they evacuated the fort and stronghold they had held and occupied for forty years, to Liberalism and the promulgation of truth and reason, which has been pretty well done once in every four weeks since. Fraternally yours,

M. P. THURSTON.

LETTER FROM W. F. JAMIESON.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I regret much to learn that the indefatigable worker and eloquent speaker for the Liberal cause, W. F. Jamieson, on account of previous engagements, cannot be with us at the Watkins Convention. But he has favored me with a letter to read to the convention, and as there will be so many other speakers present to occupy the time, I know friend Jamieson will pardon me for sending it to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication. Allow me to add that Mr. J. is doing a grand thing in the West organizing Liberal leagues in various places. Such workers should receive great encouragement from the Liberal public.

H. L. G.

TO THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

Commendable is the energy of those Liberals who have worked so assiduously to make the Watkins meeting a successful union of representative Freethinkers from every part of this nation.

A learned historical scholar has expressed his conviction that no nation or country was ever great without religion. This learned historian defies any one to instance a great, powerful, influential nation without the religious principle pervading every part of the social fabric. He tells us that "the power, health, and influence of a State depend upon a thorough union of Church and State, and the moment their union is dissolved the State decays." Is this true? He cites us to the States of antiquity during their ages of vigor and bloom—Egypt, Assyria, Persia, Greece, Rome. He directs our gaze to England and France at a time when they had reached their meridian of power, as a period when Church and State were one. He traces what he is pleased to consider the early decay of America to the want of a "true religious principle," a "true religious devotion."

Is the logic of history against the Freethinkers? Are the "Demands of Liberalism" really opposed to the well-being of society? We are commanded by the religious world to "right about face," and if we do not obey, ruin awaits us in this world—the downfall of our nation! We are reminded that in order to preserve our national life we must have a "true religious principle." Is a so-called, false, idolatrous religion adequate to the preservation of a State, while the principle of liberty is not? Did the most stable and magnificent ancient governments possess the "true religious principle"? No historian says they did. What one of all the historic religions is the ideal religion? If theology is not religion, what is?

Great historians may term our American republic a "mushroom growth," "decayed and rotten to the core," and praise the English government under Cromwell, the French under Louis XIV.; still, with human liberty as the soul of our nation, we should be willing to go down, Cumberland-like, individual freemen, each working for all and all for each, rather than aspire to national greatness under the leadership of a tyrant. Individuals for a generation have prospered without a religion—without a God. Cannot nations do the same? America is trying it. Let us stand by our principles of justice, equal rights, freedom for all.

W. F. JAMIESON.

BOSTON, Aug. 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT AND T. C. LELAND, Gentlemen: My sister Flora, prompted by your suggestions, came from New York, determined I should go to the Watkins Convention and sell E. H. Heywood's pamphlets, particularly "Cupid's Yokes." Nothing could please me more and I entered into the spirit of her enthusiasm. But when I see so much stupidity, such gross inconsistency, the flagrant dishonesty, (judged by their practices and "virtuous" quibbles,) among the "Liberals," I feel as though I shall enter a hornet's nest. But if you will assure me I am not an intruder, or interloper, and if necessary let me share your headquarters at the grounds as mentioned I will not hesitate and shall make every effort to be there.

The principles E. H. Heywood voices in his essays on labor and the association of the sexes I emphatically indorse; and am not ashamed to defend them, in the brothels of the despised, in the liquor saloon, or in the club room; in the doctor's office, with the lawyer, banker or broker, merchant, or even among the "Liberals."

I wish I could with a holy horror annihilate that bigoted and inquisitorial spirit which believes that virtue is possible, liberty safe, only within the dominion of the "learned" and "cultured" classes.

I have been in all sorts of places alone, my womanhood the only visible protector, and in justice to those whose poverty and wretched conditions does not tempt them to an over assumption of purity, I credit as sensing at sight an honest friend who approaches in the spirit of love and justice. They do not descend with feelers and bate to test the sincerity and convictions of the new comer, as do so many in the "upper class," and must I say it, with "Liberals" too, with intent to do injury; with contempt for moral responsibility, an obligation that breathes on every page of Ezra H. Heywood's "Cupid's Yokes."

Pardon me for sending the above. If I have violated freedom then I have taken license.

Respectfully, JOSEPHINE S. TILTO

may demand that the post-offices must be free, equal, and safe to all; if we have the courage of the issue, they will so demand. Remember that every great and successful party in this country has had the adverse decision of the Supreme Court of the United States as its very corner-stone. Thus, the Republican party of Jefferson rested upon the Alien and Sedition law decisions; and the only regret that lingers around the memory of your noble John Adams, whose bust stands behind me, is that he did not trust the people; that he assented to this law—for he never approved it.

Then the great Democratic party of Jackson was founded upon opposition to the abuse of implied powers, which culminated in the famous United States Bank decision.

Then the Republican party of Lincoln;—that was really founded by the adverse Fugitive Slave law and Dred Scott decisions of this very court.

Now we have the decision that may found another party. How far Liberalism is to become a political power in this country will depend upon the delay of Congress in repealing this law. I hope it may never become a political party at all. I dislike the thought of moral or religious political issues. Let all reasonable, moral, and persuasive means by petition and otherwise, be used first; but if that is unavailing, let every Congressman know that he has a new source of danger at the polls. The Liberal party is young now, just beginning to see that it has a call to become organized for protective, social, and religious purposes. But, young as it is, it must meet this issue with a decided protest, a protest that will keep this infamous decision from ever becoming the 'law of the land' any more than those I have named. It is the only party that has the will or the courage to meet this question. The others will lie supinely by and be bulldozed out of their liberties by the cry of obscenity. The real growing end, the priceless new life of the nation and of the people, falls to its care and charge, and that too at a period of our country's history when nothing can be more dangerous than repression, when repression will be but another name for revolution.

The real Constitution of the country is this new life, this liberty, out of which the written Constitution grew, and a new and improved order is to grow. That liberty is the priceless treasure that Patrick Henry was so afraid to commit to a federal power that might become a federal tyrant. 'The spirit of liberty, and the maxims of liberty—they are the true Constitution of the American people,' he continued to repeat, with a wisdom that De Lolme and Mackintosh and more recent political philosophers have now more fully disclosed. "Constitutions grow, and are not made," they tell us. They are not dead pieces of parchment, but living organizations that enlarge with the people because they are the living skeletons of their life. They grow by constant construction. All great questions of liberty and government are with us, therefore, questions of constitutional construction, too great to be decided by any court. Every decision against the "American spirit" that Patrick Henry invoked has been overruled.

And now the deepest question of all is touched—the liberty that is the heart of the living social organism. The birthright secured to us in the Bill of Rights by Massachusetts and Patrick Henry and Jefferson, as the very condition of accepting the written Constitution at all, is to be stricken out. Will you submit to this? If you acquiesce, the Retrogrades and Conservatives will have full power and control of both Government and people henceforth. The only protection for the Liberal minority, who are the new growing and precious life, upon which, as in a plant, the whole progress of our national and social progress depends, will be gone forever. While, therefore, you have voice or vote, unceasingly let them be raised for the repeal of this law, in protest against this stupid decision, and in assurance that the people will acquiesce in it as 'the law of the land,' never, never, never!

But in our indignation let us not be unjust to the order that the written Constitution ordains and sustains. Liberty, progress, and order are all harmonious in a democratic republic, and must sustain each other. While we criticise with utmost freedom the decisions of our highest court, we shall not forget its necessity or its great services as a great legal tribunal. Let no one suppose that the opinion we have just reviewed is a specimen of its statesmanship or reasoning. That is not a legal, but a moral and religious decision; and under a "religious duress" who is responsible? Where the giant Superstition throws his shadow the powers of the mind are paralyzed and even reversed. Pascal was prostrate before the cross. "The mighty intellect of Newton" stood before the "Prophecies" like that of a rain-maker before his fetich. That such an opinion could have been "handed down" from the highest court in our land proves, as nothing else could, the necessity of a Liberal sect and party in America.

The trouble with these Judges and the "Society" they are sustaining is that they are conservatives, and also at heart Infidels. They have no faith in the integrity of the universe, or the goodness of man. The one is subject to miracles—the other to total depravity. The laws of the first may be set aside any moment by their God, and if man is not controlled by the "Agents" of the same God, if a free press and a free speech are really allowed, then those who enjoy it will "ruthlessly trample under foot the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint." So it seems to them, and they have given us a decision from the fears of their hearts instead of from the clearness of their judicial heads. Mr. Justice Strong even wishes to put God into the Constitution. The people are not enough for it to rest upon.

"Oh ye of little faith," the laws that mould "the lillies as they grow" prevail, too, through the human world. The religions, and the altars, and the ties, that need to be preserved by "restraints" of unconstitutional laws and decisions are condemned by that fact as "superstitions." The struggle you are opposing is really the effort of human nature to rise to a newer, purer, and truer social state—to a religion so consonant to human nature that it will be a duty and not a restraint—to an altar not red with the blood of sacrifice, but loaded with the gifts of gratitude to Humanity for liberty and welfare achieved.

What is profanity and obscenity anyway but the corruption and disintegration of theology? It is only depraved theologians who misuse theological names, and turn purity into obscenity in word and deed. Liberty, knowledge, truth, and health will scatter both as the pure breeze clears the noisome air. To purify the fountain, do not break or obstruct it, but let the waters run fresh and clear.

Thus we find that this unconstitutional espionage-law is also impolitic and injurious to morals. Its repeal is justly called for upon both grounds in the petition referred to. A post-office regulation that all matter should be inclosed, and that postal cards should contain nothing that could be offensive to those to whom they are sent or to the public, is all that is necessary. This matter of the postal-cards is entirely in the power of the department as a necessary postal regulation. It is evidently inserted in the law in question only to give it the color of necessity. If it is thought best to retain the form of the law, it should be materially modified so as to be within the postal powers and purposes only.

This suggests the last point I shall touch, that is, public protection from actual obscenity. That is a matter reserved by the Constitution to "the people and the States," as Mr. Clay said as to incendiary matter, and they have only to do their duty. The price of purity, as of liberty, is eternal vigilance, and no law can remove the necessity of its exercise. The principal trouble is said to be with children and schools. The remedy is the power and the duty which the common law gives to and imposes upon parents, guardians, and teachers, to see to it that they know what their children and wards read. A word to the postmaster to deliver printed matter sent to them to the legal guardian, so that he can distribute it, is all that is necessary. If tried, I do not think that much obscene matter will ever come. Instead of it will probably be found dime novels, sensational novels, and boys' and girls' newspapers, and Sunday-school trash—all as "corrupting," "demoralizing," and dangerous, in fact and effect, as any obscenity. As to grown people, and public decency, the matter will be taken care of, as now, by the State and municipal regulations. You have long-standing and sufficient laws on the whole subject in Massachusetts; and if Mr. Heywood had been found guilty under them, I should have left the matter to you, as her citizens. I should never have come here to enter a protest. But the case is far different when a citizen of New York comes here and arrests and convicts under a law of the United States and by their pretense of authority. Where he goes for such purposes, I felt it a duty, at no little sacrifice, to follow and protest. With what use and effect this protest has been made you must determine. The net of legal precedents woven for others will be woven for you. The birthright of American liberty, it is the tradition of this Hall that you will protect. The Past has made it your duty. If that birthright is sold or lost, for any object or upon any pretense, however moral or specious, the fact is, it will be gone; and when, Esau-like, you seek it, after many days in need, and even with "sorrowing and tears," you shall find it not!

[The opinion of Judge Fields in the A. Orlando Jackson lottery case, referred to by Mr. Wakeman, will appear in our next issue.—ED. T. S.]

ON Friday evening, the 9th inst., Mrs. P. R. Lawrence gave a lecture before the Liberal Club upon the subject of "Hygienic Reform." She showed clearly that children were not begotten right, and that their early treatment was far from right. She protested against the abominable use of soothing syrups and opiates, which are continually being fed to children, often keeping them in a state of intoxication and stupefaction. She made the startling assertion that nearly half the infants that are born into our community are absolutely drunk from the day of their birth to their death. Her lecture was replete with axioms of health, and was exceedingly well delivered.

Maude.

BY ROBERT CUMMING.

The Queen of Charms could I portray,
Maude would the immortal beauty be;
Hers are the charms of sovereign sway.
Kind heaven's reflected in her e'e.

Perfection is her faultless form;
Heaven her love divine possessing;
And oh, her mind, immortal charm.
Might keep enchantment bliss-caressing.

Her faultless form, her bonnie face,
No angel vision seeming sweeter;
Her native wit and angel grace,
Nor heaven nor earth sees aught completer.

The twinkling glory of the skies,
In summer evenings clear and bonnie,
Eclipsed are when her love-lit eyes
Shed their soft lustre full upon 'e.

When she is near the sky is clear,
The storm itself is music playing;
When far away, how dark and drear
Life's lightest day o'er me is weighing.

The world may grasp kind nature's gifts,
And rob me of my rightful share,
But higher fortune for me shifts—
To Maude's affections I am heir.

Hope.

As on the sea of life we sail,
And through its shoals we run,
How seldom would life's purpose fail,
How seldom be undone.

If we could always hopeful be,
By trusting in the right,
And could the "bright side" always see.
Presented with its light.

Could we but scan life's whole estate,
Its purposes unfold,
We'd find a "sacred book" of fate,
More precious far than gold.

We'd find in life more love than hate,
Its beams shed all around;
More good than evil in our state
Would always sure be found.

"A silver lining" hath each cloud—
For God does naught in vain—
So none with "book of life" endowed
Have reason to complain.

Though light and darkness alternate,
The light hath most control;
Bright Hope the mind doth elevate.
'Tis "anchor of the soul."

Two Letters from "The Word."

THE HUMOROUS SIDE OF MARTYRDOM.

DEAR HEYWOOD: I have been too full for utterance, and am yet. "You cannot feed capons so," nor editors in a Massachusetts jail.

How do you like it so far as you have got? Don't you wish you had been born with a bitter and impartial hatred for mankind? What is the use of reform, of amelioration, of progress? What wants the world of any millennium, or good time coming? See what comes of one single Word for the improvement of the human race, in the most literal sense of those terms. From "Cupid's Yokes," the beginning of much improvement, you have been dragged under those of Mars, and now are devoured by the dogs of war. Serves you right: you'd no business to have been a reformer and an editor.

In the beginning was The Word; and, as if that wasn't enough, pretty soon The Word was with God; and, when things finally got to that pass that The Word was God, they just clapped HIM in jail. It all, however, avails nothing: courts may come, and gods may go, but The Word goes on for ever. When one editor falls among thieves, it rises to a higher plane, puts on more "whole armor," and proceeds to Tucker out another man. "When the red slayer thinks he slays," the first he knows comes a boomerang ricocheting across the bridge of his nose.

In the beginning was The Word; but what in the end? Why! the last word, and you will have it, of course. As the editorial horn is longer than the judicial one, you can easily exalt yours, while he of the unjust judgment seat lies howling.

Yours is a new dignity: and I do not know how either to humor or honor it. I am unused to the odium of the glory of so shut-up a correspondent. In what terms do the exactitudes of prison etiquette require you to be addressed? After what manner of attitudinizing, genuflexion, or kotow is admission to your august presence to be obtained? I hope you will support your unwonted preferment with meekness, and will not treat with spurn all your former associates who are, as yet, out of jail. We are all emulous, and not wholly lost to some promptings from ambition. We will try our level best to go and do likewise, in order to be worthy the mark of your high calling, although we may never attain it. Descending thus from sire to son, our freedom's battle is ever won.

Seven hundred and odd days in jail for obscening the name of marriage, the unholiest ghost there is! That is two dollars a day for seven hundred of us, and cheap at ten times the money. Inclosed is pay for my day in advance. See that you earn it. Give Uncle Sam as good as he sends, and prove to him that you are worth your keep. Very timidly yours, THERON C. LELAND.

201 East 71st Street, New York, July 11, 1878.

MR. BENJAMIN R. TUCKER, Dear Sir: I write to cordially invite you to attend the Freethinkers' Convention to be held in Watkins, Aug. 22d, 23d, 24th, and 25th. And this is no formal invitation. I hope at that great meeting some earnest expression may be uttered against the great outrage of this day—the imprisonment of Mr. E. H. Heywood. If I do not agree with his opinions, he does not agree with mine. I recognize his right as precisely the same as mine to utter his opinions in his own way. His liberation should be the great work of the hour. It is a work in which every Liberal league in the land, every Liberal society in the land, and every Liberal man or woman in the land should at once bring to bear all the influence they have. Some will say, "His opinions are so objectionable—so opposed to the general sentiment." In answer to those objections, I say, So much the more need of his being protected in uttering them. There is no necessity of coming to the aid of those who only utter what is popular with the masses: there is no danger in such utterances. If this country is not free enough for any man or any woman to stand up anywhere and speak his or her honest thought, then it is a despotism, and should be so regarded. I hope you will come to the Watkins meeting and present a strong resolution on this subject. I can assure you that it is to be the largest and most important Liberal gathering ever held in this country.

Mr. Truelove in Prison.

By the prison rules, any one who is so unfortunate as to become an inmate of Coldbath Fields, is rigorously excluded from any knowledge of the condition of his family and friends for the space of three months. The only exception which seems to be made occasionally is in favor of the legal adviser of the prisoner. Thus it happens that while Mr. Truelove will not be permitted to see his wife until the 6th or 14th of August (I am not sure which), it was my privilege to visit him before that time. I did so in answer to a letter from Mr. Truelove, endorsed with the authority of the Governor, to make a visit of half-an-hour's duration. Mr. Truelove's letter—omitting one or two references to private matters—may be quoted:

"For the first five or six weeks I had no sleep—literally true—resting at night on a board with a wooden pillow, in a cell which was dark even in the daytime, and troubled by noises all the night through. I believe the cell happened to be just under a warder's room, who, to keep himself awake, walked about and slammed iron doors continually. I never took off my clothes (the warm prison dress) all that time. All this, and other matters, injured my health. I am, however, better now, as I am removed to a better cell, with better food and more of it. I believe I was robbed of a portion of the soup, that being the best part of the food. If you complained of anything to any one, high or low, you were treated as though you were the greatest liar on earth. The food and my anxieties brought on spasms across my chest all this time, and they continue now, although not so bad. I get a little sleep now in my hammock. I woke this morning at two o'clock, and I never get any sleep after once waking. Would you believe it? I have never read the two letters yet [here Mr. Truelove refers to a letter from his son and another from me]. The Governor—I do not know his name—read them to me, but after the first two or three sentences, the good news [referring to the meeting at St. James' Hall] fairly unmanned me—I cried like a child—and I heard him reading, but leaving no impression on my mind. And now he will not allow me to read them myself—not even in his presence. Do not fail to come, and bring all the news anent my case. The only times I am out of my cell are for an hour's exercise and to chapel among some of the worst of men. Yours faithfully,

"E. TRUELOVE.

"P.S.—My fingers have grown stiff with oakum picking, etc. I have about 300 good marks and no bad ones as yet."

The perusal of this letter did not contribute to the soundness of my sleep on the night of its receipt, and the next day found me chartering a Hansom to discover the gloomy precincts of Coldbath Fields. I reached the prison about half-past twelve, and after some little delay I was informed that Mr. Truelove was ready to receive me. He was brought down from his cell—which I did not see—to the room in which prisoners are allowed interviews with their legal adviser. When I entered he rose up and shook hands with me—the warder standing aside. During the interview Mr. Truelove and I sat with a table between us, the warder sitting throughout at the head of the table. Mr. Truelove was dressed in the blue prison clothes, with a lot of marks and numbers on front and back. His hair was not cropped, and thus he looked very like himself. No one could exaggerate the delight with which he listened to the recital of the steps which had been taken by Mr. Bradlaugh to reverse the sentence and procure his release. Especially was I glad that I had seen a little of the great meeting at St. James's Hall, where his name was received with such tremendous cheering. During that half-hour he forgot his sufferings in the pleasure of knowing that his character and conduct were appreciated by his countrymen, and for the remainder of the time still to run his heart will be glad and his countenance erect, when he remembers that so magnificent a meeting recognized him as a martyr, and not as a criminal. He desired me to express his warmest gratitude to his friends generally, and especially to those members of Parliament who have been unremitting in their exertions to procure his release.

He fully confirmed the statements in his letter, with some trifling additions. He spoke without any feeling of bitterness of the shameful treatment to which he had been subjected, because he recognized that his sufferings were due to the stupidity of the prison rules, and not to the malice of the officials. We surely owe much to the sagacity and humanity of a Home Secretary who prescribes the same treatment to a man bordering on seventy, for a press offense, which is given to the burglarious ruffian of two and twenty. This is a grave blot on our prison rules, and attests once more the old adage, that want of thought does far more evil generally than want of heart.

After seeing Mr. Truelove, I showed his letter to Mr. J. Cowen, M.P. for Newcastle, who brought it under the notice of the Home Secretary. Unfortunately, other persons have been at the Home Secretary, imploring him not to cut short by a day, or remove by a feather's weight, the load of suffering which is inflicted undeservedly on a generous and noble man. Whether owing to their machinations or to the innate depravity of the Home Office, our most reasonable request that Mr. Truelove should be visited by an independent medical man was refused. It is thus true, now as ever, that the spirit of intolerance is cruel and inhuman; that in your true bigot there are no bowels of compassion; and that the savage cowardice which mistakes bludgeons for arguments is yet far from rooted out of the human breast. The case speaks for itself, and I need say no more.

Facts from my Sunday Readings.

August 1st is called Lammas-day, or the Guley August, and was probably a festal day of our heathen ancestors on which one of the four great Druidical fires was lighted. Lammas seems to have been held as a day of thanksgiving for the new fruits of the earth, and was observed with bread and new wheat.

The 15th is celebrated as the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and is a grand festival of the Romish Church, and noted in the calendar of the Church of England. It was instituted in 813 to celebrate the supposed ascension of the Virgin into heaven. In Catholic countries this day is marked by splendid ceremonies and processions.

The 24th is St. Bartholomew's Day. The Romish Church represents this saint as preaching in the Indies, and as being flayed alive by order of a brother of a king of Armenia. In memory of his death it was customary at monastic institutions, in the Middle Ages, to distribute small knives amongst the people. This day has also a horrible celebrity in connection with the massacre of the Protestants at Paris in 1572. The word Bartholomew is Greek, meaning "The son of him who made the water to rise."

There are over two hundred and fifty thousand distinct species of plants. Every plant species grew at first only in a certain locality, and from thence spread to other parts of the earth.

A GOOD PLAN.

The best and most popular plan for operating stocks is that of combining capital of various sums, or pooling the orders of thousands of customers and operating them as one mighty whole in which shares are issued, which has been made so successful by the firm of Messrs. LAWRENCE & CO., Bankers, 55 Exchange-place, N. Y., the profits of which are divided pro rata among the shareholders at the expiration of thirty days from date of certificate. By this excellent plan each investor is placed on an equal footing with the largest operator. For example, within a month you made $2,000 upon an investment of $100, upon $25 the profit would be $500. An investment of $10 would pay $50, making 5 per cent. during the month. An investment of $100 would pay $1,000 profit, making 10 per cent.; an investment of $500 would pay $2,500 profit, making 5 per cent.; and so on, according to the market. The firm's circular explains everything. The editor of the Brooklyn Journal says: "The very satisfactory results made in these combinations by friends led us to order 20 shares, and at the final result we made a clear profit of $101.25 after deducting all commissions and our original investment. The firm is in every respect worthy of the utmost confidence. Send for their explanatory circular." Mr. H. F. Giddings has kindly tendered the firm his experience over his signature, as in no event would they use any of their customers' names without such authority:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1878.

LAWRENCE & Co., 55 Exchange Place. Dear Sirs:—Your favor containing your check for $1,376.63 at hand for which I thank you, as it is in excess of what I expected. As to your request for an expression in writing from me, I can cheerfully say that the above result is very satisfactory, and I believe I can safely recommend your combined system to everybody. And further, more, I would say that I first saw your advertisement in a N.Y. paper, and sent for one of your circulars, on receipt of which, as you know, I remitted you $300 for 300 shares in Class C in one of your combinations, and by return mail received your certificate for the same, and during the month received five notices of purchases and sales of different stocks, in all amounting to 4¼ per cent., or $1,275 profit on my 300 shares, after deducting your commissions of $198.37, leaving me a net profit of $1,076.63 over and above my investment of $300. Yours truly,

H. F. GIDDINGS,
837 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

An article in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, under date of June 29, 1878, says: "The reports of fabulous profits realized to numerous parties by this plan led us to investigate the matter closely. The system is based on safe business principles, and is the only method by which large operators attain their greatest success. The pools in which their customers are interested are placed on an equality in every respect with the leaders of the street. As the firm's whole interest lies in their commissions, they naturally wish to make their operations aggregate as large as possible. We believe the method of Lawrence & Co. to be the most safe and successful of any that can be found. New combinations and pools are formed every day or two. The firm will send their comprehensive circular, giving full details, to any applicant. One of their old customers, who held a few shares in one of these combinations, after receiving check for his profits, writes: 'Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, N Y.: Your remittance for my profits, $393.75 is received I again most heartily thank you, &c. Numerous testimonials are contained in their circular." New York Illustrated Times says: "A safe method of dealing in stocks.—The great desideratum has always been to discover some method by which a party, operating on limited capital, can stand an equal chance with men like Gould, Vanderbilt or Keene. A plan has lately been adopted by the banking house of Messrs. Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, that seems to fill the bill completely. The reports of numerous parties who have made large sums of money by this plan, has led us to investigate the matter, and we find the rumors are based on facts. They are also large dealers in all kinds of bonds.

Their circular is truthful and instructive," send for it.

DR. LYON'S Hygeian Home is at Springfield, Mo. See adv. in May Nos. TRUTH SEEKER. 13t25 Resp'y, J. S. LYON.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

INTERROGATORIES TO JEHOVAH

A long series of questions, upon a great variety of subjects, to which answers are urgently desired. Offered up at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office by its devout editor.

260 pages, 12 mo. Paper, 50 cts.; cloth, 75 cts.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

A Scientific and Medical Work every way superior to any similar. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. Adapted to the wants of the married, and to the consideration of all mature persons, as it points out the only feasible escape from the evils of celibacy or overburdened parentage. This is the work for which the eloquent author is now suffering persecution in England. It is not the "Fruits of Philosophy," but is more modern and and every way better.

Gems of Thought.

A BRAVE man is one who is not afraid to wear old clothes until he can afford to buy new ones.—Anon.

GOOD-NATURE, like a bee, collects the honey from every herb. Ill-nature, like a spider, sucks poison from the sweetest flowers.—Anon.

GOODNESS is truth, and truth is light; and wickedness is falsehood, and falsehood is darkness, and so it will be seen to be.—Catherine Crowe.

A DEAD man can drift down stream, but it takes a live one to pull up. That is the time that tries a man's soul—when the tide is against him.—Anon.

LET no man ever covet the good which another man receives until he is quite certain he is willing to pay the price that man has paid for the good.—Anon.

IT is an old remark that the law which molds a tear also rounds a planet. In the application of law in nature the terms great and small are unknown.—John Tyndall.

WHEN your child commits a wrong, take it in your arms; let it feel your heart beat against its heart; let the child know that you really and truly and sincerely love it.—Ingersoll.

THERE is yet very little daylight of intelligence in the world. Man's mind is twisted into a thousand fantastic shapes, and paralyzed by system and authority.—Harriet Martineau.

INTELLECTUAL activity is a preserver rather than a destroyer of nervous health: but this holds true only when the conditions of ordinary hygiene are not outrageously violated.—London Lancet.

EVERY child of humanity has a natural right to its existence: he who would usurp the place of another proves his own inefficiency to guard the rights of individual liberty.—Lessie N. Goodell.

IT cannot be too deeply impressed upon the mind that application is the price to be paid for mental acquisitions, and that it is as absurd to expect it without as to look for a harvest without seeds.—Anon.

YOUR work is not finished when you have brought the ore from the mine; it must be sifted, smelted, refined, and coined before it can be of real use and contribute towards the intellectual food of mankind.—Bunsen.

IT is the substitution of the energies of nature for the powers of human muscle that has abolished slavery and elevated humanity to a higher plane than was ever dreamed of by the wisest sages of ancient times.—Prof. Joseph Henry.

TRUTH, even when ushered into the world through the medium of dull romance, and in connection with vast progeny of errors, however ridiculed and despised at first, never fails in the end of finding a lodging-place in the popular mind.—J. G. Whittier.

WHEN we are considering the health of children, it is imperative not to omit the importance of keeping their brains fallow, as it were, for several of the first years of their existence. The mischief perpetrated by a contrary course, in the shape of bad health, peevish temper, and developed vanity, is incalculable.—Helps, Friends in Council.

I THINK a great many professors of religion are just like backgammon-boards. They look like stately books, and on the backs of them is inscribed, in large letters, "History of England," "History of the Crusades;" but when you open them you find nothing but emptiness, with the exception of the dice and counters. And many men bear the name of "Christian" who are inside all emptiness and rattling nothing.—Bethune.

MEN know how thunder and lightning come from the clouds in summer, and they want to thunder and lighten sometimes themselves; but it is better that the contents of the clouds should drop down in gentle rains and make something grow than that there should be flashing and resounding in the heavens and that the oak should be crushed to pieces which has been growing for a hundred years; and it is better, not that men should produce a great racket in the world and work destruction about them, but that they should create happiness among their fellow-men.—Anon.

THE statesman is the leader of a nation; the warrior is the grace of an age, the philosopher is the birth of a thousand years; but the lover, where is he not? Wherever parents look around upon their children, there he has been; wherever children are at play together, there he will soon be. Wherever there are roofs under which men dwell; wherever there is an atmosphere vibrating with human voices, there is the lover, and there is his lofty worship going on, unspeakable, but revealed in the brightness of the eye, the majesty of the presence, and the high temper of the discourse.—Harriet Martineau.

THE doctrines of the Infidels rest not upon faith (which is only imagination), but upon real facts and demonstrated science—the only foundation that keeps any one upon "the safe side" and renders them guiltless of deceiving and hoodwinking their fellows, and perpetuating error, fable, and mythology all down the coming ages, stultifying and dwarfing the intellect, and sowing the seeds of sadness, gloom, and misery, instead of those of hope, health, happiness, and knowledge. The Christian promises what he cannot give, what is not in existence nor can possibly exist. The Infidel promises the real and the tangible: the blessings of this world in all its fullness of joys and possibilities—Nature's free gifts to her children. Reader, which will you have?—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A NEW-ENGLAND IDYL.

The shades of night were falling fast,
As toward the South End swiftly passed
A man who drove as if insane,
And yelled aloud with might and main,
Whoa, Emma!

His feet were braced against the fender;
The people said, "He's on a bender,"
And still the old plug madly went
And wouldn't mind him worth a cent, Whoa, Emma!

"Hold up!" cried out a maiden fair,
"And take me out to Egleston Square."
But though he never answered, No,
He kept on hollering Whoa, whoa, whoa!
Whoa, Emma!

"Old man, old man," a p'liceman said,
"Hold up, or you will crack your head;
The street's dug up ten rods before,"
But he only shouted all the more,
Whoa, Emma!

The hole in the street now came in sight.
Already it was dark as night.
The old man pulled, but the horse wouldn't steer,
And soon they both were on their bier,
Whoa, Emma!

"WILL the coming woman lecture?" asks a contemporary. If she marries she will.

ONE asked why B stood before C. Because, said another, a man must B before he can C.

TWO THINGS go off in a hurry—An arrow dismissed from a bow, and a beau dismissed by a belle.

IT was a bright boy who told his teacher that there were three sects—the male sex, the female sex, and the insects.

"JOHN, lend me your knife," said Bill. "I shan't do it," growled John; "I hain't got any knife, and besides I want to use it myself."

AT a printers' festival the following was given: "The editor and lawyer—the devil is satisfied with the copy of the former, but requires the original of the latter."

"I DIDN'T know," said an old lady, as she laid down her newspaper, "that thieves were so scarce that they had to advertise for 'em and offer a reward for their discovery."

"DON'T you think," said a husband in a mild form of rebuke to his wife, "that women are possessed by the devil?" "Yes," was the answer, "as soon as they are married."

OLD gent: "We have lost our way, boy. Can you direct us?" Boy: "If a hold gent like you loses his way, can't expect a boy like me to find it for him—not for nothing.

A FARMER being asked if his horses were matched: "Yes, they are matched first-rate; one of them is willing to do all the work, and the other is willing she should."

GEOGRAPHY and grammar strive with each other to form the pith of the following clever puns: Which is the coldest river?—The ice is (Isis). There is another colder—the icer (Iser).

"MAY the Lord preserve your eyesight," said a beggar woman to a man with a small nose, who had just given her a gratuity. "Why," he asked. "Because," said she, "you've no nose to hold your spectacles."

A WITNESS, being cross-questioned lately swore that he was in the habit of associating with every grade of society, from lawyers up. The lawyer who "had him in hand" gasped out "That's all!" and sat down.

A NEWLY married gentleman of Mrs. J——'s acquaintance on being asked, the other day, what was the difference between a bride and a bridegroom, immediately replied: "Why, one is given away, and the other is sold."

"WHISKEY is your greatest enemy," said a minister to Deacon Jones. "But," said Jones, "don't the Bible say, Mr. Preacher, that we are to love our enemies?" "Oh, yes, Deacon Jones; but it don't say we are to swallow them."

"WHY do you suppose College is such a learned place?" asked one gentleman of another. "I rather suspect," was the reply, "that as everybody takes a little learning there with him, and nobody ever brings any away, the learning accumulates."

"I SUPPOSE you have been to your lodge?" she scornfully inquired when she opened the door upon him suddenly at midnight. "No, no, my dear," Blinks replied with gushing candor; "you see I stopped a strawb'ry fes'vl on my way home, an' the berries soured on my stomach."

A CUNNING juryman addressed the clerk of the court when administering the oath, saying: "Speak up; I cannot hear what you say." "Stop; are you deaf?" asked the judge. "Yes, of one ear." "Then you may leave the box, for it is necessary that you should hear both sides."

"CAN you do all sorts of casting here?" said a solemn-looking chap at the Iron Works the other day.

"Yes," said Frank, preparing to take his order; "all sorts."

"Well, then," returned the solemn inquirer. "I would like to have you cast a shadow." He was cast out.

Vol. 5. No. 34. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, August 24, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A CRAZY man dug a grave for himself near Utica, and slept in it, in an open coffin, every night until he was taken to an asylum.

THE Wahabees have posted a notice in the mosques of Northern India informing the faithful that the world is to come to an end on the 12th of July, 1879.

A PROMINENT Western religious paper refuses to publish obituaries which are over three months old, and says that such things are of no value unless they are fresh.

THE Baptist minister of North Carolina is a dead shot with a pistol, and one of the most popular exhorters in the State is now on trial for murder. It is a curious mixture—theology and marksmanship.

THE Rev. Mr. Arwood, of Lumpkin county, Ga., is the latest unfaithful pastor. He has departed for parts unknown, leaving a message to his family to do the best they could, as he would probably never see them more either in this world or that which is to come.

THIS being the twenty-fifth year of the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon's ministry in London, some of the leading members of his congregation have started a movement for presenting him with a testimonial in celebration of the occasion. It is proposed to collect a sum of $25,000 for the purpose.

THE Rev. C. Teal, M.D., of Ironton, Sauk county, Wis., is in jail at Baraboo on charge of incest preferred by his own daughter, who is only fifteen years old. She told a lady friend of the outrages of her father, and the lady made the matter public. The community demanded his arrest, and no one would go his bail.

MOUNT VERNON, Ill., has been thrown into great excitement by the report that a preacher in that region has been charged with attempting improper liberties with a young lady, a member of his flock. The lady in question is connected with the best families, having an unblemished name. An investigation is to be made.

PROF. HAECKEL, of Jena, has answered Prof. Virchow's famous speech delivered at Munich at the meeting of German naturalists and physicians. Virchow had denied that evolution could ever change an ape into a man. Haeckel reasserts the possibility, and more than possibility, of that change, and represents Virchow as an ally of the Jesuits.

A SOLDIER who was under Gen. Butler's command in Virginia, but who is now residing in Illinois, says he would gladly walk all the way to Boston if his vote would make the General Governor. He adds: "A man who keeps right on making hosts of friends in spite of such abuse and calumny as have been heaped upon Gen. Butler can't possibly be the wretch he is pictured."

THE Christian Intelligencer says that it was because Vanderbilt withdrew the Sunday trains from the Harlem Railroad that the road began to pay. The Examiner says that if this is true the road ought to be bankrupt now, for trains run on it every Sunday. And then The Examiner proceeds to pitch into The Christian Intelligencer for discussing a subject it does not understand.

DR. CHAPMAN'S dissection of the African gorilla, Pongo, as far as it has proceeded, is said to be strongly corroborative of the Darwinian theory. He finds all the muscles and tissues of the arm to be exactly similar to those of the human being, while other portions of the anatomy present equal evidence for the belief that man and the anthropoid apes have a common origin.

THE REV. JOSHUA JOHNSON'S APPLEJACK.—The Rev. Joshua Johnson, a colored camp-meeting exhorter of Rahway, was arrested in Bayonne one afternoon last week for being drunk in the street. On being taken to Police Headquarters, a Bible was found in one of his pockets, and a soda-water bottle filled with Jersey applejack in another. He was taken before Recorder Besher, and in answer to the questions of the magistrate, said: "I heard dere was a camp-meetin' sumwhar roun' here, an' I was lookin' round fo' it. I wanted to see how de boys were gettin' on, an' mebbe I could help 'em. I bought de applejack to las' me on de road, but de fust mouffu! sent me flyin'." He pleaded so hard, and promised so solemnly to "make tracks out ob dis year city," that the Recorder let him go.

THE Mennonites, who number about two hundred thousand, are, strangely enough, said to be on the increase. They are strongest in Pennsylvania. They wear queer clothes, practice immersion, do not believe in a hireling ministry, and adopt the New Testament to the rejection of the Old. They are industrious and thrifty, and do not mingle much with the world's people.

ABSTRACT OF THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF JEAN MESLIER, a Roman Catholic priest, by Voltaire, is translated by Miss Ellen Carroll. This famous piece of writing by a repentant priest, which made a great stir in its day—over a hundred years ago—is republished now for the gratification of English readers by D. M. Bennett, New York. It is well worth perusal.—Banner of Light.

THE Free Religious Association of Providence, R. I., now announces the opening of a Liberal Sunday-school, on a four-fold basis of study, comprising ethical education, study of the elements of religion, study of religious history, study of the elements of natural science, and of any other department of knowledge which "shall lead to a true conception of the laws which surround man and determine the conditions of his progress."

AT Shelden, Ind., Aug. 4th, during Sabbath-school, a great sensation was caused by a deadly attack by a sister named Harriet Fults upon another named Sarah Riley, with a club. Mrs. Riley was terribly beaten about the head and shoulders, and her injuries are very serious. Mrs. Fults is under arrest. Jealousy, it is supposed, was the cause of the assault. Behold how sweet and pleasant a thing it is for "sisterin" to go to Sunday-school together in unity!

"FALL RIVER has seen more absolute suffering than all the rest of the State," says the report of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics. And for all this suffering, for the hunger and privations of thousands of unemployed operatives, two men are chiefly responsible—Chace and Hathaway, the defaulting treasurers of mills. And these were extra pious Christians and members of the orthodox Church, and were looked upon as extra bright lights in the galaxy of heavenly excellence.

THE Rev. Dr. Wade Hill, a Baptist minister in Rutherford county, N. C., recently shot and killed his son-in-law, Major Andrew Scroggins, a respectable citizen of the same locality. From the accounts it would seem that the reverend gentleman was justified in the act. The Major had cruelly whipped a young daughter of Mr. Hill, and when reproved for the act the younger man was insolent, and the two came to blows and had a rough-and-tumble fight, the father-in-law getting the best of it. The Major sent a challenge to the minister, which was not accepted. He then threatened to shoot the father-in-law on sight, which the minister hearing of, armed himself to the teeth. When they met, the younger man fired twice at the father-in-law without hitting him. The minister fired once, and the Major dropped dead to the ground. The Doctor gave himself up, and is generally thought to have been justified in the deed.

INTERROGATORIES TO JEHOVAH upon various subjects, to which answers are earnestly desired, is the sufficiently descriptive title of a book compiled by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. D. M. Bennett. These interrogatories are apparently endless, and we doubt if any man of our day will live long enough to listen to their full answers if they were to be given. It strikes us that it would have added to the attractiveness, if not to the effectiveness of the list, to have classified such a rush of questions to the Almighty according to some rule; but the reader is left to pick and cull according to his own desire. He will be very sure to find many which he would like an answer to for himself, but the author leaves him to wait for it along with himself, and he will thus be likely to learn patience at least. To run over this long list of queries is an exercise that will, however, be apt to quicken the thought of all who sit down deliberately to it. Published by the author, New York.—Banner of Light.

A REAL mule was one of the attractions in the play of the "Forty Thieves," as produced in Virginia City, Nevada. The result is described by the Chronicle as follows: "No sooner had Ali come out of the cave with his bags of wealth, and attempted to put them on the back of the beast, than he began his part of the performance. He let fly with his heels; kicked the shavings (the supposed riches) out of the bags; kicked down the cavern; kicked down a whole forest; kicked down the wings; kicked the end of the bass-viol, leaning against the stage, to pieces; smashed the footlights; and finally doubled up Ali by planting both feet in the pit of his stomach. A rope was fastened around him and he was dragged off by the united strength of the company."

ACCORDING to Mr. Kearney, hell is "on the other side of the clouds." If Mr. Kearney is right the ancients were wrong. They unanimously placed it under ground. Homer and Virgil picture their heroes as descending into the bowels of the earth in order to discover the shades of their ancestors. Most of the Christian Fathers adhered to this view, although some held that it might be located among the frozen fastnesses of the Pole. Others, again, have thought that some fiery comet, flashing at lightning speed through space, might contain the lost souls, doomed at one moment to be melted in the incalculable heat of blazing suns, and at another to be whisked away into the frozen realms of everlasting night. Mr. Lecky tells of a monk who gained much fame by asserting that the souls of the wicked were imprisoned in the hollow interior of the earth, and that by constantly climbing to escape from the fire they caused the earth to revolve, as a squirrel in climbing turns its cage. Some modern speculators have suggested that the sun, with a temperature equal to several thousand times that of white hot iron, is peculiarly fitted for the abode of the wicked. But divines equally orthodox have maintained that the great center of our solar system is the heaven spoken of in the Scriptures; that beneath the envelope of fire and flame stretches a region of perpetual day more ravishingly beautiful than anything we can dream of.—Sun.

THE NEBULAR HYPOTHESIS.—PROF. J. NORMAN LOCKYER IS CONVINCED THAT IT IS CORRECT.—On his return to Washington from his expedition to Colorado to observe the eclipse, Prof. Lockyer was interviewed by a reporter of the Post of that city, and, in speaking of the bearing of the result of his observations upon the nebular theory, said: "I believe that evolution will account for all the planets that may be discovered in the future. The theory of the nebular hypothesis is to-day the only theory that can account for the origin of worlds. The idea that the discovery of the moons of Mars gave a fatal blow to the evolution theory is all stupid nonsense. I am afraid, however, that I am not a fair exponent of the nebular hypothesis, because I am rather committed to it. The spectroscope has consolidated the hypothesis to an enormous degree, and the more the spectroscopic results are garnered in, the more remarkable does the theory become. If you take the observations of Sir William Thompson and of Prof. Tate, dealing with the origin of the spectra of the nebulæ and comets, or the known observations on stars with bright lines, and stars with dark ones; the various appearance of nebulæ in Saturnine forms; the existence of the rings of Saturn; the density of the interior planets; the density of the exterior planets; the density of the satellites in relation to their primaries; the present condition of the sun; the former condition of the earth; the present composition of the sun's atmosphere; and the present composition of the crust around the earth, one-half of which consists of oxygen—if we look at all this, I really do not see what doubt can remain in regard to the correctness of the theory. It is one of those things requiring to be treated with scientific caution, but I see no error in it. But there may have been other causes going on of which we at present are perfectly ignorant, so that the nebular hypothesis may be only applicable to one of the many causes at work. The observations of the new stars were supposed at one time to be fatal to the hypothesis, but that was because people were carried away by the meaning of a word. The star in Cygnus could not have been a star at all when it burst out into the sky, for if it had been, it would have taken millions of years to cool down instead of a few days."

How I became Acquainted with Elmina Drake Slenker.

MY VISIT TO HER MOUNTAIN HOME.

[The following is a fitting tribute of one noble, excellent woman to another.—ED. T. S.]

Reason, guided by a swift intelligence, asserted her rights over a blind faith. I, who had been "a sister good and true" for more than one-fourth of a century, recognized the significant fact that I could not longer remain in the Church and be just either to myself or it; accordingly, I sent in a respectful written request for a quiet dismissal from membership.

Up stood a Goliath in creeds, but a pigmy in pure life, and cried out in holy, stentorian tones, "Turn her out; she is a rank Infidel." Thus, wearing the "badge of all our tribe," I was turned loose "to the mercy of the world, the flesh, and the devil."

It was a quiet Sabbath evening; McDonnell's "Heathens of the Heath" lay upon my reading-desk before me; from its pages of rational sentiment, permeating and satisfying my starved intellect, there arose a fragrance as of apple-blossoms in early spring-time.

Suddenly I heard the sound of familiar footsteps. My former brethren and sisters had hastened home from the church-meeting, and, not deeming it safe to wait till Monday morning, for fear of compromising their progeny's salvation, had sent their children to my school-room for their books, with the message, "Pa says you are an Infidel, and we cannot come to your school."

I noted at the time, and have been noting like coincidences since, that the first children who came were those to whom I had been particularly kind and helpful during a long and severe illness of their father. One of these children came to my house a few weeks since with expressions of love and gratitude, and asked for geranium cuttings; of course, I freely gave, and only mention the circumstance to show that Infidelity does not strike house-plants.

Monday evening, when I closed my day's labors, my school was reduced from sixty pupils to forty. Not one of my sisters in the church, and but one brother, called on me to obey the Master's teachings, "If one sheep be gone astray," etc. I went on the street, met many with whom I had labored side by side in church-work during ten years, met members of the choir for whom I had played the organ for many months during practice and service; not one gave me a word of friendly greeting; all passed by on the other side, or gazed at me as if they doubted my sanity. Time would fail me to tell of the coldness, neglect, and indignities I suffered for the next few months for no cause except that I had ceased to believe in myths.

Yet we are told by a few Liberals that we should be very "cultured" and mild when we speak or write about the churches, their dogmas, and their effects upon human character, lest we hurt the feelings of some one who has been reared in an unquestioning faith. Were it not for a higher, broader civilization, which has created more merciful laws, we, who cannot stultify reason and believe bear and fish stories, would now have to suffer at the stake or on the scaffold, as did those heroic thinkers of the past. At the present time, except in few instances, our good names and our business receive the whole bitter animus of the church people. Our persons they dare not touch.

In nearly every church in the land, those who cannot believe the most unreasonable things because they are found in the Bible are held up to ridicule before the congregations, and often in not very cultured language. Still, we are told to be culturedly silent.

Feeling cut off from old associates, my social nature cried out for new ones. I wrote to Elmina D. Slenker, whose name I had seen attached to several Liberal articles. I claimed her woman's love and sympathy. The grand, brave woman, that she is, gave it to me in true "Quaker measure, heaped up, pressed down, and running over." A year ago, when I had listened to the last medical lecture, and made the last rounds of the Philadelphia hospitals, I wrote to Elmina, "I take up my homeward march in one week; shall I visit you?" That precious, cordial letter, bidding me welcome, did me good to the very heart's core; and that one week's visit stands out this morning as an emerald isle, fresh and cool, in my life's sea.

Stopping off the train at a little way station, we took, by carriage, over the picturesque Alleghanies, the road to Snowville, twelve miles distant. Arriving there near midday, we crossed a noisy stream, which Mr. Slenker utilizes in running his woolen factory. He was expecting "Cousin Edith," and came toward me with outstretched hand as if he were really glad to see me. "Elmina is looking for you," said he, in jolly tones; "drive up the hill; that little brown house with the flowers on the porch is where we stop."

In a few moments the "little brown house" was reached, and Elmina Drake Slenker, one of the foremost standard-bearers in the great army of Freethought, stood calmly, and almost undemonstratively, before me. From my first pen-and-ink acquaintance with her, I had yearned to be clasped in her arms and to be pressed to her large, kind heart. A quiet clasp of hands, a few cordial words, and our meeting was over.

The dusty traveling garb was laid aside, and we gathered around the waiting-table. How plentiful was the helping; how well the food told that Elmina could minister to taste and stomach as well as to brain! The dinner over, she cleared away the table, washed the dishes, tidied up her person, brought in fresh flowers, then settled down to an afternoon's chat.

In less than two hours I felt I had always known this woman. She is crystalline; nothing hidden, nothing turbid in or about her. Each hour, each day of my visit, I felt inspired and uplifted by the easy companionship of as pure a woman as ever walked this earth.

She is in life's meridian, medium size, hair short, beginning to show the silver, form erect; earnest, quick, and graceful in all her household ways. Pictures generally flatter; not so with that of our Elmina; hers does not do her justice. Her face is so kindly in its expression, her countenance so beaming with generosity, her utterances so frank upon all subjects about which she converses, that one instinctively feels she is good, true, and fair.

Her home is very humble, a small weather-beaten, unpainted cottage perched up in the mountains, over 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, is made inviting by her diligent hands, fragrant by her love for flowers. She is maid of all work; nothing is neglected in her house or garden, while she is a stand-by to the sick and afflicted. Simple in all her ways, exceedingly temperate in dress, food, and drink, writing her beautiful articles at odd moments which most of women throw away, she is a woman of whom any cause may justly feel glad and proud.

During my visit she was suffering a severe trial, yet how patiently she bore it. Oscar, her one boy, her only child, had gone out into the great world, and she was feeling all a fond mother's solicitude for his welfare.

I was much interested in studying the attitude of the good people of the little Snowville community towards this Infidel woman. It was cordial and neighborly, with a perfect feeling of good companionship. Almost every hour of the day some one came in for a social call or for a neighborly act of kindness.

Being myself a great lover of children, I was amused and gratified at viewing my friend's dealings with the little berry children who came with their baskets of mountain berries.

"Miss Slenker, will you buy my berries?"

"I have a plenty; do not desire to put up any more, and have enough in my garden for present use!"

"Miss Slenker, I wish to get an order on the store for a new calico dress, a new pair of Sunday shoes, or a half pound of tea. If you do not buy my berries I will have to take them home, and I have walked five miles."

So "Miss Slenker" would buy the berries, and the dear little bronzed bare feet would hasten down the mountain's side to the store for the coveted articles. How I blessed her in my heart as the rustic figures with empty baskets passed through her gateway.

All too soon that delightful week slipped away, and one bright fresh morning "Cousin Ike" reined up and sung out, "All aboard if you will go, but you are more than welcome to stay six months."

The farewells were said and Elmina Slenker and I parted, probably never to meet again, but with the feeling on my part that we had cemented a life-long friendship, and that when she folds the diligent busy hands to her last rest, the world will have lost one good, noble woman, and the ranks of advanced thought will have one vacant place that will never see her like again. Her earnest, faithful labors in freedom's cause can never be fully estimated.

A Few Words to a Rev. Campbellite.

"Science cannot settle a religious dispute."—J. H. Dodd.

Well, then, science cannot settle any uncertain thing. Science cannot determine whether there ever was a race of Cyclops—monstrous one-eyed beings who gave to Jupiter thunderbolts and lightning in payment for having released them from Tartarus. Science cannot settle whether or not Briareus, with his hundred arms and fifty heads, ever existed; or a race of Centaurs, half man and half horse, the offspring of Ixion and a cloud.

Whatever science cannot settle we are safe in placing among the unknown and the improbable, and the great "Rock" of the fabled "Resurrection" may be safely put just there and left there. As to my "damning souls," I plead not guilty. It would look just as reasonable for thee to accuse me of destroying the sea nymphs, the Naiades, the Oreads, the Napacæ, the Dryads and Hamadryads, which once were supposed to people the rivers, oceans, and woods, because I deny that they ever existed. These beautiful and lovely beings were just as real to their worshipers as thy God and Jesus are to thee, and actually were no more mythical than these; so if it be "damning souls" to reject the one it is equally so to reject the other. Probably as many have believed in one as in the other, and so why give more credence to one than to the other simply because the present fashion demands it?

Then, too, thee not only accuses me of the horrible crime of "damning souls" and wilfully doing so, but carefully shakes thy own immaculate skirt clear by saying thee will "never damn anybody"! while all the time thee is doing thy level best to send every one to Hell who does not mount the Campbellite platform and take a good cold water bath! It is very true thee has got God, Christ, and the devil to do the dirty work for thee, but thee aids, abets, and encourages them in the foul plot against human rights and human happiness.

Thee says thee "knows it is no harm to be a true Christian." I say I know it is. It is very wrong to teach fables, myths, errors, and falsehoods, for facts and truth! It is very wrong to waste the splendid and glorious opportunities of the the present in dreaming over a supposable future. It is very wrong to make promises you have no power to fulfill. It is very wrong to substitute prayer for work; to teach dreams instead of science; to prepare to die rather than learn how to live; to waste one's love on gods and myths, instead of pouring it out on the loved ones around us! "No harm." Why, friend, it is all harm and no possible good! It reverences old myths and rejects new truths; it teaches us to lay up nothing for to-morrow, but to live from hand to mouth, which is a sure road to barbarism; it diverts attention from science and philosophy by accounting for all things—or trying to—by saying God made them, and God ordered the events as they take place; it teaches that the Bible is a revelation of the will of a God for the benefit of all mankind—yet no two understand it alike, and millions never heard of it! It teaches that man can believe as he wills, while we know he must believe as he has evidence. "Harm"! Why volumes would not contain the harm that has resulted from believing and living out the Christian faith and doctrine.

Away with it all, say I, and may every creed, dogma, and superstition be swept from the fair face of Nature's pure domain, and on her pages that now teem with seeming records of the power of a God shall hereafter be traced only the true, unchanging, and everlasting rounds of the evolution and development of matter and its powers and potencies.

"Get the truth but once uttered, and it is
A star new-born, that drops into its place
And which, once circling in its placid round,
Not all the tumult of the church can shake."

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

CHAPTER XIII.

MIGRATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF ORGANISMS. CHOROLOGY AND THE ICE-PERIOD OF THE EARTH.

As I have repeatedly said, but cannot too much emphasise, the actual value and invincible strength of the Theory of Descent does not lie in its explaining this or that single phenomenon, but in the fact that it explains all biological phenomena, that it makes all botanical and zoological series of phenomena intelligible in their relations to one another. Hence every thoughtful investigator is the more firmly and deeply convinced of its truth the more he advances from single biological observations to a general view of the whole domain of animal and vegetable life. Let us now, starting from this comprehensive point of view, survey a biological domain, the varied and complicated phenomena of which may be explained with remarkable simplicity and clearness by the theory of selection. I mean Chorology, or the theory of the local distribution of organisms over the surface of the earth. By this I do not only mean the geographical distribution of animal and vegetable species over the different parts and provinces of the earth, over continents and islands, seas, and rivers; but also their topographical distribution in a vertical direction, their ascending to the heights of mountains, and their descending into the depths of the ocean. (Gen. Morph. ii, 286.)

The strange chorological series of phenomena which show the horizontal distribution of organisms over parts of the earth, and their vertical distribution in heights and depths, have long since excited general interest. In recent times Alexander Humboldt and Frederick Schouw have especially discussed the geography of plants, and Berghaus and Schmarda the geography of animals, on a large scale. But although these and several other naturalists have in many ways increased our knowledge of the distribution of animal and vegetable forms, and laid open to us a new domain of science, full of wonderful and interesting phenomena, yet Chorology as a whole remained, as far as their labors were concerned, only a desultory knowledge of a mass of individual facts. It could not be called a science as long as the causes for the explanation of these facts were wanting. These causes were first disclosed by the theory of selection and its doctrine of the migrations of animal and vegetable species, and it is only since the works of Darwin and Wallace that we have been able to speak of an independent science of Chorology.

If all the phenomena of the geographical and topographical distribution of organisms are examined by themselves, without considering the gradual development of species, and if at the same time, following the customary superstition, the individual species of animals and plants are considered as forms independently created and independent of one another, then there remains nothing for us to do but to gaze at those phenomena as a confused collection of incomprehensible and inexplicable miracles. But as soon as we leave this low stand-point, and rise to the height of the theory of development, by means of the supposition of a blood-relationship between the different species, then all at once a clear light falls upon this strange series of miracles, and we see that all chorological facts can be understood quite simply and clearly by the supposition of a common descent of the species, and their passive and active migrations.

The most important principle from which we must start in chorology, and of the truth of which we are convinced by due examination of the theory of selection is that, as a rule, every animal and vegetable species has arisen only once in the course of time and only in one place on the earth—its so-called "center of creation"—by natural selection. I share this opinion of Darwin's unconditionally, in respect to the great majority of higher and perfect organisms, and in respect to most animals and plants in which the division of labor, or differentiation of the cells and organs of which they are composed, has attained a certain stage. For it is quite incredible, or could at best only be an exceedingly rare accident, that all the manifold and complicated circumstances—all the different conditions of the struggle for life, which influence the origin of a new species by natural selection—should have worked together in exactly the same agreement and combination more than once in the earth's history, or should have been active at the same time at several points of the earth's surface.

On the other hand, I consider it to be very probable that certain exceedingly imperfect organisms of the simplest structure, forms of species of an exceedingly indifferent nature, as, for example, many single-celled Protista, but especially the Monera, the simplest of them all, should have several times or simultaneously arisen in their specific form in several parts of the earth. For the few and very simple conditions by which their specific form was changed in the struggle for life may surely have often been repeated, in the course of time, independently in different parts of the earth. Further, those higher specific forms also, which have not arisen by natural selection, but by hybridism, may have repeatedly arisen anew in different localities. As, however, this proportionately small number of organisms does not especially interest us here, we may, in respect of chorology, leave them alone, and need only take into consideration the distribution of the great majority of animal and vegetable species in regard to which the single origin of every species in a single locality, in its so-called "central point of creation," can be considered as tolerably certain.

Every animal and vegetable species from the beginning of its existence has possessed the tendency to spread beyond the limited locality of its origin, beyond the boundary of its "center of creation," or, in other words, beyond its primeval home, or its natal place. This is a necessary consequence of the relations of population and over-population. The more an animal or vegetable species increases, the less is its limited natal place sufficient for its sustenance, and the fiercer the struggle for life; the more rapid the over-population of the natal spot, the more it leads to emigration. These migrations are common to all organisms, and are the real cause of the wide distribution of the different species of organisms over the earth's surface. Just as men leave over-crowded states, so all animals and plants migrate from their over-crowded primeval homes.

Many distinguished naturalists, especially Lyell and Schleiden, have before this repeatedly drawn attention to the great importance of these very interesting migrations of organisms. The means of transport by which they are effected are extremely varied. Darwin has discussed these most excellently in the eleventh and twelfth chapters of his work, which are exclusively devoted to "geographical distribution." The means of transport are partly active, partly passive; that is to say, the organism effects its migration partly by free locomotion due to its own activity, and partly by the movements of other natural bodies in which it has no active share.

It is self-evident that active migrations play the chief part in animals able to move freely. The more freely an animal's organization permits it to move in all directions, the more easily the animal species can migrate, and the more rapidly it will spread over the earth. Flying animals are of course most favored in this respect, among vertebrate animals especially birds, and among articulated animals, insects. These two classes, as soon as they came into existence, can have more easily spread over the whole earth than any other animal, and this fact partly explains the extraordinary uniformity of structure which characterizes these two great classes of animals. For, although they contain an exceedingly large number of different species, and although the insect class alone is said to possess more different species than all other classes of animals together, yet all the innumerable species of insects, and in like manner, also, the different species of birds, agree most strikingly in all essential peculiarities of their organization. Hence, in the class of insects, as well as in that of birds, we can distinguish only a very small number of large natural groups or orders, and these few orders differ but very little from one another in their internal structure. The orders of birds with their numerous species are not nearly as distinct from one another as the orders of the mammalian class, containing much fewer species; and the orders of insects, which are extremely rich in genera and species, resemble one another much more closely in their internal structure than do the much smaller orders of the crab class. The general parallelism between birds and insects is also very interesting in relation to systematic zoology; and the great importance of their richness in forms, for scientific morphology, lies in the fact that they show us how, within the narrowest anatomical sphere, and without profound changes of the essential internal organization, the greatest variety in external bodily forms can be attained. The reason of this is evidently their flying mode of life and their free locomotion. In consequence of this birds, as well as insects, have spread very rapidly over the whole surface of the earth, have settled in all possible localities inaccessible to other animals, and variously modified their specific form by superficial adaptation to particular local relations.

Next to the flying animals, those animals, of course, have spread most quickly and furthest which were next best able to migrate, that is, the best runners among the inhabitants of the land, and the best swimmers among the inhabitants of the water. However, the power of such active migrations is not confined to those animals which throughout life enjoy free locomotion. For the fixed animals also, such as corals, tubicolous worms, sea-squirts, lily encrinites, sea-acorns, barnacles, and many other lower animals which adhere to sea-weeds, stones, etc., enjoy, at least at an early period of life, free locomotion. They all migrate before they adhere to anything. Their first free locomotive condition of early life is generally that of a "ciliated" larva, a roundish, cellular corpuscle, which, by means of a garb of movable "flimmer-hairs" (Latin, "cilia"), swarms about in the water and bears the name of Planula.

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The statements of the clergy as to the condition of woman in pagan Rome are also usually incorrect. Woman's position in the pagan Empire was one of great social dignity, and a large class enjoyed great legal independence. Woman could hold property in her own right. Inheriting a portion of her father's property, she retained it independently of her husband. No inconsiderable portion of the wealth of Rome was, at one time, under the absolute control of women. There was hardly a more constant theme of satire than the alleged tyranny exercised by rich wives over their husbands, to whom it is said they loaned money, and not unfrequently at exorbitant rates of interest. "No Roman," says Lecky, "hesitated to lead his wife with him to the feast, or to place the mother of his children at the head of his table." Divorces which in an earlier age were very rare, none having occurred, it was said, for 520 years, were in the Empire undoubtedly frequent; but the right to separate belonged to the wife as well as to the husband. The word concubine represented one of the forms of marriage. This union, which the clergy have frequently stated was but little better than prostitution, was strictly legal and honorable. It was contracted between men of patrician rank and freed women, who from motives of policy were not permitted to intermarry according to the other forms. But cohabitation under this form, made it impossible for the man to contract a union with another woman, without being guilty of adultery.

It is hardly necessary to state that monogamy prevailed in Rome from the earliest times. Historians are agreed that Roman influence waa one of the chief causes that made this type of marriage dominant in Europe. Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, alluding to a period earlier than the one of which I am speaking, says, "How far the Romans had advanced beyond the Asiatic (Bible) ideas on the subject is indicated by a remark of Cato the Censor, who lived 232 B. C. He was accustomed to say, 'They who beat wives or children, lay sacriligious hands on the most sacred things in the world. For myself I prefer the character of a good husband to that of a great senator.'" The precepts of Plutarch respecting marriage are scarcely surpassed by those of any modern writer. Another fact should be mentioned: the equality of the obligation of chastity was as generally asserted as at the present day; Antoninus, in issuing a condemnation for adultery against a guilty wife, by the request of the husband added the following; "Provided always, it is established by your life that you gave her an example of fidelity. It would be unjust that a husband should exact a fidelity he does not himself keep."

The courtesan class in pagan Rome was large, but it was regarded as the same class is among us to-day. There was, we all know, a vast amount of licentiousness in the Empire, as there has often been in the most brilliant periods since, yet it is not to be denied that the Empire is crowded with examples of conjugal heroism and devotion. There was, too, much of ancient Roman simplicity. The most noble ladies worked with their own hands at woolen fabrics, and the skill of wives in domestic economy was not unfrequently mentioned in their epitaphs. The clothes which the Emperor Augustus wore were made by his own wife and sisters: "In the higher families," says Renan, "excesses in the toilet were almost unknown" (Apostles, p. 253). The extreme degradation of woman in pagan Rome exists, indeed, only in the imagination of the Christian, who, in his anxiety to ascribe all progress to his religion, is ready to believe there was not one luminous spot on the earth outside of Judea until the appearance of Christ.

Did space permit, we should be pleased to speak of the condition of woman among the pagan Germans. The German women were remarkable for their chastity. Adultery was very rare; polygamy confined to the princes, and no woman known to have sinned, however great her personal charms, could secure a husband. "The old Teutonic tribes," says Mrs. Child, "had always been remarkable for the high consideration in which they held their women, and the respect with which they treated them." "Teutonic tribes married but one wife, and fully acknowledge the equality of men and women, both in matters religious and matters political." "Only," says F. W. Newman, "in countries where Germanic sentiment has taken root, do we see marks of any elevation of the female sex superior to that of pagan antiquity; and as the elevation of the German woman in her deepest paganism was already striking to Tacitus and his contemporaries, it is high unreasonable to claim it as an achievement of Christianity" (Phases of Faith).

As many as were the evils in the pagan Empire, and as atrocious as was the character of some of them, there was still a great deal on which the moralist may dwell with satisfaction. "The corruption of the surface," says Renan, "did not extend to the great mass of seriousness and honor which existed in better Roman society, and many examples are yet preserved of devotion to order, duty, peace, and solid integrity" (Apostles, p. 253).

The provisions for the relief of poverty, the entire absence of which one would infer from the representations of Christian writers, were really abundant—indeed, so great that they became an encouragement to idleness. Under Augustus 200,000 persons received monthly gratuitous distributions of corn. When Egypt was afflicted by famine, Trajan fed the people from other granaries of the Empire. Those times were not without their noble manifestations of sympathy and benevolence. When Lyons was nearly destroyed by fire, Rome supplied the wants of the people, in grateful return for assistance received from Lyons when, a little earlier, a similar calamity befel Rome. When Antioch was half destroyed by an earthquake, the other Asiatic Greeks "sent from all sides provisions by land and sea to the unfortunates, who clung to their ruined homes." So wrote one who was living there. When Chicago was reduced to ashes by the fire fiend, the generous contributions which were sent from every quarter, were, we thought, sublime demonstrations of the innate goodness and nobleness of human nature. But pagan Rome could point to noble exhibitions of sympathy, and to generous assistance rendered under similar circumstances, equally entitled to our admiration.

The Emperor Trajan in his reign provided for the support of 5000 children by the Government. In the little Italian town of Villia, the same emperor instituted a charity which partially supported 270 children. The name of one woman has been preserved—Celia Macrina—who established a charity for 100 children at Terracina. Several of the pagan emperors were distinguished for their bounty to poor women. They founded institutions for poor girls, infirmaries for slaves, and some historians have claimed, public hospitals for the sick. Benefit societies, providing against casualties, by paying monthly into a common fund, existed in the pagan Empire, and, indeed, were not unknown in pagan Greece 400 B. C.

Expanded ideas of universal brotherhood had been increasing from the time of the conquests of Alexander, which to some extent brought into relationship the nations along the Mediterranean, which previously were unknown to one another. This sentiment was greatly advanced when the whole known world was brought under the dominion of the Roman emperors. "Independently of Christian revelation," says Merivale, "the heathen world was gravitating, through natural causes, toward the acknowledgement of the cardinal doctrines of humanity" (Conversion of the Roman Empire, p. 118.)

Roman arms had made of many nations one immense Empire. The large cities were united by great roads. A common nation and a common law for the various tribes from Spain to Jerusalem gave rise to mutual interests and intimate relationships. With a knowledge of Greek, it is said, a man could travel as well through the bays and harbors of the Mediterranean as we can to-day, with French, through the principal cities of Europe. The idea of the equality and brotherhood of men, far from being confined to the ethical teachings of a few great minds, showed itself in the commingling of different nations and races, in the legislation recognizing the conjugal and pecuniary rights of woman, and limiting the authority of the father over the son, in elevating the slaves by making them freedmen, and in the general drift of the age.

In matters of religion the policy of the Empire was to toleration. "The Romans exercised this toleration," says Mosheim, "in the amplest manner, for though they would not allow any change to be made in the religion of the Empire, nor any new form of worship to be openly introduced, yet they granted to their citizens a full liberty of observing in private the sacred rites of other nations, and of honoring foreign deities (whose worship contained nothing inconsistent with the interests and laws of the republic) with feasts, temples, consecrated groves and the like testimonials of homage and respect" (Ecc. Hist., Harper's Ed., vol. i, p. 16).

"Even Augustus, who had an unusually strong attachment to the national religion, and who even prohibited the spread of Egyptian rites in Italy, allowed every system to enjoy freedom in its own province. The Jews, much as they were disliked and their religion scorned, were exempted by Augustus from all observances conflicting with their conscience, and, if we may believe Josephus, went so far as to present a gift of vases to the temple at Jerusalem.

MAN must believe in immortality; his belief corresponds with the wants of his nature. But if the philosopher tries to prove the soul's immortality from a legend, that is very weak, and says little to us. To me, the eternal existence of my soul is proved from my need of activity. If I work incessantly until my death, nature is pledged to give me another form of being when the present can no longer sustain the spirit.—Goethe.

NO. XXV.

ANIMAL ORGANISMS.

My Dear Readers: I have taken you through a regular round dance in my descriptions of vegetable life, botany, the glacial period, the changes in the earth's surface, etc. I hope you have been measurably amused and instructed by what I have said to you. I propose now to take up the thread of animal life, and its evolution, where I left it.

I shall not detain you by protracted descriptions of the long and numerous changes which took place from the monera up to man, but will briefly assure you that those changes absolutely took place, and that one form of life after another, from the phase of organization that was so low that it had no organs, to the human race, with the most complex system of organs. I explained to you, in brief, the regular progress that was made in the ascent from the lowest forms to the highest; that the step from protoplasm to the monera with a single cell was not a great one, and from organisms with a single cell to those of a score, and from those to those of hundreds and thousands, were but continued steps in the same path of progress.

Animal life on this planet for hundreds of thousands of years was a journey of evolution—a regular climbing process, step by step, up the ladder of life. In regular gradation above the monera, as I before explained to you, come the next in order: the protozoans, sponges, rhizopods, zoophytes, polyps, jelly-fish, starfish, bryozoans, ascidians (or oysters, clams, etc.), cuttlefish, worms, leeches, crabs, lobsters, centipedes, spiders, insects, beetles, butterflies, fishes (all kinds), reptiles (as lizards, turtles, snakes, frogs, etc.), birds (a vast variety), then the mammals, quadrupeds (a numerous class, ending with man, the lord and superior of all).

If this vast mass of animal life is pictured in the form of a tree, the protoplasm, containing every element and potency of animal life, may be regarded as the root or foundation; the monera, the protozoans, the zoophytes, and the rhizopods may be regarded as the trunk; while the bryozoans, the ascidians, the mollusks, the worms, the insects, the fishes, the reptiles, the birds, the quadrupeds, and, finally, the human race, may be regarded as the branches, the foliage, and the fruit, the most perfect of which is man himself. As the growth is traced from the root and trunk, it will be observed that a great number of branches shoot out, exhibiting new forms of life, new genera and species, until the multiform varieties of animals are produced. Every branch that puts forth is another phase of the great system of evolution, another unfolding of the vast powers and resources of the universe. Without the protoplasmic source the lower forms of life could not have sprung into existence, and without the lowest forms the intermediate could not have appeared, and without the intermediate the higher forms could never have been known.

I might fill up several letters in detailing to you how the almost innumerable varieties of animated life were evolved from the great fundamental source, but perhaps it is undesirable to you; and were I to enter into all the minutiæ of description, it would doubtless become tiresome. It is sufficient, perhaps, for me to assure you that every step has been a perfectly natural one; every movement has been an outgrowth of the great universal system by which everything moves and is governed. The vital forces and principles of the universe are employed in the production of the almost endless forms of life that you have upon the earth. Electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, attraction, cohesion, etc., have their appropriate offices to fill, and with their aid all the functions of life—nutrition, assimilation, circulation, growth, locomotion, mentalization, and reproduction—are evolved.

None of the great number of forms of life were special creations, but all were parts of the grand system I have indicated—one part connected with another part, one the outgrowth of another. All forms of life did not come from a single germ, nor from a singular class of germs. There was nearly as great a variety in the forms and varieties of germ-life as in the more perfected products, and thousands of those varieties of germ-life, as well as the progressed species, have long since passed out of existence. This was not the result of any design, but simply the consequence of laws and conditions.

The origin of species was by no means a sudden result or a sudden change. The varied forms of life took on their peculiar characteristics with the lapse of vast eras of time. Climate, altitude, light, heat, quality of food, of soil, with almost thousands of other conditions, have contributed to produce the changes that have taken place. The various organs have come forth from the great laboratory of nature as the need for them has arisen. Without the productive agency of light an eye would never have been produced. Animals that live perpetually in the dark have little use for eyes and seldom have them, and if they have, they are without the power of sight. The same has been the case with every organ and function that has existed. Where an urgent want has arisen nature has possessed the power to supply it, but it has been by slow degrees, ages often being required to produce radical changes—new genera and species.

It is best for you to understand and remember that every result that has ever been produced was done by a natural cause, which cause existed prior to it and was entirely equal to the result brought about. No supernaturalism was ever employed in accomplishing anything that has ever been done. The powers of the universe, which means the forces inherent in matter, have been equal to every result that ever has taken place or ever can. Supernaturalism exists wholly in the imagination. The universe contains not a particle of it and without the universe there is nothing and never can be. Every result has been a natural result, and every result has been the product of a natural cause. Causes and effects never commenced to have an existence. They have been interminably joined together, locked and interlocked for ever.

The history of man upon your earth is a very extensive one if fully known and understood. His outgrowth from the lower animals was slow and almost imperceptible. For ages he was little above the apes, orang outangs, etc., from which he evolved, but by degrees, step by step, did he become to be the superior being. The steps were slow and painful. He was for a long time but a slight remove from his progenitors of the ape tribe, but gradually he grew and advanced. As his brain and mental organization became partially perfected his superiority became discernible.

For ages however man lived in a plane little above the wild animals by which he was surrounded. He lived with them in the caves and holes in the ground. He struggled with them for existence and entered into interminable contests with them for food and for life. For ages his organs of speech were imperfect and he had but little more language than the brutes. By slow degrees their conditions changed. The mental status of man gradually improved, his intellect in consequence become stronger and that enabled him to compete successfully with even stronger animals who had less reasoning power. With these results came better means of communication, and in time languages existed, crude, to be sure, but still sufficient for man in that primitive condition. As he spread over the earth, particular localities were distinguished for peculiarities of its population. Families and tribes came into existence and variations in languages and dialects were the result.

Many tribal distinctions, in the course of time, passed away, and numerous varieties or races of the human family, as with the animal kingdom below it, passed entirely away. Had all the forms of animal life that have had an existence on your globe continued and increased like those on earth to-day, there would be far more than double the number of species of animated life that the world now contains. Changes in the climates of the earth, the productions of the soil, the temperature and humidity of the atmosphere, and other modifying conditions, have conspired to lead to existing results. The law of the survival of the fittest is a true one, and acts with undeviating certainty. It has ruled out of existence many thousand varieties of animated life, both in the waters and on the land.

The study of man through all the gradations he has passed, from his independent existence, apart from the lower animal forms, is a great one, and could easily be made to fill several letters, but my purpose will hardly allow of it, and I shall be under the necessity of leaving unsaid a great deal that I could have said with much pleasure. Man began away low down in the scale of existence and by slow steps has he climbed up to where he stands to-day, and an observable feature is that he is unable to trace back his history into primitive, pre-historic times. When he was a crude, ignorant animal he was able to keep no records, and had not even intelligence to transmit by tradition and legends facts connected with his early existence. For more than a hundred thousand years all knowledge and recollection of himself has passed away never to be recalled.

It is only a few thousand years since man began to be able to transmit his history to his offspring and successors. The great forgotten sea of human existence before that time must ever remain unknown. Conjectures and estimates can now only be formed without a written or printed history to lighten up the prolonged vista backwards.

Man was contemporary with many species of animals which have long since beeome extinct, not a relic of them being left upon the face of the earth. This fact shows that man is better calculated to prolong his existence than larger and more powerful animals. The mammoth, the mastodon, the megatherium, the cave-bear, and the cave-hyena were coexistent with man, but for thousands of years they have not lived upon the earth.

The era of pre-historic man has been divided by mythologists into four different epochs. First. "The Stone Age," in which rude stone implements were used for various purposes. At this time man shared the possession of the earth with the mammals, the cave-bear, the woolly-haired rhinoceros, and other extinct animals. This is also called the "Palæolithic" period.

Second. "The later, or Polished Stone Age," a period characterized by beautiful weapons and instruments made of flint and other kinds of stone in which, however, no trace is found of the knowledge of any metal excepting gold, which was sometimes used for ornaments. This is also called the "Neolithic" period.

Third. "The Bronze Age," in which bronze was used for arms and cutting instruments of all kinds. The softer metals, copper and bronze, were discovered a long time before the harder and more useful metal, iron or steel.

Fourth. "The Iron Age," in which that metal superseded bronze and copper for arms, axes, knives, etc; bronze, however, still remaining in common use for ornaments, and frequently for handles of swords, and other arms, but never for blades.

In the stone age, man had as companions the mammoth, the cave bear, etc., and still later on, the more migratory and useful animals, as the reindeer, which still remains in existence, and later still, the domesticated animals, as the dog, the horse, sheep, and cattle, which were great friends to him.

Although man in those early ages was surrounded by the most formidable animals, and his weapons were of the rudest character, yet it must not be inferred that he declined to encounter them in a personal contest. The bone-caves where have long since been found commingled their remains, attest this fact. By his watchfulness in noting the habits of the animals that surrounded him, by his sagacity in constructing traps and pitfalls, man almost always came off victorious in his repeated contests. The animals easily came to regard man as a superior and formidable rival. Although supplied with the rudest weapons, by the exercise of cunning, man fearlessly approached, and successfully contested with the enemies by whom he was surrounded.

Early, too, man learned to fight and kill his fellow man. Migrating tribes and families would come in contact with other tribes and races, and they easily regarded each other as deadly enemies, and often the most sanguinary conflicts took place, and often and again the earth was reddened with the blood of beligerent, warlike man. They were jealous of the powers of their antagonists, their hunting-grounds and rivals, and interlopers were fought to the bitter end. Rude clubs, the limbs of trees, and the bones of animals were man's first weapons, and later he learned to fashion rude stone hammers, knives, spear-heads, etc., and still later, metal knives, spears, arrow-heads, and swords. Man has been a warring, blood-thirsty being from his earliest existence. The progress of civilization has been a slow and tedious one. Wars, propensity for fighting, and bloodshed, though they have served some good purposes, have greatly retarded advancement in enlightened civilization. War has kept the world in a backward condition for thousands of years, and this has been the case in comparatively modern times as well as ages ago.

But I am running on at too great length. I have written enough for one letter, and will draw to a close. I will try to be with you again in two weeks, and continue my chats with you. I have something to tell you about the unpleasantness that grew up between my Brother and myself, and the ultimate separation of interests and associations that resulted from it. For the present allow me to take my leave with my uniform kindness of feeling towards you and all men. May your paths continue to be in pleasant places. May health remain with you, and may the peace of mind which arises from well spent lives be your unbroken portion. Your sincere friend,

The Gods of the Ages.

In my youthful days, as schoolmarm and I were mentally promenading the stellar regions, astronomy being the subject before the house, I asked the question, Why is it that we can form no idea of the immensity of space?

After deep thought, the fair damsel, scarcely above her teens, sagely replied, "Because we can fix no bounds to it. We can form no idea of anything without bounds."

In all ages and countries, humanity have, to the tip-top of their capability, been fixing bounds—personifying their conceptions of the good and the bad. And as all types of humanity, in all ages and countries, are not exactly alike, we have no right to expect their Gods and Devils to be alike, for different individuals view things from different standpoints.

As humanity is on the ascending grade, and views are taken from more elevated standpoints, we have a right to improved Theologies. And now the question arises, Is it any part of our duty to caricature or smash up Theologies of the past? If there be such a duty—I don't say there is not—please have the politeness to let me off.

May there not be some service rendered to humanity by minds less ambitious of eclat? What if some of us give practical demonstration of our divinest ideal of the Good, the True, the Beautiful. And further your deponent saith not.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

It is even more surprising that the most opposite results, those of Secchi and of Pouillet, have been deduced from the same phenomenon, viz., the calorific radiation of the Sun, the intensity of which they estimated by an almost identical process. As M. Vicaire remarks, so enormous a difference in the results evidently cannot be due to the observations, but to the manner in which they have been interpreted; and, after careful consideration, he arrives at the conclusion that Pouillet's evaluation is far nearer the truth than that of Father Secchi. Upon this, M. Elie de Beaumont pointed out how Sir William Thompson had shown that the Sun's temperature cannot be so very much higher than that attained in certain manufacturing processes, and adverted to his treatise upon solar heat, in which he states that the quantity emitted, according to Pouillet, is not equal to more than a seven-thousand horse-power to each square foot of its surface. Coal burnt at the rate of a pound in two seconds would produce almost the same result, and Rankine has estimated that in the locomotives coal is consumed at a rate not greater than a pound per square foot in from thirty to ninety seconds.

This great problem as to the surface temperature of the Sun is, as M. Elie de Beaumont adds, more accessible now than it once was. This is principally due to the astronomical expeditions for studying, at the epoch of total eclipses, the physical constitution of the Sun, not the least important of which was that of 1858 to Panaragua in Brazil.

The result of M. Becquerel's researches in regard to the question of high temperatures, and the phenomena of irradiation which accompany them, leads him to the conclusion that the highest temperatures which can be produced by combustion or electric agency do not exceed 2,000 or 2,500 degrees Cent., and that consequently the solar temperature, which is not so widely removed as might be supposed from the temperatures of these sources, would not exceed 3,000 degrees.

M. Fizeau thinks that if the solar radiation is, as a matter of fact, greater than the most intense sources of light which the Earth can produce, it has not, nevertheless, been found more than double or treble that of the light proceeding from them all. Thus these two sources of light are in all points comparable, whence it is to be inferred that their respective temperatures cannot differ very widely, as certain estimates recently formed about the temperature of the solar surface would tend to prove. M. Fizeau's argument seems to me very conclusive.

M. H. Sainte-Claire Deville says that to speak of very elevated temperatures and their measurement is to admit that the gases are capable of dilation or compression by heat to an indefinite extent—a fact which is not proved; or else that there is no limit to the chemical combinations—of which there is even less evidence. He also points out that to calculate the temperature of any given point of the Sun's mass is to neglect altogether the influence of the stratum—a very deep one, for all we know—of obscure solar matter which, so far as we can judge, overspreads the incandescent stratum, and the radiation of which towards the earth is also eliminated. He goes on to notice a fresh experiment which might help to settle the question. The hydrogen rays emitted by certain points of the Sun's incandescent matter have been ascertained by astronomical observations; Frankland and Lockyer found them present in hydrogen flame subjected to a certain pressure, and it follows that the combustible temperature of hydrogen at this same pressure can be calculated, and, as a necessary consequence, the character and pressure of the gases at those points of the solar atmosphere where the hydrogen rays have been noticed. The result of the first experiments upon this head induce him to believe that the temperature is somewhat about 2500 or 2800 degrees, which corresponds with the subsequent experiments of Bunsen and Debray.

XIII.

To complete this summary of the opinions arrived at by the most eminent astronomers, I will now add the conclusions come to by Father Secchi concerning solar temperature, its origin, and its sustenance.

1st. The solar temperature is of several million degrees, though it is impossible to say precisely how many.*

2d. This temperature is to all appearances the result of gravity, and must have been produced by the collapse of the matter which constituted the primitive nebula and which now composes the Sun and the planets.

3d. At this epoch of formation the temperature must have been much higher than it now is: therefore the Sun is in process of cooling.

4th. Though the Sun is continually losing vast quantities of heat, the diminution of temperature is almost imperceptible, not exceeding one degree in four thousand years. This is due to the state of disjunction in which the matter remains under the action of the heat.

5th. Though the temperature of the Sun is not altogether invariable, its secular variations are, at the same time, slighter than the frequent fluctuations which we remark without being able to investigate them completely. Therefore we may take for granted that our planet will continue to be habitable for a long series of ages.

He proceeds to say that "though the temperature of the Sun is not altogether invariable, yet the variations are so trifling that they are only perceptible after many thousands of years. After a still greater lapse of time—after many millions of centuries, for instance—the Sun will become much cooler; and a time will, no doubt, arrive when it will no longer possess the property of sustaining life upon the surface of the planets.

XIV.

Lucretius forestalled our modern astronomers when he said: "I am aware how novel and incredible an opinion I express in predicting the future collapse of the heavens and the earth, and how difficult it will be for me to convince people of its truth. This is always the case when one propounds a truth to which utterance has not yet been given, and which, moreover, is not susceptible to the ear or the touch—the two sole conductors of evidence into the sanctuary of the human mind. . . . You believe, perhaps, that the earth and Sun, the heavens and the sea, the moon and the stars are divine substances, destined to be eternal; that it is, consequently, an act of impiety, equal to that of the Giants, and meriting the severest punishment, to dare by vain arguments to shake the vault of the world, to extinguish the Sun which shines in the heavens, and to subject immortal beings to destruction. But all these bodies are so far from having anything in common with the divine nature, and so unworthy to be placed in the rank of Gods, that they are rather calculated to give us an idea of brute and inanimate matter; for you must not suppose that feeling and intelligence are common to all bodies alike.

"Moreover, if the heavens and the earth have never had an origin, if they subsist since all eternity, how comes it that there was no poet to celebrate the achievements preceding the war of Thebes and the downfall of Troy? How is it that so many heroic deeds are buried in oblivion and excluded for ever from the eternal annals of fame? I am certain that our world is new; it is yet in its infancy, and its origin does not date far back. This is why certain arts are perfected and others only invented to-day; navigation is but just beginning to progress; the science of harmony is a discovery of our own time; and, lastly, that philosophy, the principles of which I expound, is but of recent date, and I am the first of my countrymen who has been able to discourse about it."

This train of reasoning is not very conclusive, but the quotation just given expresses in beautiful language the ideas which were current upon this topic in the days of Lucretius.

To bring the subject of solar heat to a conclusion, I may add that researches about the Sun date from a very early period. Lucas Valerius remarked that its image was more brilliant at the centre than at the edges. This important fact was called in question by Galileo, but it is correct, as has been proved by recent observations, those of Father Secchi among others. The latter also show:

1st. That all radiations undergo a considerable absorption, which increases from the centre of the solar disc to the edge, where it is at its maximum.

2d. That the equatorial regions are of a higher temperature than the regions situated beyond the 30th degree of latitude, the difference being at least 1-16.

3d. That the temperature is a trifle higher in the Northern than it is in the Southern hemispheres.

4th. That just as the spots emit less light, so also do they emit less heat than the other regions.

XV.

This is the place for a few remarks concerning the zodiacal light. This light is a phenomenon which generally accompanies sunrise and sunset, about the period of the equinoxes, that of spring more especially; it is seen in the form of a cone of whitish light, which is visible in the direction of the zodiac, being brightest in the regions where the sky is very limpid. I have observed it, under specially favorable conditions, upon the Atlantic, and in the Southern seas. In length it sometimes seems to describe an arc of ninety degrees.

The Ancients designate this light by the name of trabes (rafter). The first savants who attempted to give it a scientific explanation seem to have been J. D. Cassina and Mairan. Cassina supposed the Sun to be envolved in a nebulous stratum, in shape like a very flattened and nearly lenticular spheroid, extending beyond the orbits of Minerva and Venus to that of the earth. De Mairan, who had even taken detailed observations of this phenomenon, gives a description of it corresponding to that of Humboldt, and, like Cassini, he also connects it with the solar atmosphere, higher around its equator, on account of its rotation, which would account for its elongated form, visible only when the points of observation are not plunged in this atmosphere.

Heywood vs. Comstock.

Sometimes a question of personal liberty hinges on a person of unsavory reputation. Indeed, that is very apt to be the case. We think it is so in the case of Heywood. He is one of those restless creatures who think they have "missions," with a strong penchant for doing something shocking to conservative minds. His book was evidently written to create a sensation, but not to excite prurient ideas. We believe in giving the broadest liberty to any honest inquiry, and feel certain that the worst possible way to discuss a question is to silence the other side. Many books that do not contain an obscene word exercise a pernicious influence, while, in other cases, the plainest language is allowable. In any event, freedom of discussion, by speech and print, is one of the most sacred and important of human rights, and if we allow it to be abridged in any case of honest inquiry, no matter how absurd the doctrines presented may be, we weaken the bulwarks of personal liberty. The only way to get at the truth is to allow perfect freedom of discussion. Any restriction takes us back at once to that region of bigoted persecution from which we hoped humanity had emerged. We have no reason to believe that Heywood is any less sincere and honest than Comstock. Each thinks he has a "mission" on the earth; but, if Comstock's is less offensive to fastidious tastes, Heywood's is less dangerous to liberty. The only proper way to judge the question, however, is to leave the character of the men entirely out of it, and to stand by the fundamental doctrine of liberty. As the venerable Elizur Wright said in Faneuil Hall, "The only safety of the republic against social as well as political heresies is the perfect freedom of publication, allowing every man to load his literary gun, whether with wisdom or folly, sense or nonsense, and fire it in the face and eyes of the common sense of the public.—Boston Herald.

A COMPARISON DRAWN BETWEEN THE "INFORMER" AND THE AUTHOR OF "CUPID'S YOKES."

To the Editor of the Herald: In your very able editorial of Saturday last, you institute a comparison between Mr. E. H. Heywood and one Anthony Comstock, which appears somewhat unjust to the former. In alluding to their respective "missions," you say, "If Comstock's is less offensive to fastidious tastes, Heywood's is less dangerous to liberty." Now, however objectionable Mr. Heywood's opinions, as published in the pamphlet entitled "Cupid's Yokes," may be to the conservative world, it is universally conceded that he is a man of absolutely irreproachable life and habits, Comstock's chief witness against Mr. H. at his recent trial, the venerable Postmaster of Princeton, Mass., testifying that he had known Mr. Heywood from a child, and had never heard a hint against his character as a man, or his integrity as a citizen. Mr. Comstock, on the contrary, is a falsifier, a professional informer, not only detecting, but, by persuasive arts and bribes, inducing the commission of crime, his last effort in this direction being a visit to a house of ill-repute, where, in the company of three associates, he induced three of the inmates, by earnest solicitation and the payment of $14, to divest themselves of their clothing, and for the first time in their terrible career, degrade their womanhood by the exposure of their persons, which act led to their immediate arrest by Anthony Comstock, who had slipped out while they were disrobing and sworn out a warrant for their arrest for a crime not yet perpetrated, he, of course, deriving a revenue for every offense detected and brought to trial. How such deeds as these can fail to offend a sense of decency, to say nothing of morality or "fastidious taste," is strange indeed; and to institute a comparison between the "mission" of this modern Judas and that of any honest man becomes, in the light of these facts, impossible.—Laura Kendrick, in the Boston Herald.

O just Posterity!
I strive to penetrate thy thought; to soar
Beyond the narrow precincts of To-day,
And judge what men, now wanting crusts of bread,
Shall in thy book stand foremost with the crowned;
What scorned and persecuted guide of thought
Shall shine, the jewel on a nation's brow;
And what unfriended genius, jeered at now,
Shall fill the largest niche of Pantheons.
I would behold daily, for my delight,
The clear size of the greatness, the full size,
Shape, glory, majesty of living men.
Why should our envy dim the orbs of heaven?
Why should our malice dwarf the giants' height—
Our scorn make black the white robe of the sage?

TRUE religion is universal justice, which begins at the centre of the individual and widens outwardly, wave-like, as the ocean swells, predicating thus the happiness of all upon the harmony of each.—A. J. Davis.

MILLIONS never think a noble thought;
But with brute hate of brightness, buoy a mind
Which drives the darkness out of them like hounds.
What charm is in this world-scene to such minds?
What can they do in heaven? —Festus.

Judge Field's Opinion in the Jackson Case.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Number 6 (original).—October Term, 1877.

In the matter of A. Orlando Jackson. } On petition for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari.

1.—The power vested in Congress to establish "post-offices and post-roads" embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. Under it Congress may designate what shall be carried in the mail, and what shall be excluded.

2.—In the enforcement of regulations excluding matter from the mail a distinction is to be made between different kinds of mail matter; between what is intended to be kept free from inspection, such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage; and what is open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, purposely left in a condition to be examined.

3.—Letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage in the mail can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be.

4.—Regulations against the transportation in the mail of printed matter, which is open to examination, cannot be enforced so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom. When, therefore, printed matter is excluded from the mail, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress.

5.—Regulations excluding matter from the mail may be enforced through the courts, upon competent evidence of their violation obtained in other ways than by the unlawful inspection of letters and sealed packages; and with respect to objectionable printed matter, open to examination, they may in some cases also be enforced by the direct action of the officers of the postal service upon their own inspection, as where the object is exposed and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print.

6.—When a party is convicted of an offense, and sentenced to pay a fine, it is within the discretion of the court to order his imprisonment until the fine is paid.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 3,894 of the Revised Statutes provides that "No letter or circular concerning [illegal] lotteries, so-called gift-concerts, or other similar enterprises offering prizes, or concerning schemes devised and intended to deceive and defraud the public for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretenses, shall be carried in the mail;" and that "any person who shall knowingly deposit or send anything to be conveyed by mail in violation of this section, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, with costs of prosecution." By an act passed in July, 1876, the word "illegal" was stricken out of the section. Under the law as thus amended the petitioner was indicted, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, for knowingly and unlawfully depositing, on the 23d of February, 1877, at that district, in the mail of the United States, to be conveyed in it, a circular concerning a lottery offering prizes, inclosed in an envelope addressed to one J. Ketcham, at Gloversville, New York. The indictment sets forth the offense in separate counts so as to cover every form in which it could be stated under the act. Upon being arraigned the petitioner stood mute, refusing to plead, and thereupon a plea of not guilty was entered in his behalf by order of the court. (Rev. St., Sec. 1,032.) He was subsequently tried, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of one hundred dollars, with the costs of the prosecution, and to be committed to the county jail until the fine and costs were paid. Upon his commitment, which followed, he presented to this court a petition alleging that he was imprisoned and restrained of his liberty by the marshal of the southern district of New York, under the conviction; that such conviction was illegal, and that the illegality consisted in this: that the court had no jurisdiction to punish him for the acts charged in the indictment; that the act under which the indictment was drawn was unconstitutional and void; and that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in committing him until the fine was paid. He therefore prayed for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the marshal to bring him before the court, and a writ of certiorari to be directed to the clerk of the circuit court to send up the record of his conviction, that this court might inquire into the cause and legality of his imprisonment. Accompanying the petition as exhibits were copies of the indictment and of the record of conviction. The court, instead of ordering that the writs be issued at once, entered a rule, the counsel of the petitioner consenting thereto, that cause be shown, on a day designated, why the writs should not issue as prayed, and that a copy of the rule be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, the marshal of the southern district of New York, and the clerk of the circuit court. The Attorney-General, for himself and others, answered the rule by averring that the petition and exhibits do not make out a case in which this court has jurisdiction to order the writs to issue, and that the petitioner is in lawful custody by virtue of the proceedings and sentence mentioned in the exhibits, and the commitment issued thereon.

The power vested in Congress "to establish post-offices nd post-roads" has been practically construed, since the foundation of the government, to authorize not merely the designation of the routes over which the mail shall be carried, and the offices where letters and other documents shall be received to be distributed or forwarded, but the carriage of the mail, and all measures necessary to secure its safe and speedy transit, and the prompt delivery of its contents. The validity of legislation prescribing what should be carried, and its weight and form, and the charges to which it should be subjected, has never been questioned. What should be mailable has varied at different times, changing with the facility of transportation over the post-roads. At one time only letters, newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, not exceeding eight ounces in weight, were carried; afterwards books were added to the list, and now small packages of merchandise, not exceeding a prescribed weight, as well as books and printed matter of all kinds, are transported in the mail. The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded. The difficulty attending the subject arises, not from the want of power in Congress to prescribe regulations as to what shall constitute mail matter, but from the necessity of enforcing them consistently with rights reserved to the people, of far greater importance than the transportation of the mail. In their enforcement a distinction is to be made between different kinds of mail matter; between what is intended to be kept free from inspection, such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage; and what is open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, purposely left in a condition to be examined. Letters and sealed packages of this kind in the mail are as fully guarded from examination and inspection, except as to their outward orm and weight, as if they were retained by the parties orwarding them in their own domicils. The constitutiona. guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be. Whilst in the mail they can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. No law in Congress can place in the hands of officials connected with the postal service any authority to invade the secrecy of letters and such sealed packages in the mail; and all regulations adopted as to mail matter of this kind must be in subordination to the great principle embodied in the fourth amendment of the Constitution.

Nor can any regulations be enforced against the transportation of printed matter in the mail, which is open to examination, so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation the publication would be of little value. If, THEREFORE, printed matter be excluded from the mails, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress.

In 1836, the question as to the power of Congress to exclude publications from the mail was discussed in the Senate and the prevailing opinion of its members, as expressed in debate, was against the existence of the power. President Jackson, in his annual message of the previous year, had referred to the attempted circulation through the mail of inflammatory appeals, addressed to the passions of the slaves, in prints, and in various publications, tending to stimulate them to insurrection, and suggested to Congress the propriety of passing a law prohibiting, under severe penalties, such circulation of "incendiary publications" in the Southern States. In the Senate, that portion of the message was referred to a select committee, of which Mr. Calhoun was chairman; and he made an elaborate report on the subject, in which he contended that it belonged to the states, and not to Congress, to determine what is and what is not calculated to disturb their security, and that to hold otherwise would be fatal to the states; for if Congress might determine what papers were incendiary, and as such prohibit their circulation through the mail, it might also determine what were not incendiary and enforce their circulation. Whilst, therefore, condemning in the strongest terms the circulation of the publications, he insisted that Congress had not the power to pass a law prohibiting their transmission through the mail, on the ground that it would abridge the liberty of the press. "To understand," he said, "more fully the extent of the control which the right of prohibiting circulation through the mail would give to the government over the press, it must be borne in mind that the power of Congress over the post-office and the mail is an exclusive power. It must also be remembered that Congress, in the exercise of this power, may declare any road or navigable water to be a post-road; and that, by the act of 1825, it is provided 'that no stage, or other vehicle which regularly performs trips on a post-road, or on a road parallel to it, shall carry letters.' The same provision extends to packets, boats, or other vessels on navigable waters. Like provision may be extended to newspapers and pamphlets, which if it be admitted that Congress has the right to discriminate in reference to their character, what papers shall or what shall not be transmitted by the mail, would subject the freedom of the press, on all subjects, political, moral, and religious, completely to its will and pleasure. It would, in fact, in some respects, more effectually control the freedom of the press than any sedition law, however severe its penalties." Mr. Calhoun, at the same time, contended that when a state had pronounced certain publications to be dangerous to its peace, and prohibited their circulation, it was the duty of Congress to respect its laws and co-operate in their enforcement; and whilst, therefore, Congress could not prohibit the transmission of the incendiary documents through the mails, it could prevent their delivery by the postmasters in the states where their circulation was forbidden. In the discussion upon the bill reported by him, similar views against the power of Congress were expressed by other senators, who did not concur in the opinion that the delivery of papers could be prevented when their transmission was permitted.

Great reliance is placed by the petitioner upon these views, coming as they did, in many instances, from men alike distinguished as jurists and statesmen. But it is evident that they were founded upon the assumption that it was competent for Congress to prohibit the transportation of newspapers and pamphlets over postal routes in any other way than by mail; and of course it would follow that if, with such a prohibition, the transportation in the mail could also be forbidden, the circulation of the documents would be destroyed and a fatal blow given to the freedom of the press. But we do not think that Congress possesses the power to prevent the transportation in other ways as merchandise, of matter which it excludes from the mails. To give efficiency to its regulations and prevent rival postal systems, it may perhaps prohibit the carriage by others for hire over postal routes of articles which legitimately constitute mail matter in the sense in which those terms were used when the Constitution was adopted—consisting of letters, and of newspapers and pamphlets when not sent as merchandise—but further than this its power of prohibition cannot extend.

Whilst regulations excluding matter from the mail cannot be enforced in a way which would require or permit an examination into letters or sealed packages subject to letter postage, without warrant issued upon oath or affirmation, in the search for prohibited matter, they may be enforced upon competent evidence of their violation obtained in other ways, as from the parties receiving the letters or packages, or from agents depositing them in the post-office, or others cognizant of the facts. And as to objectionable printed matter, which is open to examination, the regulations may be enforced in a similar way, by the imposition of penalties for their violation through the courts; and in some cases, by the direct action of the officers of the postal service. In many instances those officers can act upon their own inspection, and from the nature of the case must act without other proof, as where the postage is not prepaid, or where there is an excess of weight over the amount prescribed, or where the object is exposed and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print. In such cases, no difficulty arises, and no principle is violated, in excluding the prohibited articles or refusing to forward them. The evidence respecting them is seen by every one and is in its nature conclusive.

In excluding various articles from the mail the object of Congress has not been to interfere with the freedom of the press, or with any other rights of the people, but to refuse its facilities for the distribution of matter deemed injurious to the public morals. Thus, by the act of March 3, 1873, Congress declared "that no obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character, or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, nor any article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use or nature, nor any written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, or how, or of whom, or by what means either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made, nor any letter upon the envelope of which, or postal card upon which indecent or scurrilous epithets may be written or printed, shall be carried in the mail, and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, any of the hereinbefore mentioned articles or things, . . . shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall, for every offense, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, or imprisonment at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both, in the discretion of the judge."

All that Congress meant by this act was, that the mail should not be used to transport such corrupting publications and articles, and that any one who attemptod to use it for that purpose should be punished. The same inhibition has been extended to circulars concerning lotteries, institutions which are supposed to have a demoralizing influence upon the people. There is no question before us as to the evidence upon which the conviction of the petitioner was had; nor does it appear whether the envelope in which the prohibited circular was deposited in the mail was sealed or left open for examination. The only question for our determination relates to the constitutionality of the act, and of that we have no doubt.

The commitment of the petitioner to the county jail until his fine is paid was within the discretion of the court under the statute.

As there is an exemplified copy of the record of the petitioner's indictment and conviction accompanying the petition, the merits of his case have been considered at his request upon this application, and as we are of opinion that his imprisonment is legal, no object would be subserved by issuing the writs; they are, therefore, denied.

A Note from B. F. Underwood.

MR. EDITOR: I will commence lecturing again about October 1st, or a little earlier, and am ready now to make engagements for the coming season. I have now on hand some months' work, and wish to hear from all associations or individuals in the various States that want lectures by me during the fall and winter, so that I can lay out my routes advantageously.

I will be here a month, and can be addressed accordingly.

BY W. S. BELL.

The public welfare, the interests of the common people, are now most frequently the questions before Parliaments and Congresses. But as yet they have been treated only in a most superficial manner. Still it is true that the elevation of the lower classes is the great question of our age; and although but imperfectly understood, and consequently but imperfectly treated, yet even this progress inspires the human heart with hopes of a grander fulfillment. It may seem of little moment that the air is full of talk about reforms, while comparatively so little is really achieved in this direction; but even these words of reform will soon become the most potent influences of society. The world now moves as it never moved before. We are upon the threshold of a new age, and it will be of great profit for us to understand the forces which have been at work in the development of society to its present condition.

We can study this question successfully only as we rise above our prejudices—a most difficult if not impossible undertaking—yet by degrees, as our knowledge increases and the intellectual vision widens its range, we may and must rise above many of our inherited beliefs. It is not enough for me that I hold my opinions conscientiously, for this people of all religions do. It is a nobler deed to test our opinions and beliefs than it is to hold them without testing them. We may be scrupulously conscientious and yet mistaken. A man may drink poison, believing it to be milk, but his belief, however conscientiously held, does not change the nature of the poison. His sincerity does not save him; in addition to his conscientiousness he needs knowledge. It is as plain as sunlight that man must know the truth before he can do it. Truth must be sought for on deeper foundations than that of public opinion or sectarian creeds. Men may have whatever opinions they can of the sun, but their opinions do not change one single beam of light which falls from it, nor alter its course the breadth of a hair. So it is with truth; it remains forever the same; but man's opinions of it are constantly changing, improving. This new age is an era of knowledge. A better acquaintance with man and nature puts a larger number of objects under his comprehension and service, and progress is now made by testing everything that claims to be true.

In olden times if a man was suspected of holding wrong notions, the administrators of justice bound him hand and foot and threw him into some deep water; if he sank to the bottom and was drowned, he was acquitted and buried, but if he floated to the top of the water he was condemned, executed, and buried. It mattered not whether he was innocent or guilty, he was buried. This is a specimen of the ancient method of determining what was truth and fact. Another test of righteousness was the ordeal by duel. When two men had a conflict with each other, and betook themselves to a duel, it was decided that the one who killed his antagonist had the right on his side.

Another ordeal for testing the cause of truth was the test of fire. When a person was accused of wrong, he was compelled to hold a burning ball of iron in his hands, or he must walk barefooted upon heated plowshares, or he must put on an iron glove heated red-hot; and if, after undergoing either of these trials, he was not burned, he was judged innocent.

They had what might be called the cross test. If a warfare existed between two persons, they were made to stand up, and extending their arms at full length, the one who could hold out the longest was the innocent party.

"Conflicting opinions arose in the early centuries as to the credibility of the various gospels and epistles which were so plentiful. All seemed to have their partisans and advocates, and the dissensions which grew out of these diverse opinions were sometimes very warm, and the means taken to decide which books were true and which false were at least original. Papias, the Christian father, informs us as to the manner of that selection at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, in the following words: 'This was done by placing all the books under a communion table, and upon the prayers of the Council the inspired books jumped upon the table, while the false ones remained under.' This explanation, which perhaps ought to be satisfactory for all time, seemed to lose its potency after a short season. Many derided the settlement, and priestly wrangling continued as fierce as ever" (World's Sages).

The Bible (Num. v, 24, 28) allows the jealous husband to have poison administered to his wife. If she lived she was innocent; if she died she was guilty. No such law, however, was provided for the jealous wife.

A Letter from Mr. Frothingham.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I observe, with painful surprise, that in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 3d the charge is revived that Mr. F. E. Abbot forged my name to a published circular. I supposed that my letter, printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 20th, had effectually disposed of that calumny. That letter was prompted, not as you surmise, by good nature or amiable kindness of heart, but by a simple love of truth and an earnest desire to put down a gross slander which originated in a misinterpretation of my own words. Let me try once for all to make this matter plain:

My affidavit, a portion of which you quote, had in view one single object, viz., a complete, emphatic, exhaustive disavowal, on my part, of personal responsibility for the statement which reflected injuriously upon Mr. Butts. This was its sole aim and purpose—the only matter in which I had the smallest concern. All beside this was impertinent to the case. In the light of this object all the language of the instrument is to be interpreted. My "protest" against the insertion of those statements was a protest against such an insertion as compromised or implicated me; no other would have been reasonable, or in place. This protest, I need not say, was respected, the paper declaring on its face the sole accountability of the editor of The Index. My "request" that the statement should not be published was unwritten and informal. It conveyed neither prohibition nor remonstrance. Of course it imposed no restraint. Mr. Abbot was perfectly free to disregard it without giving me cause for complaint. In saying that the statements were published without my knowledge, I meant no more than that the form they finally assumed was not submitted to me. I did not ask or expect to see it, as I certainly should have done had I believed myself liable to be held answerable for the words. Such carelessness, pardonable enough under the circumstance, would have been inexcusable and inexplicable on the theory of my responsibility for the statements in question. The changes I suggested in the language of the original draft were intended to put Mr. Abbot on his guard against a possible suit for libel. Had I thought myself exposed to such peril I should have insisted on an entire omission of the language, or, at least, on specific alteration. That Mr. Abbot paid no more heed to my warning proves, to my mind, that his view of the matter agreed with mine, and that he, on his part, was willing to incur the risk. It apparently never occurred to him that the final form of the statement (for which he alone was responsible) should be submitted to me.

Now to sum up my points. I declare

1. Absolutely all I meant by the affidavit was to assert solemnly my entire innocence in regard to the publication of the alleged libelous words.

2. The imputation of any other object than this by a too literal construction of my language makes me chargeable with the extreme baseness of maligning an innocent man, and that man a friend, and at the same time with the monstrous folly of going out of my way to do it.

3. Mr. Abbot was fully authorized to affix my name to the circular substantially as it was published; it being clearly understood that the alleged libelous matter was inserted on his sole responsibility, and, however worded, did not come within the scope of my moral recognition. The circular being in all other respects unobjectionable to me, he took no liberty in affixing my name to it along with the names of other signers who had taken no more pains to verify the assertions respecting Mr. Butts than I had. Though the alleged libelous portion had retained all its original harshness of expression he would have been justified in appending my signature as he did.

This statement is, I hope, intelligible and explicit. In my judgment it explains the language of the affidavit, and reconciles it with the simple truth. Whether it does this in your judgment or not, it gives it clearly out that I frankly and fully absolve Mr. Abbot from the least shadow of the guilt charged upon him. In my belief his conduct throughout the affair was strictly honorable, and never to me seemed otherwise. Yours as a seeker for the truth,

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

REMARKS.—We have no disposition to make extended remarks, or to say a word to misrepresent the facts to the injury of Mr. Abbot or any other person. We should never have called attention to this matter at all had not Mr. Abbot charged us with forgery, and not only reproduced what a man who has proved himself to be an enemy had to say against us, but took the trouble to write to the same party to obtain what additional matter he could to publish against us; we submited to our readers which had really been most guilty of forgery, Mr. Abbot or ourselves. We think we have not been guilty of "calumny" nor "slander." We have simply stated the facts and left our readers to arrive at their own conclusions.

One thing must appear evident to almost every reader, and that is that Mr. Frothingham is now very anxious to screen Mr. Abbot from censure. The latter is very fortunate in having such a friend. Had Mr. D. C. Robbins been one-half as favorable to us, there would have been but slight grounds for Mr. Abbot to asperse us.

The facts of the case seem to be about these: In 1874 Mr. Abbot issued from the office of The Index a circular bearing his own name, Mr. Frothingham's, and several others, which contained a somewhat serious charge against Mr. Asa K. Butts. Mr. Butts felt aggrieved, and insisted that the charge was false. He consulted his attorney, and decided to bring a suit for libel. His attorney assured him he had a good case for damages. Deeming Mr. Frothingham the only person in the number against whom a judgment would be of value, he commenced suit against him only. In answer to Mr. Butts' complaint Mr. Frothingham made a sworn statement in reference to the alleged libel, in which occurred this positive statement:

"And this defendant alleges that he was not the author of said circular, or any part thereof, and that he did not direct nor take any part in the publication of such words, and that this defendant did not compose, sign, or publish concerning the plaintiff, or at all, the said words alleged to be a libel, nor did he authorize, cause, or consent to the composition, signing, or publication thereof, or any part thereof, but, on the contrary, protested against the insertion of said words in said circular, and requested the person proposing said publication [Abbot] not to publish said words, and that the same were published without his knowledge and contrary to his request."

Upon this positive, sworn statement Mr. Butts relinquished his case, which he would not have done had not Mr. Frothingham's affidavit caused him to fully believe that Mr. Abbot attached Mr. Frothingham's name to the libelous charge against Mr. Butts without Mr. Frothingham's authority. Now, when Mr. Frothingham made that sworn statement, he had grounds for saying what he did, or he had not. He either swore to the truth or to its opposite. No one acquainted with the gentleman would for a moment believe it was the latter. We make no decision as to the matter, but leave it with our readers to decide for themselves. The only sensible conclusion to come to, it would seem, is that Mr. Abbot had Mr. Frothingham's general consent to use Mr. F.'s name in appeals in behalf of The Index, but not to libel or malign any individual.

In summing up, Mr. Frothingham says: "Absolutely all I meant by the affidavit was to assert solemnly my entire innocence in regard to the publication of the alleged libelous words." Precisely so. He was entirely innocent of penning or signing the libelous words that Mr. Abbot had used against Mr. Butts; and so he swore and now repeats. It follows, then, that Mr. Abbot used Mr. Frothingham's name to said libelous words without Mr. Frothingham's authority; and Mr. F.'s anxiety to exculpate Mr. Abbot from the act makes no difference in the status of the case; and here we let it rest. We will not point out the inconsistencies of Mr. F.'s statements. This is precisely what we wished to avoid all along.

Below we give Mr. Butts a chance to make his statement. It is but simple justice to him to allow him to be heard.

Extract from a Letter from A. K. Butts.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say, in reference to the letter from Mr. Frothingham that you were kind enough to show me, that it was Mr. Frothingham's sworn statement that he had nothing whatever to do with the inditing, writing, or signing of the circular which was issued from The Index office that induced me to withdraw the suit which I had commenced against him in the Superior Court. In addition to his affidavit, I have in my possession letters (but for the moment mislaid) from Mr. Frothingham, written six or eight weeks after he now says he authorized Mr. Abbot to sign his name to a document unjust and injurious to me, and in which letters he used almost the same words as in the affidavit, to the effect that he had protested against these libels, and never authorized them in any way, but only consented to the use of his name to an appeal for The Index, into which Abbot lugged his spite and animosity against me and his untruthful charge, making the article another thing entirely. When he saw it in print it was too late for correction, though he profoundly regretted it, had no evidence of its truth, and did not believe it. He feared, however, by meddling or changing to make the matter worse instead of better.

It may be pertinent to inquire, Did Mr. F.'s memory fail him then, when the matter was fresh in his mind, or now, after the lapse of years? Or did he play a double game, authorizing Abbot to accuse me of embezzlement one moment and then accuse Abbot of forgery the next in order to placate me? If Mr. Frothingham's lawyer dictated or wrote the affidavit, did he also perform the same part by Mr. F.'s letter?

May I ask, again, if the libelous circular of May 16, 1874, was authorized in the manner that Mr. F. now claims, why did he compel Mr. Abbot to issue, May 12, 1874, a correction in which the falsehood concerning my indebtedness was reduced from $3,926.70 to $1,356.84, and Abbot confessed that he alone was responsible for the whole thing, the others whose names were attached to the circular "having assumed" its correctness. On the present theory of authorization was this dodge necessary?

Is it at all likely that Mr. F. "assumed" that I was a thief, and then went on weeks and weeks in friendly relation, as above mentioned? I think the conviction must be irresistible to the blindest that Mr. F.'s affidavit was strictly true.

In Mr. F.'s present effort to clear Mr. Abbot and to show that the latter was authorized to attach Mr. F.'s name to a libelous charge, it is unfortunate that the statute of limitation prevents my proceeding again against Mr. F. for the libel he now seems willing to father.

There is much more I would like to say in reference to this matter, but I will not now ask you for the space.

Yours for consistency, ASA K. BUTTS.

What I Don't Believe.—No. 36.

321. I do not believe there is that harmony on very many topics and subjects treated upon in the Bible that should be confidently looked for in a book that really came from a divine source—the source of intelligence, truth, and perfection. On the subject of divorce a want of agreement is perceived, some passages read one way and some another. For instance, in the Old Testament, we have this kind of advice: "When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favor in his eyes. . . then let him write her a bill of divorcement and give it in her hand and send her out of his house" (Deut. xxiv, 1); "When thou goest out to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive, and seest among the captives a beautiful woman and hast a desire unto her. . . . then shalt thou bring her home to thy house. . . and after that thou shalt go in unto her and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife. And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then shalt thou let her go whither she will; but thou shalt not sell her at all for money, thou shalt not make merchandise of her" (Deut. xxi, 10–14). In the New Testament is found instruction of a different character, thus: "But I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery" (Matt. v, 32).

322. In some places adultery is sanctioned and in other places it is forbidden, thus: "But all the women that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves" (Num. xxxi, 18); "And the Lord said unto Hosea; Go take thee a wife of whoredoms. . . . Then said the Lord to me, Go yet, love a woman, beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress. . . . So I bought her; . . . and I said unto her, Thou shalt abide for me many days; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man; so will I also be for thee" (Hosea i, 2; iii, 1, 2, 3.) Per contrary we have, "Thou shalt not commit adultery" (Ex. xx, 14). "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge" (Heb. xiii, 4).

323. On the subject of cohabiting with a sister the same unfortunate disagreement is found, thus: "Cursed is he that lieth with his sister the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother" (Deut. xxvii, 22); "And if a man shall take his sister, his father's daughter, or his mother's daughter. . . . it is a wicked thing" (Lev. xx, 17). On the other hand we have: "And Abraham said, . . She is my sister: She is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife" (Gen. xx, 10, 12); "And God said unto Abraham, its for Sarah, thy wife. . . . I will bless her and give thee a son also of her" (Gen. xvii, 15, 16).

324. On the matter of marrying a brother's widow there is no better harmony of sentiment. Thus we have on the one hand: "If brethren dwell together and one of them die and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger; her husband's brother shall go in unto her and take her to be his wife" (Deut. xxv, 5). To the opposite of this we have: "If a man shall take his brother's wife it is an unclean thing; . . . They shall be childless" (Lev. xx, 21).

325. In the same way hatred to kindred is both enjoined and condemned: First, "If any man come unto me, and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). Second, "Honor thy father and mother" (Eph. vi, 2). "Husbands love your wives . . . For no man ever yet hated his own flesh" (Eph. v, 25, 29). "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer" (John iii, 15).

326. On the subject of the use of intoxicating beverages a decided contradiction is easily found. On the one hand we have: "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish and wine to those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more" (Prov, xxxi, 6, 7); "And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink" (Deut. xiv, 26); "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities" (1 Tim. v, 23); "Wine that maketh glad the heart of man" (Ps. civ, 15); "Wine which cheereth the God and man" (Judges ix, 13). While the following are quite of a different character: "Wine is a mocker, and strong drink is raging and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise" (Prov. xx, 1); "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red; when it giveth its color in the cup. . . . At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder" (Prov. xxiii, 31, 32). What would be thought of our temperance lecturers if they taught in such a contradictory manner.

327. On the subject of obeying rulers is found a great disagreement of instruction; thus, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For rulers are not a terror to good work, but to evil. . . For this cause pay ye tribute also; for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this thing" (Rom. xiii, 1, 2, 3, 6); "The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat; all, therefore, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do" (Matt. xxiii, 2, 3); "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governers, as unto them that are sent of him for the punishment of evil-doers" (1 Pet. ii, 13, 14); "I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment. . . . Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing" (Eccl. viii, 2–5). Of the opposite character we have such passages as these: "But the midwives feared God and did not as the king of Egypt commanded them. . . . Therefore God dealt well with the midwives" (Ex. i, 17, 20); "Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego answered and said, . . Be it known unto thee, O King, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up" (Dan. iii, 16, 18). "Wherefore king Darius signed the writing and the decree. . . that whoever shall ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days . . he shall be cast into the den of lions. . . . Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went unto the house, . . . kneeled upon his knees three times a day and prayed . . . as he did in aforetime" (Dan. vi, 7, 9, 10); "And the rulers were gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ. For of a truth, against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together" (Acts iv, 26, 27); "Beware of the scribes which love to go in long clothing, and love salutations in the market places, and the chief seats in the synagogues. . . . They shall receive greater damnation" (Mark xii, 38, 39, 40). "And Herod, with his men of war, set him at naught, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate. . . . And Pilate gave sentence. . . and when they were come to a place which is called Calvary, then they crucified him. . . . And the people stood by beholding. And the rulers with them derided him" (Luke xxiii, 24, 33, 35).

328. On the matter of woman's rights the same kind of disagreement exists. On the one hand we have: "And thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16); "I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence" (1 Tim. ii, 12); "They are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law" (1 Cor. xiv, 34); "Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord" (1 Pet. iii, 6). On the other hand we have such passages as these: "And Deborah, a propheteśs, . . . judged Israel at the time. . . . And Deborah said unto Barak, Up, for this is the day in which the Lord discomfited Sisera into thy hand. . . . And the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword before Barak" (Judges iv, 4, 14, 15); "The inhabitants of the villages ceased; they ceased in Israel, until that I, Deborah, arose, that I arose a mother in Israel" (Judges v, 7); "And on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days my spirit, and they shall prophesy" (Acts xi, 18); "And the same man had four daughters, virgins, whcih did prophesy" (Acts xxi, 9).

329. Relative to obedience to masters, these discrepancies are found: On one side, "Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh. . . . And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord" (Col. iii, 22, 23); "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward" (1 Pet. ii, 18). On the other side we have: "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve" (Matt. iv, 10); "Be ye not the servants of men" (1 Cor. vii, 23); "Neither be ye called masters; for one is your master, even Christ" (Matt. xxiii, 10).

330. As to pardon for a certain class of sins, the following pointed contradiction is found: "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness" (Mark iii, 29); "Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come" (Matt. xii, 32). In opposition to this we have: "And by him all that believe are justified from all things" (Acts xiii, 39).

Ho for Watkins!

Before this issue reaches our readers we doubtless shall have arrived at Watkins, ready to take by the hand hundreds, and we hope thousands, of kind friends from various parts of the country. We anticipate a pleasant reunion with the sterling friends of truth and progress. There will undoubtedly be much good speaking that will prove highly interesting to hear or to read. If we decide to have the speeches reported and printed it will be a valuable volume. But to justify the expense a goodly number should be ordered in advance. Let all those who want a copy of the proceedings of the Watkins Convention, containing the speeches, addresses, etc., send in their orders at once. A good many ought to be wanted.

If we can find time we will send in from the grounds some accounts of the meeting as it progresses, that the same may be given our readers next week.

T. B. Wakeman's Faneuil Hall Speech.

At the urgent request of several persons we have issued this clear and able argument in tract or pamphlet form for the convenience of general distribution. The more we read and think upon the position taken by Mr. Wakeman, the more we are convinced that he is correct. He laid down, in that memorable speech, such a platform as every Liberal, every lover of liberty, can safely and squarely stand upon in all time. It will not do for Liberals to quail before the enemy or the disapproval of Mrs. Grundy, or, on the specious plea of "respectability," to surrender any of the rights and liberties guaranteed to us by the Constitution, with its Bill of Rights, as well as by the very genius of American freedom. The man who to-day advocates the relinquishment of the heaven-born rights which we inherit with our very life, and favors a censorship to decide for us what we may think, what we may read, what we may print, what we may send through the mail, what we may teach our children, is not a Liberal in the broad and grand sense of the word, and is truckling to the enemy who is striving to rob us of our dearest rights. Liberals should be bold enough to take the right position in this matter and not yield an inch for policy, from cowardice, or from a false sense of respectability. We must guard with jealous care the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech. These rights must not be bartered away to placate our orthodox opponents nor to avoid their enmity. We must boldly stand up for the right in every instance, even though the decision of the Supreme Court is temporarily in opposition to it. Mr. Wakeman shows that in several instances since the foundation of our Government the highest court has been opposed to justice and to the best interests of the people. It is so at the present time; and the lovers of liberty have only to be firm in their opposition to judicial tyranny and in the support of true justice and right, and ultimately we must triumph. Let all the lovers of liberty and justice rally upon the broad and true ground laid down by Mr. Wakeman.

The pamphlet will be sold at 5 cents each or 40 cents per dozen, including postage. Many thousands of them should be circulated over the conntry.

THOSE into whose hands this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER may fall are informed that the paper only costs three dollars per year, including postage, or 25 cents per month. It is sent to trial subscribers, three months for 25 cents. We are anxious to have our list augment materially.

A copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year, and a copy of either of the Truth Seeker Library, "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," or "Thomas Paine's Great Works," including his life, Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," or "The Champions of the Church," sent post-paid for five dollars.

VOLTAIRE'S CENTENARY.—In our next we will commence the publication of a work by this title by Mr. Gastineau, of Paris, translated especially for our publication. It contains fuller details and descriptions of the life and writings of the great French philosopher than our readers have hitherto seen. The work has had a large sale in France, and we hope it will be equally popular in this country.

THE UNKNOWN GOD. A lecture, by J. W. Stillman. The author has presented us with a copy of this pamphlet. It is gotten up in fine style, and is decidedly a good lecture on the God subject. Mr. Stillman is a thorough student, and has embodied in his lecture the most advanced thoughts of the day. Price 15 cents by mail. For sale at this office.

AMBERLEY'S LIFE OF JESUS.—Such a value has been attached to Amberley's Life of Jesus that we have been induced to issue it separately. We have it put up in cloth and also in paper covers. Sent by mail at 35 and 60 cents. It is a fine little volume. Who wants one?

THE SPIRITUAL OFFERING.—We notice with pleasure the enlargement to sixty-four pages of this beautiful and ably-conducted monthly, which is now wholly under the editorial management of Nettie Pease Fox, Mr. D. M. Fox having been called to work in another direction. From an editorial note in The Offering we take these words: "We do not positively promise more than fifty-six pages, but if all who have written words of approval and encouragement will each send one new subscriber, every issue hereafter shall contain sixty-four pages, and other desirable improvements shall be made. . . . The times are unfavorable for the success of any enterprise; nevertheless, we are working hard and hopefully with hand and brain to publish a first-class Liberal magazine." This monthly richly merits Liberal patronage, and we hope many will respond acceptably to the appeal of the talented editress. Address Spiritual Offering, Springfield, Mo.

THE "copy" for "The Darwins" having miscarried in the mails, we are compelled to omit the usual installment of this interesting story. Hereafter we hope to be able to furnish it continuously to our readers.

THE NATIONAL GREENBACK LABOR SONGSTER.—Just the thing for the coming campaign. Just issued at this office. Several pieces of original music. Price only 10 cents; liberal reduction by the quantity. Let every Greenbacker order a copy.

More about Toldoth Jeschu.

BY SCHOLASTICUS.

Fifty years ago the Rev. John Pye Smith, in a disputation with Robert Taylor, cited the "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" as a crowning proof of the real existence of Jesus Christ (Syntagma, p. 136). Seven years ago J. M. Peebles, in a work entitled "Jesus: Myth, Man, or God," adduced in support of a historical Jesus what he calls "That learned work by contemporary Jews, The Toldoth Jesu." Had either of these champions of Christianity known the true contents of that work, would they have been so ready to adduce it? The learned Dr. Lardner knew what it was, and in his eager desire for Christian evidences rejected it with disdain.

"Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" is indeed a "big gun," probably the biggest ever aimed at Christianity—and it is not going to burst.*

It is quite likely that the evangelists were acquainted with various versions of this story (Luke, i, 1), and therefore when Irenæus and his fellow-bishops redacted the four gospels, about the year 180, all such tell-tales were suppressed and destroyed.

For many years we have been seeking Jesus, historically, but not a scrap of proof could we find of his existence or of any of his twelve apostles in the first century. It is certain that Paul knew none of them. His James, Cephas, and John do not answer to any of the Galilean apostles. Wherever Petros occurs in the Greek Testament it is a forgery; it should always be Kephas. The Greek language never prevailed in the interior of Palestine, therefore there never was any apostle Petros.

The book of Acts, as we have already said in our notes, affords the only date by which Paul is assigned to the middle of the first century. But there is little or no historical truth in that book. Given Alexander Selkirk, and a good novelist produces "Robinson Crusoe." Given Paul's epistles, and a priestly blockhead writes the story of Acts.

In "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" we find a Simeon Kepha, who died about the middle of the first century before the Christian era, and he answers as well to the Simon Kepha, alias Petros, of the gospels as Selkirk answers to Crusoe.

Again, the only clue to the time when Paul flourished is in 2 Cor. xi, 32, where Aretas is mentioned as king of Damascus, and that was in the lifetime of our Kepha, nearly a century before Christ. It is true there were other later kings of Arabia Petræ named Aretas; but it is preposterous to suppose that any of them ever took possession of Damascus after 63 B. C., when it became a part of the Roman Empire.

Those who make light of the denial of the historical existence of Jesus are not aware how slender the support has become. Paul and Tacitus are the only remaining substantial props, and these are now fast giving way. Robert Taylor has demonstrated that the passage in Tacitus about the Christians is a forgery. And now a writer for the Edinburgh Review, named Crosses, professes to be able to prove that the whole of the Annals of Tacitus were forged by Poggio Bracciolini, who died a few years before the discovery of the first copy in 1468.

In addition to the other evidences of the spuriousness of the passage in question, we here submit a proof of its plagiarism in part from an elegant Christian writer about the year 400. Pseudo Tacitus, after speaking of the "Christians" who "had their denomination from Christus, who in the reign of Tiberius was put to death as a criminal by the procurator Pontius Pilate," goes on to describe their punishment by Nero in words which exactly agree with those of Sulpicius Severus, as follows:

PSEUDO TACITUS, A. D. 1459.	SULPICIUS SEVERUS, A. D. 400.
Et pereuntibus addita ludibria, ut ferarum tergis contecti, laniatu canum interirent, aut crucibus affixi, aut flammandi, atque ubi defecisset dies, in usum nocturni luminis urerentur.†	Quin et novæ mortes excogitatæ, ut ferarum tergis contecti, laniatu canum interirent. Multi crucibus affixi, aut flamma usti. Plerique in id reservati, ut, cum defecisset dies, in usum nocturni luminis urerentur.

Out of twenty-five consecutive Latin words in Pseudo Tacitus, eighteen are identical and consecutive in Severus. One passage therefore is certainly plagiarized from the other. Now, does any rational man believe that the Christian writer Severus would have failed to cite his authority for so important a passage if the Annals of Tacitus were then existing and contained it?

* "Custos Morum" wants more proof of its antiquity. Let him read again our introductory essay and critical notes, now republished in a pamphlet with the following title:

ספר תולדות ישו

FIRST ENGLISH TRANSLATION of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about the year 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrim stoned to death and hanged, on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

Death of Simon Kepha on a tower in the city of the Nazarenes about 39 B. C. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros."

Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha.

† Translation of Pseudo Tacitus: And derision was added to their executions. Some were tied up in the skins of wild beasts that they might be worried to death by dogs. Some were crucified, others were burned to death, being set up as lights in the night time.

A Polish Jew informs us that he used to read the "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" in Hebrew when a boy, and that it was considered to be an old Chaldean story. At all events its antiquity cannot be disproved. When Prof. Wagenseil brought it to light in 1681, he published a long and tedious "Refutation" in Latin interspersed with Greek and Hebrew. His argument is rather against its truthfulness than its antiquity. He points out discrepancies between it and the Talmud. These we concede. Undoubtedly the legend varies in the different versions, just as it does in the gospels, and we will not undertake to harmonize the discords. How much of the story is true and how much false nobody can guess; but "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" reads as much if not more like a historical narrative than any of the four gospels, and it is far more faithful in its chronology.

Doubtless it contains interpolations, like all other ancient documents of its kind. It is not likely that the fraud about Peter in Rome antedates the year 180. But if, as some maintain, the substance of the Mishna existed before the second century, and even before the first, then it is probable that the story of the Jewish Jesus, the son of Mary and Pandera, antedates not only our gospels but the time of Pontius Pilate.

Fellow Freethinkers, this big old gun has been spiked and buried for 1600 years. Two centuries ago Wagenseil discovered it and dug it up, but only to condemn and bury it again, hoping that would be the last of it. But now Gen. Scholasticus has re-exhumed, unspiked, and mounted it. The metal is sound, the cannon won't explode, and its shot will penetrate and blow up the magazine of Christianity. Selah.

More Light on the "Obscenity" Question.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I cannot but hold in contempt (not unmingled with pity) those pretended Liberals who hide their light under a bushel; weak-kneed ones, dragged along in the rear of the Car of Progress, in trembling fear of Mrs. Grundy. I admire the man or woman who, looking forward, anticipates coming reforms, or, in other words, is ahead of the times, as Voltaire, Paine, and other like true heroes were ahead of their times; but I do despise the man who is afraid to advocate what he believes to be truth, merely because it may not be just now "respectable." There is too much Abbotism among Liberals, too much meaningless cant about "purity," too much dogmatism about "obscenity." Now, many—yes, most—of your correspondents denounce Comstock and his villainous work, but qualify the denunciation with: "I am in favor of a law restraining the circulation of obscenity through the mails." This sop thrown to "respectability" is a pretty sure symptom of Abbotism.

I, for one, am opposed to all laws that exclude literature from the mails; I denounce any law or any government that pretends to tell me, at sixty years of age, what I may read and what I may not. I emphatically declare that no man shall set himself up as a "little god with a bell on" to tell me what is obscene and what is not; and I thank heaven for a due sense of humility which prevents me from setting myself up as dictator to tell other people what is obscene and what is not. Obscenity, as I view it, is only another name for bad taste and vulgarity, and no more a matter for legislation to meddle with than are bad taste and vulgarity. It is a mere matter of opinion as to what is obscene or vulgar or in bad taste, and any law that prescribes opinions and makes one lawful and another unlawful ought to be totally abolished. I agree with Seward Mitchell when he says: "If we admit the right of legislators to prohibit the sending of any kind of reading matter through the mails, we are floored at once."

The pretentious defenders of "purity" (whatever that means) overshoot their mark, for the more they try to prohibit what they in their immaculateness pronounce "obscene" and "nasty," the more it will be sought after, and those who seek will find, in spite of all law; and I am not prepared to say they shall not seek and find and read, for it is none of my business what my neighbor reads, and none of his business what I read.

Congress cannot make laws for children. Its business is to make laws for adults, and parents must take care of their own children. Fathers and mothers may judge what books and papers their own children may read; but when Anthony Comstock, or Anthony Abbot, or any other Anthony, undertakes to get into my family and dictate to me what books my children shall read, I declare war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt!

In my opinion, one of the most important duties of a father is to inform his children, as soon as they are old enough to fully understand him, as much as he can on this subject; to furnish them reliable books treating on it, warning them against pitfalls, and teaching them how to take care of themselves. And in order that parents may be able to perform this duty well, the means by which they may inform themselves should be increased, and books from which they may select should be multiplied, and, above all, we should avoid making such books and information "forbidden fruit"—something to be stolen under cover of darkness, and whispered only in hay-lofts and out-of-the-way places. But when I advocate the multiplication of such literature, remember that I do not advocate alone the multiplication of any particular kind of books or doctrines or beliefs on the subject. Let everybody who has information to publish publish it; open the mails alike to all, and then let people buy just which books, etc., they like best. Such liberty will let in a flood of light, and I have no fear that the public will know too much on the subject—no fear that public morals will suffer from too much enlightenment. There has been too much darkness and mystery thrown around this sexual question. The age demands more light and will have it.

Laws against "obscenity" (undefinable thing) are useless, and if not repealed will ere long become a dead letter on our statute books, as have our Sunday laws in Connecticut. We get along very well without the old Sunday laws, and we shall not degenerate into a race of prostitutes (male and female) if we have no obscenity laws. The world does and will move, in spite of all laws to the contrary.

To all Truth Seekers and Truth Lovers.

DEAR FRIENDS: For all who love truth, and seek her with pure hearts and loving spirits, I call friends, and I like to share with such as these all good things that fall to my lot, so that we may rejoice in gladness one with another. One of these pleasant treats has just come to our home in Dixie, in the form of a nice book from that inexhaustible fountain of wisdom's choicest lore, THE TRUTH SEEKER office. It is called "Chronicles of Simon Christianus, and his Wonderful Adventures in the Land of Cosmos." And truly the adventures are wonderful indeed. Those of Bunyan's "Pilgrim" are nothing when compared with the marvelous, wild, and weird ones of Simon. The author was very happy in his choice of names, among which are that of a babbler called "Praisethelord" (a preacher) "Blunt," who gave plain answers to plain common sense questions, Fearohell, Graceogod, Cannotbedamned, and Godlyguts, all of whom play parts appropriate to their significant cognomens.

The chapter of the "House of Relics" is very entertaining, especially the part that tells of the hair that "was not on the head," of the bald, superanuated old prophet who was such a saving (?) means of grace to the crowd of little innocents by having them devoured by she-bears.

The description of the "Forest of Evidences," which stood in the way of the car of Freethought, in which such havoc was made by the giants (Infidels) with their cudgels cut from the noble and beauteous trees called Geologos, Astronomos, Chronologos, Cosmogonos, Ethnologos, etc., is well done and true to life.

The picture of the great and beautiful plain of science is really an enchanting one, and this plain would be a delightful dwelling place far truth-lovers or humanitarians, though the presence of the malignant dragons of Ignorance, Avarice, Fraud, Religion, and False Education kept it from being exactly a perfect paradise—that mythical realm so impossible of realization ever or anywhere. These dragons kept many from gathering of the great abundance of the fruit of the vast banyan-tree of natural wealth. The whole volume is as interesting as a novel, and as full of exciting incidents. To appreciate it, one needs to have it all at once. Even we who have read it chapter by chapter in THE TRUTH SEEKER will enjoy a second perusal better than the first, because we shall understand it better, and can better keep the thread of the narrative. I don't see how D. M. Bennett—the ever busy and ever blessed—is able to furnish for us so vast a quantity of the gems of literature, and all of them so neatly and perfectly gotten up; the print so clear and plain that one's eyes utter thanks as they feel how little a strain is put upon them while they drink in the words of wisdom.

Speaking of the dragons, the author says: "Despite their utmost malice, the car still went on in ever widening circles, and the forest of evidences and the vale of superstition were in its way, but the resistless car went on, slicing off great portions of the forest and the vale upon every journey, and the giants cast out the seeds, and the seeds took root and weakened the dragons. And the car goeth on even to this day, and the forest and the vale are doomed, and the dragons, though still potent for evil, are losing strength day by day, and soon may their end come. Selah."

Respectfully, ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

The Churches.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Sometimes it is my misfortune to witness a Sunday in town. Crowds of people flocking to church—some with face long as a horse's; some with mouth puckered precisely as though trying to whistle; some with a "godly look;" and some looking dejected. Meanwhile the bells speak out, differing in tone as the creeds differ in tenor, but all telling that human progress is very slow. In the lapse of an hour or two the same crowd return from the monotonous routine of "going to church," and without obtaining one additional idea, new or true, and so congratulate themselves on having done their duty. In this little town are five churches. On an average, two sermons are delivered in each church—that is, ten addresses per week; five hundred and twenty per annum, in one little town. And so in proportion throughout the country. And for what? To follow fashion; to propagate bad history, bad astronomy, bad chronology, bad morals, bad everything. Life is too short for fourteen per cent of it to be thus wasted. It seems a pity that at least one public roof cannot be afforded in each town where history shall not be perverted; where facts that are good and true shall be named; where mercy and good morals can be inculcated; where effete superstition shall be excluded. The times are hard, and money scarce; but one-tenth the expenditure now made to uphold disgraceful superstition would greatly push on the cause of enlightened truth, and would either buy out an old superannuated church in each town, or build a new one.

ELDER GOODLY'S GREAT SERMON.

ZION HIL, N. J., Aug. 20, 1878.

DEER MR. EDITUR: I must rite yu this time about the grate surmun which Elder Goodly delivered to us on Sundy the 19th inst. I kant sa that the Elder iz grate on all okkashuns, or that evry effort he makes iz worthy ov being spoken ov in a komplimentary manner. If we get wun good surmun in a munth we ar willing to swallo the thre komonplase affares that he givs us on the other Sundys, and try to feel, to, that the Elder pritty neerly urns the 800 dollers we pa him for hiz exhaustiv labers for twelv munths. We do not pa him enything like what yure sity klerjymen get, and he toils the hole yeer round with no thre munths vakashun during the hot wether. I hav often thawt that I wood not like to be wun ov a kongregashun to pa a kulcherd klerjyman 5,000 dollers a yeer to brake the bred ov life to us for 12 munths, and then to hav him awa wun forth ov the time without eny dedukshun being made in hiz salery. When I imploy a hired man to work on my farm for a yeer at 18 dollers a munth, I no I shood very strongly objekt to having him awa threw June, July, and August, and to hav to pa him, to, for skilarking and perambulating over the kuntry fishing, and hunting, and going in swimming. And I must konfes that I kant se why a preecher aint just az much obligated to work 12 munths for a yeer az he hoo kuts kord-wood, moze ha, and digs potatoze. The rule seems to prevale nowadaze that the more a man gets the les he duz, and I'm afrade our preechers ar very willing to follo it. Thoze that get 5,000, 10,000, or 20,000 dollers a yeer take the longest vakashuns, meny ov them taking plezure trips to Urope with thare pa going on just the same az tho tha wer at home working to save soles.

It duz seem to me that sum ov our gratest or hiest prised preechers do not kare so much about saving soles from the flames ov hel az tha do about getting big salerys, having fashunabul kongregashuns, living in fine houzes, moving in uper sirkuls, taking thare plezent vacashuns, and all that. I am reely afrade that the sheperds ov Kriste ar not just what tha aut to be. I do not beleev thare master ever akted in the wa that thousands ov thare pretended folloers now do, and I kan't think it iz rite. I hav my feers that relijun iz getting to much an affare ov fashun.

But I am wandring from my subjekt. I must return to tel yu about our Elder Goodly's surmun. It waz indeed very striking, and made us feel our dependans upon the goodnes and mersy ov God and to stand in feer ov hiz power. I kood tel by the expreshun ov the Elder's kountenans on Sundy morning that we wer to hav a diskorse ov unusyal solemnity; he lookt so grave and solum and az tho the welbeing ov the hul wurld waz resting on him. The him he gave out waz more than usyally impresiv. Wun vers reeds this wa:

> "Adore and tremble, for our God
> Iz a konsuming fire;
> Hiz jelus ire with rath inflame,
> And raze hiz venjens hier,
> Almity venjens, how it burnz!
> How brite hiz fury gloze!
> Vast magazeens ov plages and storms
> Li trezurd for hiz foze."

The Elder's opening prare waz ov grate solemnity. He beseeched God to kontinu hiz mersy a litel longer, and not strike us all to the erth. He sed he nu our sins wer so blak that we dezervd to be thrust into hel without a moment's dela; that we had sind awa our da and kalling, and that if ful justis waz dun us, we wood now be rithing in the torments ov hel and damnashun. But he begd God in hiz everlasting goodnes and luv to spare us yet a litel while and giv us won more chanse to repent and kum to Jezus, and he told God that thoze who did not giv up thare evil waze and gathur into the fold ov Zion dezervd to burn in that everlasting fire and torment prepard for the devil and hiz anjels before the foundashun ov the wurld.

I tel yu, Mr. Editur, such a prare iz kalkulated to mak a man feel very meen and insignifikant.

I kan't forget the Elder's text. It waz from the thurtieth chaptur ov Izaah, the last haf ov which chaptur he red to us in the most solum voise. For hiz text he took the 27th and the 30th verses, which red az folloze: "Behold, the name ov the Lord cometh from afar, burning with hiz anger, and the burden tharof iz hevy; hiz lips ar ful ov indignashun, and hiz tung az a devouring fire. And the Lord shal kauz hiz glorius voise to be herd, and shal sho the litening down ov hiz arm, and the indignashun ov hiz angur, and with the flame ov a devouring fire, with scattering and tempest and halestones."

When the Elder had sed the text over for the thurd time in the most impresiv manner, he struck out with theze wurds: "My dying frends, the Lord iz amung us, and he haz kum in hiz rath and feerse angur. Let us bow our heds in feer and with trembling that he ma not in hiz firy venjens strike us to the erth. He haz ov late vizited meny plases in our kuntry, and haz shone konklusively that hiz angur haz not bekum extinkt. Among the plases that he haz pade speshul attenshun to iz Walingford in the State ov Konneticut, whare dwelt meny mechaniks and labering peeple. Az hunderds ov theze wer returning from thare daze toil, on the evening ov the 9th ov this munth, God's angur waz pored on them at a feerful rate. Hiz thunders and hiz litenings, hiz rane, hiz hale, and hiz furius winds did beet upon them az skarsely ever man witnest before. Men and wimmen wer dasht to the erth, and more than a skore and a haf ov them wer killd outrite, or so badly injurd that tha kannot long survive. Over 40 houzes wer demolisht kwiker than yu kood kount 10, and amung the rest waz a church—but by the by it waz a Katholik church—and that makes it kleer to my mind that God haz very litel respekt for the Katholiks, not rekognizing them az his tru children. Sum familys ov from 4 to 8 pursons wer all swept awa like chaf before the wind, and a vast amount ov property waz hully destroid.

"This surkumstanse, my frends, proves to my mind that God stil retanes hiz old karakter ov jenuine rath and fury. Thare ar sum week-need Kristyans who tawk about God being a God ov luv, and kumpashun, and mersy, and long-suffering, and kindness, but let me tel yu, mi heerers, that he iz a God ov venjens, and rath, and anger, and fury. He iz the same God now that he waz in daze ov old when hiz peeple, the children ov Izrel, used to vex him and trubul him so az to make him angry and furious with feerse rath.

"If yu wil reed yure Bible yu wil se that it waz no unkommon thing in thoze daze for him to sla 50 and 70 thouzand ov hiz peepel on a singul okkashun, and for no grate offense eether. And on wun da he aloud 500 thousand ov hiz own children to be slane. Thare kan be no grater mistake made than to suppoze that he iz never angry, never rathful, and never vindiktiv and kruel. The oppozit iz the truth.

"If, my fello sinners, yu wil look over the pages ov God's grate book yu wil perseev by hiz own akkount that he abounds in the teribul and furius. Did not Jeremiah in hiz addres to Jehovah sa, 'Thou hast kuvured us with angur, and persekuted us; thou hast slane, thou hast not pited?' Did not the profit Nahum sa, 'God iz jelus, and the Lord revenjeth, and iz furius; the Lord wil take venjens on hiz adversarys, and he rezerveth rath for hiz enemys. The Lord hath hiz wa in the whurlwind and in the storm, and the klouds ar the dust ov hiz feet. The mountins kwake at him, and the hils melt, and the erth iz burnt at hiz prezense, ya, the wurld and all that dwel tharein. Hoo kan stand before hiz indignashun, and hoo kan abide in the feersness ov hiz angur? hiz fury iz pored out like fire, and the roks ar thrown down by him?" Threw hiz favurit profit Izaah he agen sed, 'The Lord shall go forth az a mity man; he shal stir up jelusy like a man ov war; he shal kry, ya, rore; he shal prevale agenst hiz enemys. . . . Now wil I kry like a travailing woman; I wil destroy and devour at wunse. I wil make waste mountins and hils, and dry up all thare erbs; and I wil make the rivers ilands, and I wil dry up the pools.'

"By Ezekel, anuthur favurit profit he sed, 'Thus shal mine angur be akomplished and I will kauz my fury to rest upon them; tha shal no that I the Lord hav spoken it in my zeel, when I hav akomplished my fury in them.' By the mouth ov Mozes, az rekorded in Duteronomy xxxii, 39 and 42, the God of Izrel sed, 'I kil and I make alive; I woond, and I heel, neether iz thare eny that kan deliver out ov my hand. I whet my glittering sord and my hand take hold on jujment, I wil render venjens to mine enemys, and wil reward them that hate me. I wil make mine arroze drunk with blud, and my sord shal devour flesh.' Agen he sez in the same chapter, 'Tha hav moved me to jelusy, tha hav provoked me to angur, and I wil move them to jelusy; I wil provoke them to angur, for a fire iz kindled in mine angur, and shal burn unto the loest hel and shal konsume the erth with her inkrees, and set on fire the foundashuns ov the mountins. I wil heep mischeefs upon them, I wil spend my arroze upon them. Tha shal be burnt with hunger and devoured with burning heet and with bitter destrukshun; I wil also send the teeth ov beests upon them with the poizen ov the serpents ov the dust. The sord without and the terror within shal destroy both the yung man and the virjin, the sukling also, with the man ov gra harze.'

"By the mouth ov the wize man Solomon, did he not sa, 'I wil laf at yure kalamity; I wil mok when yure feer kumeth. When yure feer kumeth az desolashun, and yure destrukshun kumeth az a whurlwind; when distress and angwish kumeth upon yu—then shal tha kall upon me, but I wil not anser; tha shal seek me erly, but tha shal not find me?'

"By hiz profit Jerymire he sed, 'I myself wil fite agenst yu with an outstretcht hand, and with a strong arm, even in angur, and in fury, and in grate rath. And I wil smite the inhabitants ov the city, both man and beest; tha shal di ov a grate pestilence.' And again, 'Behold, I frame evil agenst yu and devize a devise agenst yu.' 'I wil make thare land desolate and a perpetual hissing; every wun that passeth thereby shal be astonisht, and wag hiz hed. I wil skatter them as with an eest wind before an enemy.'

"Thus, my heerers, I mite kontinue to reed passej after passej to yu, during the entire morning, to sho yu that the tru karakter ov the God ov Izrel iz wun ov rath and angur and fury. He ma sumtimes be luving and kind, but kwite az much ov the time iz he feerse and furius. To hiz venjens there iz no end. So long az men ar wiked and sinful, so long wil God be angry with them every da, az he haz sed. O my peeple! when wil men seese to make the Lord angry and lern not to vex and aggravate him da after da? But if tha wil kontinu to angur him, so long must tha kontinue to tak the konsekwenses in storms, in whurlwinds, and tornadus; in pestilense, diseze, aud deth.

"Thare ar men who wil tel yu that all theze ar produsd by nacheral kauses, but let me ashure yu, my frends, that tha ar the work ov the hand ov God. He duz it, and nobody else, and it iz no power but him. He kauzes evry spel ov siknes which men hav, and he takes evry life that iz ended. No wun kan be born into the wurld without hiz help, and no wun kan get out ov the wurld unles he takes them out. God duz evrything that takes plase. It iz he that sends the kolera, the yelo-fevur, the plage and pestilense. It iz he that sends the famine, the derth, and the faleyur ov krops.

"He duz all this, my frends, bekauz he iz angry, and it iz men that make him angry, and men ar to blame for all the evil that happens. If men wil be proud, if tha wil forget God, if they wil not beleev hiz wurd, if tha wil be Infidels, if tha wil make lite ov sakred things, if tha wil not heed the vois ov the holy shepperds that proklame on the walls ov Zion, and if tha withhold thare support from the fatheful shepperds, then yu must expekt storms and tempests and the most feerse destrukshun in all forms. Then ma yu expekt kolera, yello-fevur, smal-pox, fevur and agu, and evry form ov sicknes and pestilense. God wil be feerd, and he wil hav men to no that he iz the God that rules the erth. I hav no dout, my frends, that it iz the grate unbeleef and disobejens ov the peepul that makes God so angry this yeer. The Infidels ar the kauz ov it all. If all unbeleef and sin kood be wiped awa then God wood be mersiful and kind; then he wood sho hiz anger no more in storms and syklones. My frends, yu must lern to feer God, even if yu kannot fully luv him. He wil be feerd, he wil be obade."

Thus the good Elder kontinude hiz grate surmun for an our and a haf, but az my letter iz to long now, I must giv yu no more. I must sa, however, that it made a powerful impreshun upon the minds ov thoze prezent, and evrybody waz afrade that we mite hav a hurrikane visit us and kil us and blo down our houzes. I pra not.

Kaptin Smith waz at our church and herd the grate surmun. He kalled over to see us in the evening, and I askt him what he thawt ov it, and he shokt me when he sed he konsidered it very week and rong to charge such things upon a kind and mersiful fathur. He sed he did not beleev he kood ever luv such a God as the Elder had piktured out. Suzan joined in and sed thoze wer just her sentiments. She simply thawt such a God wood be dredful and unluvabul. "For my part," sed she, "I wood much sooner prefer 'Old Splitfoot,' who rites for THE TRUTH SEEKER, than a God who kood get into such a furius pashun and kil and destroy at such a feerful rate; I kood not luv such a God if he sent me to hel a milyun yeers for it." Her muther skolded her and told her she aut to be ashamed, and a deeken's dawter, to, to tawk so blasfemusly. "That," sez her muther, "kums from reeding THE TRUTH SEEKER." I tride to thro oil on the trubbled waters, and sed that thare waz a grate mistery in godliness.

Deer frend, I bid yu good by til next time,

JOEL SKIDMORE.

Obituary.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I have just been informed of the death of Charles Hastings, of Carlisle, Iowa, who died a few weeks ago, after a prolonged and painful illness. He was a clear, honest, and outspoken disciple of Liberalism, and died happy and peaceful under his convictions, retaining full possession of his faculties to the last moments. During his sickness his bed was visited by clergymen, in the hopes of obtaining from him something that might be construed into a recantation of his views, and be used as capital in their crusade against those who hold Rational instead of theological views of life and its destiny. Mr. Hastings approached death "as one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams," comforting his relatives and friends with kind words, assuring them in their sorrow that death is the fate of all and the inevitable course of nature. He expressed himself as happy that his mind was relieved of all the theological horrors of death, and regretted with the deepest sorrow that the superstition of hell and heaven should hang as a pall over the minds of men. Such deaths show the fallacy of the claim that religion only can comfort and sustain us in the last parting moments of life. J. H. S.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINTEENTH CENTURY.

No. 2.—MRS. LOT AND HER NAMELESS DAUGHTERS.

The history of Lot and family is inseparably connected with Abraham, whose nephew and traveling companion he was in his peregrinations in the land of Canaan; until their flocks and herds and substance became so great that they could not dwell together, and they separated the one from the other, and Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan, and pitched his tent toward Sodom. "But the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly" (Gen. xiii, 13.)

But it appears that the Lord was not sure of this fact, for in Genesis xviii, 20, 21, we read that the Lord said (unto whom he spoke is not made apparent), "I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know." When he went on his investigating tour he made a call on Abraham, thus killing two birds with one stone, and appeared unto him as he sat in the tent door, in the form of three men, a genuine case of spirit materialization, not to be ignored in these days. The object of his call was to assure Abraham of the fulfillment of his promise, and notify Sarah of the time of the birth of Isaac, which, it will be remembered, delighted the old couple exceedingly. As Abraham went with these men to bring them on their way toward Sodom, the Lord queried thus within himself, and said, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation." Now Abraham was getting to be an especial favorite with the Lord, for he not only intended to make of him a great nation, but to install him as the grandsire of the future Messiah, so he thought it best to counsel with him on this important occasion, and the result proved the wisdom of his judgment.

Abraham, presuming on the justice of the Lord, and having a natural partiality for Lot, notwithstanding their late unpleasantness, after the men went toward Sodom, stood before the Lord, drew near, and thus pleaded with him: "Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked?" He then begged of him to spare the city if fifty righteous could be found therein, concluding his speech with, "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right!" This brought the Lord to terms, and he promised that he would spare the city for their sakes, if fifty righteous were found therein. But fearful that the fifty could not be found, Abraham called himself but dust and ashes, and said, "Wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five?" The Lord then promised him, "If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it." (He did not yet know, the Omnipresent, whether he should find them there or not.) This importuning of Abraham's continued until the number was reduced to ten, and the Lord promised he would not destroy it for ten's sake.

After the bargain was completed "the Lord went his way," the same as would any business man, to attend to other important matters.

At the opening of the next chapter (the 19th) it appears that these three men are changed into two angels, as they approached Lot while he sat in the gate of Sodom. They were invited in and "greatly pressed," and a great feast prepared for them. No mention is here made of our heroine, Mrs. Lot, but the daughters are voluntarily proffered by the just, righteous father to the vile men, who compassed the house, saying, "Where are the men which came into thee this night?" Lot went out and shut the door after him, and said, "I pray you, do not so wickedly. Behold now I have two daughters. . . . I pray you, let me bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes: only unto these men do nothing." But the men were struck with blindness and Lot was spared the necessity of putting his cruel and unfilial promise to the test. What would be said to day of a like father. Two men, strangers, preferred before his own daughters—his own flesh and blood! We do not know whether Mrs. Lot expostulated or not; it is a matter of too little importance, it is presumed, to be mentioned.

To "entertain angels unawares," as some have by entertaining strangers, is referred to and commended in Heb. xiii, 2, but no word of reproof for Lot. He was a "righteous, just" man, please remember, the only one worthy of that appellation in all Sodom! Why should not God deliver "just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked; for that righteous man dwelling among them [the Sodomites], in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations" (2 Pet. ii, 7, 8.)

But we will proceed with the narrative. The men apprised Lot that the city was to be destroyed and that the Lord had sent them for that purpose, and told him to collect all he had and bring out of the place, but he seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law. But Lot was terribly frightened and while he lingered the men laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters, and the Lord being merciful unto him, they brought him forth and set him without the city. Then they were told to "escape to the mountain lest thou be consumed." But Lot objected and begged to flee into a little city near, and as usual the human prevailed over the divine and the request was granted, with the command and admonition, "Haste thee, escape thither; for I cannot do anything till thou be come thither, therefore, the name of the city was called Zoar."

When this was all arranged and the righteous men provided for, "the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven." Now, the men had commanded, "Look not behind thee, . . . lest thou be consumed." But poor Mrs. Lot, not having the fear of God before her eyes, or else having a large organ of inhabitativeness, turned to look upon her once happy home. It might have been that she had left therein her last new polonaise, cut and trimmed after Butterick's or Madame Demorest's latest approved pattern, or her "love of a bonnet," which she had never worn, and which in their haste the men would not pause to allow her to take; or some sweet remembrance or lurking curiosity, like Mother Eve's, tempted her to break the command—perhaps to see how a rainstorm of brimstone and fire would contrast with other storms—when, alas! alas! "She became a pillar of salt"—a warning to all other women against disobeying God, angels, or men; against vanity, curiosity, affection for home, or looking behind them. Monstrous offense! Looking back to see her old home—what an outrageous sin! God's judgments truly are just and his ways past finding out! Her noble lord and amiable daughters were preserved for future use, but she, ungodly woman, was left on the plain, a pillar of salt, as a monument of God's displeasure at disobedience, and a warning to all not to "look back!" Even the pure, blessed Savior is said to have echoed the sentiment in Luke xvii, 32: "Remember Lot's wife." We always wondered, even in our childhood, why Jesus did not say, "Remember Lot; remember Lot's daughters." But there is no judging of his tastes, or the tastes of present theologians, except by public opinion in the days of Jesus, poor Mrs. Lot's salt-pillar petrifaction times, and the now famous Mrs. Grundy's.

But we anticipate. Having disposed of Mrs. Lot, the infallible historian furnishes the reader with one of the most important and sacred miracles on record; for miracle it must have been, according to all the known laws of physiology, if it ever occurred as there related. Nothing less than these two lovely, godly daughters each becoming the mother of a baby boy, by their father, "that we may preserve seed of our father," as the elder delicately expressed herself to the younger.

Now, the account is too indecent to find a place in an Infidel paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER, published by a man who has once been arrested by Anthony Comstock and the Society for the Suppression of Vice; besides, it would be hazardous in the extreme, but it is just fit to grace God's infallibly inspired Holy Word, where it may be found in full (Gen. xix, 30–38), keeping company with many other stories of a similar nature that would be considered a stench in the nostrils of decent society if found in any other book, or even newspaper, and subject the author and salesman to a hasty and ignominious arrest, trial, fine, and imprisonment.

But now for the moral. Mrs. Lot a godly woman? She one of the godly women of the Bible? No, oh no! We never hear her mentioned except in terms of the strongest reprobation. The daughters are not often referred to except to account for the posterity of Lot, and to state how the righteous father and grandfather could be instrumental in giving a Savior to the world. Had Mrs. Lot been spared instead of these daughters, there would have been no necessity for the crime of incest in order to have propagated his species. So much greater sin did Mrs. Lot commit than the husband and daughters, that God, in his justice, could destroy her and spare them, and not one word in the record condemnatory of their conduct. It would seem that not much worse could have been the Sodomites, whom God "condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that should after live ungodly" (2 Pet. ii, 6), than this old, drunken, incestuous father, who would have first thrown his virgin daughters into the street to a rabble of men, and who did afterward violate them himself.

This shows his estimate of virgin purity, its valuation by Bible writers, and by the Bible editor, God, since they, nor he, do not condemn the daughters for the trick there alleged to have been played upon the weak, doting old widowed father, nor denounce Lot for having been the responsible victim of this unnatural conspiracy. But "Remember Lot's wife!" is in our ears constantly, as if she had committed some flagrant crime. Contrast the two events, as there recorded, and ask yourselves, in the name of decency, justice, and common sense, which party was the most guilty, the wife or the husband and daughters. But God did not turn them into pillars of salt, that they might stand as monuments of his displeasure. No, oh no; he "delivered just Lot" and spared his amiable, chaste, virgin daughters, and made monuments of honor and glory of them—proud and distinguished ancestors of the Messiah—the God, the very God!

No Savior, had not the first-born daughter of Lot borne to her father his son Moab—"the same is the father of the Moabites unto this day" (Gen. xix, 37). This is the remembrance of their deed by us; therefore might it well be said: Remember Lot and remember his eldest daughter; for in reckoning the genealogy of "Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ" (Matt. i, 16), it will be discovered that Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth iv, 13–22) was great-grandmother to David; therefore, no Lot's daughter to seduce her father, no Moab; no Moab, no Ruth; no Ruth, no Obed; no Obed, no Jesse; no Jesse, no David; no David, no "Joseph the husband of Mary;" and if no Joseph—what! what! shall we say no Jesus? We have run against a stump; for it is alleged that Joseph was but the *step*father of Jesus. If but the stepfather, what had Joseph to do with the lineage? The Holy Ghost was the father of Jesus; then why trace the lineage from the seed of Abraham (Isaac), through the tribe of Judah, down to the house of David, to Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, if the Holy Ghost was the father of Jesus? It would seem more rational to trace the genealogy of the Holy Ghost and Mary, but no allusion is made in the sacred Word to their ancestry.

Bible worshipers are full of myths and miracles, but how will they dispose of this mystery? If the seed royal was from the Holy Ghost, where the necessity of claiming the seed royal through King David? Why preserve an incestuous human line when the parentage was divine?

We shall find, as we proceed, that without incest, fornication, and adultery the lineage would have been lost, almost before it began, even in Abraham, without polygamy—polygamy, which is now reprobated by the Christian world; yet God accepted such, it is said, to build up his kingdom both on earth and in heaven.

A Brother's Enmity.

Unfortunate E. H. Heywood! In prison through an atrocious law. In prison through the disgraceful action of a heartless wretch who uses virtue as a mask. Sent to prison by the boastful old Bay State, whose Constitution is a fine contribution to Liberty's literature. Sent to prison for daring to publish, not as a sneak, his honest thoughts Sent to prison for publishing "Cupid's Yokes," an essay containing the opinions that are secretly believed in by thousands of New England's wealthiest and best educated men and women. Sent to prison in this age of self-laudation over its own tolerance, freedom, and progress. Sent to prison because he confronted public opinion. Sent to prison for "shocking" the sensitiveness of hypocrites, knaves, and fools.

But the "wretch" don't believe in marriage! Put him in prison.

Well, we will state a fact. Among the Republican Congressmen, there is one of much influence, sense, and experience. At his table, with his social family, he informed us that to his astonishment, in Washington society, he knew no one who believed in marriage. This is not all. He did not know one eminent foreigner, who visited the Capitol, who believed in marriage. This eminent M. C. said, "I know not what is to become of the marriage institution. It has lost its hold on educated opinion. To me, it seems to have been, and is a blessing to women; a benefit, a protection, a guarantee. But smart women no longer so think. I look with anxiety, and almost dread, on the question, when I think of the future of society."

When a man publishes what so many believe, make the "abominable" creature a scapegoat. Therefore, put E. H. Heywood in prison. Society (as it is) must be preserved—make a "victim."

Still more unfortunate for the prisoner, Heywood. He has a rich brother, who has a mortgage on his brother's residence; while we are writing, he has announced the public sale of [the house, so that wife and children may be turned into the street. A father in prison for daring to think; a mother turned out of her home; children helpless; a brother assisting the "meanest of mankind."

In Southern Wales is ancient Cardiff. On its old castle ground there is still one of its castle dungeons and one turret, rotting, through ages, beneath the lichens. We have been up that crumbling turret; we have been in that hideous dungeon. Dukes have lingered and perished there, at a time when that dungeon's earth floor reeked with slime and loathsome things; was fetid with human excrements; was dark as the river Styx.

That was in an age of rough and revolting brutality, when brutes virtually conquered each other; brutally punished and devoured each other. It was not an age of progress.

In the "Hub" of Massachusetts; in the "Hub" of the Republic; in refined, Pecksniffian New England, a man is sent to prison for being a man, and a brother savagely hurls his enmity against a helpless wife and children, in the name of the "Man of sorrow."

Who will assist a cruelly persecuted and brutally injured family?—The National.

Letters from Friends.

CHARLES CITY, IOWA, July 28, 1878.

I am very sorry to see the position of Mr. Underwood in regard to the petition, and think he is mistaken or does not understand it. I put it in circulation here, and got the best men of our town to sign it, including every doctor in town—and we have some as good as any in this part of the country—and every one of the six druggists in the place, and had no one refuse me but a teacher in the Congregational church and the judge of the Circuit Court; and I presented it to a great many of the most learned men in town, and we have a town of 3,000 inhabitants.

I don't wonder at Mr. Abbot's attack on you; he is jealous of your popularity, and mad because you were not put in prison and broken up, so that he might get a few more subscribers by your downfall. And I think he was astonished at the number of friends you had to help you out of your trouble, and the way they stepped forward to your rescue. But I think you should do as my friend Brick Pomeroy does—not stop or take notice of all the little curs that bark at you. What has become of that dead beat, S. W. Payne? He got a dollar out of me for eight copies of his paper, and I think I ought to charge that to you, for it was on your recommendation that I subscribed for it. He was very light; I think he has blown away. And now, Bro. Bennett, take my advice—for it is easier to give than to take—and do as I have done since I became a Freethinker: If I am going along the road, and a little dog comes out and barks at me, I don't stop and get down on my paws and bark back at him. I hope you will take all I say in a friendly spirit, not meaning any offense.

I remain yours truly, JOHN MAHARA.

MARSHALLTON, PA., Aug. 4, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one month, commencing with the proceedings of the first of the Watkins meeting. I hope to see and read in your paper a lecture by Miss Ella E. Gibson, delivered before that meeting. She is a first-class lecturer and a true Liberal; her heart and soul are in the cause of Freethought. She is a Liberal in the true sense—no catching nor grabbing for pennies. She lectured in this place last winter, making many warm friends of some of the best families in the county. She left here only three weeks ago. There were others who wished her to visit them and stay a few weeks, but she was anxious to attend the meeting at Watkins, her health permitting. I only wish she had good health; I know that she would stir things up about these times.

Yours very respectfully, P. F. STERN.

TURNERS FALLS, MASS., July 31, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I have long intended sending the inclosed five dollars, but the same old cry, "Hard times," has prevented till now. I want "The Champions of the Church," and for the remainder please send a collection of your own choice. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better and better. I lend or mail it nearly every week, and often hear it spoken of in the highest terms. I think your enemies will soon find their mistake. You must conquer, for truth is a powerful weapon, and I see you know how to handle it. Poor Abbot, with all his culture, is but a child in the fight that he has forced upon you. I think the green-eyed monster took the place of reason in his cultured head. Can account for his actions in no other way.

Wife joins in best wishes for your welfare, and we hope yet to see you in this world, for we believe the chances after that are very slim. Yours with love and respect,

GEO. E. HARTLEY.

WALLA WALLA, WASHINGTON TER., Aug. 2, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Some four or five days ago I received a copy of "The Champions of the Church." I have found time only to glance over a few pages, but think I shall be much interested in the perusal. But as I do not like to read papers or books that do not belong to me I will inclose a money order for the amount due. I had thought of sending for it, but had put it off from time to time. Many thanks for sending it.

I saw an item in a late copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER in relation to a company of volunteers, fifty in number, who went from Pendleton, Oregon, and according to the statement in your paper forty-three were killed. The truth was, I think, that there were two killed and eight wounded. But the same reports were current here.

I think if our eastern philanthropists who have so much sympathy for the noble red man could have been in eastern Oregon, and in the track of the red demons this summer, maybe their sympathy would have evaporated suddenly, for poor Lo was looking after scalps. General Howard seems an energetic and go-ahead general, but some think he prays too much. But let him pray if he thinks it his duty; if he attends to Lo as he has done in the past and present season no reasonable person can find fault with his course. I. STRAIGHT.

CENTRAL, S. C., Aug, 12, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: Will you allow me through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER to return my sincere and unfeigned gratitude to my Liberal friends abroad, who from time to time have kindly sent me pamphlets, tracts, and papers. I often receive these favors without any knowledge of the donor; these are to me priceless treasures and I only wish my friends knew how much I appreciate their remembrance of me. Situated as I am, it is really delightful and soul-cheering to receive tokens of true friendship from those I have never seen. I am away here in the South, where Freethought and free speech are at a heavy discount; I am almost alone in my wickedness; seldom meet a congenial spirit; many of the truly pious naturally loathe me, and I have even heard them pray for my death, but I guess Mumbo Jumbo was not at home, or was otherwise engaged, at any rate I am still bobbing around, and have received no summons to appear in the Supreme Court of Heaven; hope the case has been nolle prosequied.

The pamphlets all came in due time, for which receive the unfeigned thanks of the wicked old Infidel. The career of Comstock is indeed a treat. I asked a young man some time ago to sign Mr. Heywood's petition and he refused, though it almost choked him down to do it. The young man is now reading Comstock and swears that hell is too cold for him, and I am looking every hour for the young man to come forward and sign the petition. I have got quite a respectable number of signers to the Heywood petition, but not nearly so many as I could get if I could canvass a little, but the health of my family forbids me to leave home.

There will be a big camp-meeting of the Methodists in September, about nine miles from Central. I hope to be able to go. I shall there meet many friends who are Liberal enough to sign the petition, also to read Liberal tracts, which I always distribute freely on such occasions, though my supply will necessarily be short as I am not able to purchase them. I have a few on hand now, and shall reserve them for that particular occasion. Two years ago I attended a camp-meeting at the above-named place and distributed over one hundred tracts. It created quite a consternation among the Godly, and a Rev. Beef Head went for me from the stand; whereupon I challenged him to a discussion upon the spot, but his God or some other fool advised him to decline and to pray for my death.

Fraternally thine, R. M. CASEY.

SPRINGHILL, MO., July 25, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just obtained forty-three or four numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of your issue of 1877, have put them in pamphlet form and am reading them slowly and carefully, and so far I am so well pleased with your views in regard to man and his destiny, and the Scriptures that I can scarcely thank you enough for your boldness in these matters. I have worn the yoke of about four year's duration; it was of the Cumberland Presbyterian pattern, though I was skeptical as to the divine origin of the Bible, and after reading Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" the way was cleared for your arguments in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" to completely eradicate those foolish dogmas from my mind, and for the expansion of it. Again I thank you, dear Mr. Bennett. I am a poor man and have but a very limited education, but were I to be deprived of the knowledge I have obtained from reading your views and those of some other Liberals, my mind would be thrown back into the fog of Christianity from which I have just escaped. Let me tell you honestly that money and all the accomplishments of education could not buy it from me. It is a lamentable fact that now-a-days Christianity is being used as a cloak for bad men to prowl around among honest Infidels, not only to deprive them of their hard earnings, but of their good name also, as I honestly believe Anthony Comstock has done to you. I can testify to the fact that they have robbed me of my last dollar by borrowing it and then taking the benefit of the bankrupt act, leaving me in my sixty-eighth year to struggle to support myself and the almost helpless partner of my life who is the mother of fourteen children, and yet I am considered a scoffer at religion. Respectfully, L. F. GABEN.

ROSE, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: In my estimation there has nothing yet appeared on the obscenity question so well calculated to give aid and comfort to Anthony Comstock, as the letters of Seward Mitchell in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 3, and the cheapest way for Anthony to strengthen his position, is to cause that letter to be widely circulated. If it can be made evident to the community that Liberalism means a free circulation of obscene matter, free rum, and the same freedom to do wrong as to do right, Comstockism will be established on a firm basis.

Can any true Liberal indorse or teach the doctrines of that letter. Note the following, "The authority of each individual soul is absolute and final in deciding questions as to what is true or false in principle, or right or wrong in practice, therefore the individual, the Church, or the State, that attempts to control the opinions or the practice of any man or woman, by an authority or power outside of his or her own soul, is guilty of a flagrant wrong." Of course then no one has the right to attempt to control the actions of Anthony by any power or authority outside of his own soul, and the same was true in respect to John Calvin, Torquemada, and every other ruffian and murderer that has ever lived.

Does mental freedom lead to such a position as that, together with a free circulation of obscene matter, free rum, and the same freedom to do wrong as to do right?

Certainly not, and the more emphatic the denial the better for the cause of truth and right. CHARLES LYMAN.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am glad tu se THE TRUTH SEEKER now and then devoting a part ov its spase to speling reform. I shud be glad to se it devote a colum or more tu this reform every week. It iz a reform that iz very much needed, and the sooner it iz braut about the more time wil be saved from lerning to spel for more important work. And I think that reform in speling wud so affect the popular mind that reformz in uther thingz wuld be more eezy.

Mi own opinyun iz, that if complete reform in speling waz adopted at wunce bi the pres and the people, it would not occazhon the confuzhon that meny peeple think wud nesesarily folo. A kind of "Ke to the Dicshonary," cud be publisht, in which aul the wurdz hooz spelingz had bin changd cud be arrangd tu both old and nu spelingz, and bi the ade of such a "Ke" both the old and nu spelingz cud be redily asertained.

I am in favor ov keeping this subject before the reeding public. I no ov no uther wa tu bring about the reform. When the peeple becum uzed to seing paragrafs and articlez printed in the nu wa, and a majority se that the nu wa iz beter than the old, I think it safe tu sa the reform wil soon be braut about and our absurd and illogical speling shal hav becum a thing ov the past, a "relic ov barbarizm."

F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.

P. S.—If those of THE TRUTH SEEKER reeders hoo favor speling reform wil write me tu that effect bi card or utherwize, tha wil grately oblige thare frend and welwisher.

CLAYVILLE, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1878.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I improve the present moment by informing you that Mr. D. W. Eddy, of Chittenden, Vt. (one of the Eddy brothers), is now and has been with me for two months past, holding seances for spirit materialization, with astonishing success. Under test conditions, which preclude the possibility of fraud or deception, issue from his cabinet spirit forms of all ages and both sexes, dressed in a great variety of costumes, from the small child of four years up to the stalwart man of six feet six inches in height, walking about the room twenty feet from the cabinet, going in an adjoining room, bringing out articles of bed-clothes and depositing them in the lap of some one present, staring us in the face, assuring us in an audible voice that we maintain a conscious progressive activity after having shifted off the old physical body, giving us a hearty shake of the hand, thereby demonstrating to us beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt through the unimpeachable evidence of seeing, hearing, and feeling, that they are an eternal reality, just what they claim to be, the spirits of departed friends and relatives encased in a materialized form, talking with us face to face, telling us of the fadeless beauty and ever increasing grandeur of spirit life.

And now, friend Bennett, knowing as I do that the time has fully arrived when one meek disciple of the Christ principle, armed with the mighty sword of God's eternal truth, can "chase a thousand" persecuting unbelievers and "put ten thousand to flight," I do hereby call on all honest skeptics to give this matter a patient, thorough, scrutinizing investigation; if it is error, "like the house that was built upon the sand," the first faint wave of truth will wash it into the gulf of merited oblivion. If it is truth, like the house that was built upon the rock, it will remain firm and immovable as the everlasting hills, an imperishable monument of truth and beauty.

Sir, it is a natural phenomenon, a grand system of philosophy which comprehends the entire field of nature. It has God for its center, the boundaries of the universe for its circumference, and truth for its motto. It is that stone referred to in Scripture (so called), cut from the mountain without hands, it is destined to roll on and roll on, increasing in strength and velocity at every revolution, grinding to powder ignorance, error, priestcraft, and superstition, and will finally culminate in gathering in its embrace the countless and as yet unborn generations of humanity.

JOSEPH PLUM SMITH.

SALEM, MASS., Aug. 10, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Says S. W. F. in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 3, "If Johnny says to Jenny, whose hand he holds as his wife, promising to provide for, shield, and protect her through life; then she repeats a similar promise, of her own free will, promising him to love and obey so long as life endure. Is this truly marriage, per se, or only an engagement, or what?" No, it is not marriage; it is twaddle. It is not legal for imbeciles to marry. A ceremony so at variance with reason and common sense is simply bosh! Johnny and Jenny, who have no more understanding, must be imbeciles. No law of "God," nature, reason, or propriety, requires Jenny to promise to love Johnny during any specified length of time, despite adverse or any other circumstances, or to obey him under any circumstances. No man or woman ever ought to marry until sufficiently enlightened to understand their respective positions, taking each their fitting place as equals. It does not follow that because a man hires a minister to confront a woman with language so insulting, "You will love, comfort, honor, and obey this man until death shall separate you!" that the woman makes such promise. She merely holds her tongue, while to man is all the glory and honor and praise forever and ever and ever. The ceremony is simply the minister's stock in trade, as the brush and the blacking is the stock in trade of the boot-black. Respectfully,

MARY UPTON FERRIN.

STADACONA CLUB, QUEBEC, Aug. 12, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I have subscribed to THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial for three months, and see that my term is over. As far as I am concerned, it is just the paper I like, but I am obliged to burn it as soon as I have read it. Some of my friends, who pretend to be Freethinkers, were shocked when I showed it to them, and threw it away in disgust. Even a man, a well-known Materialist, refuses to read it for fear he should be found out and lose his high standing in society. However, I will burn it rather than deprive myself of its to me welcome truths. So I enclose five dollars for eight month's subscription and a copy of Viscount Amberley's book, "Analysis of Religious Belief," which please send to my address. I am a Spiritualist, and don't agree with the Materialistic doctrine; being also a medium, and being as fully persuaded of the presence of my spirit friends as I am of my existence I cannot coincide with the idea of no future life. Supposing that all I have read and seen of spiritual manifestation to be humbug, I cannot refuse credit to what happens to me when alone and no possibility of being cheated, when I feel and hear them in my own rooms, quite awake and in my full senses, and this has been going on for more than twenty years; so whether you approve of my thinking or not, I shall ever remain a confirmed Liberal Spiritualist to the end.

Yours fraternally, L. BERTOLOTTO.

HANNIBAL, MO., Aug. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I noticed in a recent number of your paper a communication signed Anti-Frand. Now I am as much opposed to frauds as any man can be, and from my view of life and my experience with so-called Spiritual mediums, I am decidedly of the opinion that they are all frauds; nevertheless I am quite certain that many honest people are deceived by them, and the insinuation of your correspondent that our fellow-citizen, David Jenkins, is an accomplice of Mott's, is altogether gratuitous and without the slightest foundation, I think. I attended one of Mott's seances about a year ago, and was disgusted with the transparent humbuggery, but at the same time there were six or seven other visitors in the room who were well satisfied, nor is it, to one who has been there, so very strange that this should be the case with persons who are at all spiritually inclined. Mr. Jenkins may come under this head, but knowing him as I do, I cannot for a moment believe that he would be guilty of willfully misrepresenting.

Respectfully yours, A. R. AYRES.

LAFAYETTE, VA., Aug. 1, 1878.

I wish to make a brief report to you of the proceedings of a little handful of Liberals or Freethinkers who met at our house on Sunday last, July 29. Geo. W. Hall, of Alleghany Springs; Wm. H. Hall, Montgomery Springs; F. T Lesler, Lafayette; D. W. Patrick, Montgomery Springs; I. M. Lesler, Lafayette; J. M. Barnes, met at the house of the latter, held a council, and pledged $16 50 as a relief fund to aid such as may be persecuted for opinion's sake. They discussed Liberal subjects pretty freely, and said they would like to form a Liberal League, but would have to pay ten dollars to the National League to be recognized as such which amount they consider would be far more usefully spent, and do much more good, if laid out in books, papers, and tracts, distributed over the country to instruct and enlighten others who are groping in ignorance and darkness.

For several years past, J. M. Barnes has distributed to those who would read them, the Religio-Philosophical Journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Freethought Journal, Evolution, Watson's Spiritual Magazine, The Olive Branch, and other reform papers and books, and just now he is beginning to feel somewhat encouraged that his labor has not been in vain in this portion of Virginia. This little band of Freethinkers are to meet again on Sept. 1st, at the residence of Geo. W. Hall, and hold a council about forming some kind of an organization that will give union and strength to the cause, and endeavor to get others of Liberal sentiment who may feel disposed to unite with them. J. M. Barnes will address the audience. He wishes to say to friend H. L. Green, that he would be highly pleased to attend the great Freethinker's Convention to be held at Watkins, but the want of means forbids his cherishing any such idea, and he will be compelled to remain at home, and work and speak here in Virginia, to the best of his ability, for the present. Mr. Barnes has started with one of the Heywood petitions, and got ten names. G. W. Hall has another with one hundred names, and thinks he can increase it to five hundred soon.

Yours truly, MRS. MARY F. BARNES.

ST. JOHNS, MICH., Aug. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Last Sunday at a "grove-meeting" near Maple Rapids, I spoke to an attentive audience for an hour and a half. I talked about God's two she bears, and about the quails which he sent to feed the children of Israel, and then asked why God did not send a flock of quails to China where they are actually dying of starvation. I could only answer the question by presuming that God who is said to be always good and mindful of his children, is, just at this present time, out of quails.

For two years I have been fighting the Bible in our public schools, and have issued twenty-four thousand circulars with a view of showing up the pious bigots who insist on trampling on the constitutional rights of others by dragging sectarian Mumbo Jumbo exercises into our schools. At our annual school meeting a short time since, I made a motion that we raise ten dollars to be expended in the purchase of a sacred picture of God's two she bears. The chairman decided the motion to be out of order. Next, I moved that the obscene portion of the Bible used in our schools be committed to the flames. But this motion like the first, was declared out of order. I honestly think that my last motion should have been sustained, for it is but a few days since the Professor, either accidentally or by design, read a passage that greatly shocked the modesty of the young ladies of his school, which consisted in, as I am told, his reading of the seventh and eighth verses of Proverbs. If God had only thought to have inspired the writer to have said big toe in place of the word used, I ask if it would not have made just as good sense, and when read in school sounded much better?

I send you sir, a few circulars, so that you can see that I am making it warm for Church fanatics. A young man in good health while on his knees engaged in prayer, was suddenly struck dead a few days since, near here. Moral—don't kneel when you pray. Yours truly, M. BABCOCK.

ARINGTON, KAN., Aug. 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You will find inclosed two dollars for your paper, also the petition for the release of Mr. E. H. Heywood, having fifty-three subscribers. I am greatly pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is fearless, and shows up the shams and absurdities that superstition has hedged itself round about with. Success attend your efforts.

I cannot accept the present greenback movement. Fiat money will prove a failure. All currency to be of any value must have a basis that is equivalent to coin, or it will be worthless as a medium of exchange, and if the Government should issue any amount of greenbacks, they will not be given away to me or any one else, and at this time there is more currency in circulation than at any other former period, taking its coin value which is the true test and the only one worthy of consideration. Our currency to-day is worth more in gold and silver, than at any other former time, therefore there is more in circulation really. Formerly it took three dollars of currency to represent one real dollar. Who wants those times again? I presume the gold gambler and speculator would, and those real estate speculators who loaded themselves with real estate at inflation prices to make money on would like to unload at like prices. I find all the latter classes are in favor of inflation and unlimited amounts of greenbacks, and a certain class of politicians who have to have some hobby to get in office, for without a hobby to ride, they would never be known. Yours truly,

HENRY SCHIFFBAUER.

NORTH HANNIBAL, N. Y., Aug. 4, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: One week ago, the Liberals and Spiritualists in this locality held a meeting on the fair grounds at Fulton. The meeting was addressed by J. Frank Baxter of Mass., and an audience of 4,000 people assembled to hear this noted speaker and test medium. His tests were of a forcible character, and he gave many a telling hit at orthodoxy. On the whole, the meeting was an instructive, pleasant gathering, and we think many went away with their minds more enlightened.

J. W. Babbitt is inclined to criticise me because I requested that a part of THE TRUTH SEEKER be devoted to the discussion of the temperance question, and he says, "Please don't do it," and to offset that, I say, Please do do it. If there is anything that is worthy of the attention of a noble-hearted Liberal, it is the promotion of temperance, and it is my opinion, and I think it is the opinion of many of your subscribers, that one or two columns out of the forty-eight could not be better used than in the promotion of sound principles of temperance. Friend Babbitt says, "Most Liberals are temperance men," and if this is the case, then their hearts will go out after those who are not temperate, and this of course brings a necessity of knowing the best methods of reaching and reforming such people. We have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for over three years, and we understand the object and aim of its teachings to be to reform and better the condition of the people mentally and morally, and Bro. Babbitt being an M.D., cannot fail to know that to be successful in reforming and developing people mentally and morally, you must of a necessity better their physical condition, and admitting, as any intelligent, honest person will, that the poisonous liquors of to-day are injurious to the human system, we must see the necessity of a thorough education on this subject, even among the Liberals, and as many of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers do not take papers that are devoted in part or altogether to the temperance question, we shall continue to "pray" for a corner.

We are sorry to see any firm identified with the Liberal movement advocating such loose and reckless notions as does Seward Mitchell in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 3d. While we are strongly opposed to the persecutions of Anthony Comstock, and the laws that are behind him, we can plainly see a necessity for restriction in the circulation of obscene matter, and I say, we as a community, and as a people, have a right to say that Seward Mitchell, or any other person has no moral or legal right to send through the mails, or by any other means, nasty obscene publications to the young people of a community that has a tendency to pollute their imaginations and destroy their manhood. While we are anxious that people have a thorough knowledge of their physical organization, and that they have a right to send through the mail such works as Dr. Foote's, we can at the same time see how people can be so selfish and degraded in their motives that they will engage (if the law will allow them) in dealing out all kinds of poisonous stuff to people.

Mr. Mitchell says he demands freedom to do wrong as well as to do right. So does the night robber; so does the assassin; so does the thief; so does the pimp that goes about the streets decoying innocent girls into the practice of prostitution; so does the rum-seller who deals out damnation and misery to his victims. All honest and sensible people will agree with me that if I have labored hard for years, night and day, to obtain a dwelling for myself and family, in which we may be sheltered from the storm and sun, we as a people have a right to enact laws that will have a tendency to stay the hand that would apply the torch to that building.

Now, Bro. Bennett, I am of the opinion that such articles as the one referred to has a great tendency to retard the circulation and usefulness of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If we present THE TRUTH SEEKER to our neighbor for inspection, his eye is sure to fall on such articles as Seward Mitchell's, and he is sure to say, If that is Liberalism, the less we have to do with it the better, and so say I. Yours for the formation of truth and happiness, A. P. BRADT.

DUBUQUE, IOWA, Aug. 6, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A copy of "Interrogatories" was received a few days since. I read it within thirty hours from the time it reached me; and to say that I am pleased with it but feebly expresses my opinion of the work.

The methods you have adopted in treating the subject are, in my view, admirable. Very truly yours,

C. B. JENNINGS, M.D.

HANNIBAL, MO., Aug. 8, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Inclosed find fifty cents for the last tracts which I have received. I find them of much benefit to distribute around among my orthodox friends, and not only that, but when many of them read them they find out what a poor foundation they have in the Bible. Really it does my heart good to think I can be the means of showing a few the folly of believing anything which the Bible contains, and through your sensible tracts I hope to show many more the fallacy of the so-called Christian faith, and prove to them it is nothing more than a faith founded on superstition. I shall send for more tracts as soon as I can spare some more of my funds. I sincerely hope nature may allow you to live for many more years to carry on the good work which you have begun so nobly. I remain sincerely yours, WM. J. CLEMENS.

DUNLEITH, ILL., Aug. 14, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I have been looking through "The Champions of the Church," and was agreeably surprised to find it so good a thing. Volumes in one, got up in fine style, strong leather binding, with red edges, and a well executed steel engraving of the author, good paper with readable type, got up in a style that any one of common education can understand every word of it. Every reader should have a copy. Christian, Infidel, and Turk should have it. Long may you wave. Respectfully yours,

DR. J. CRIGHTON.

ELKLAND, PA., July 30, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Truly has it been said, "Afflictions are blessings in disguise." Wisdom tempered by patience is oft wanting to render the same apparent. My affliction in the present case is the painful operation of the process of teeth extraction. The blessing consequent is indisposition, which brings leisure for the perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Hence I will venture another Beatitude—"Blessed are they that are afflicted and endure pain, for they shall grow spiritually stronger."

I read the "Darwins" "Sowed in the moon and planted out of the moon," and although not a believer in "scenes and signs" of wiseacres, still it is evident that the conditions of this planet, favoring or otherwise the growth of the vegetable world depends much upon its relative position to the other planetary bodies. An eclipse is generally attended by a change in temperature. Moonlight nights are favorable to the growth of the cucumber and melon family. Apropos I might with Shakspere say, "Edith, there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in your philosophy."

Am deeply interested in Prof. Haeckels article on laws of the development of original tribes and of individuals. Novices that we are, we experience an awakened emotion of sympathy with those who discard the special creation theory, offering in its stead "spontaneous generation" as the original unfoldment or evolution process of life; or, as Prof. Huxley terms it, Abiogenesis. It was with the keenest delight we first read Huxley's essay on spontaneous generation. The origin of life and the future condition of the soul have been the absorbing themes from early years. The above article was to me what a flowing fountain would be to a desert traveler. Huxley is impartial, broad, catholic; he argues pro and con; never dogmatizes or asserts; patiently he elicits facts and impartially presents them.

In conclusion, on Biogenesis and Abiogenesis he says: "Expectation is permissible when belief is not, and if it were given me to look back beyond the abyss of geologically recorded time, to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical changes which it can no more see again than a man can recall his infancy, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from not living matter." True, he claimed for this hypothesis only philosophical faith. Is it not more worthy of acceptance than the Mosaic account of creation of Adam from the dust of the earth, and then the metamorphosis of Eve from one of his ribs?

Prof. Tyndall, too, away up the lofty Matterhorn, calmly seated upon an upper crag, contemplating nature, life, and decay, was carried back in thought to the origin of life; the mountain had impressed him with savage strength; the jagged, crumbling top told of inexorable decay; this led his active, longing mind back to the time when the Matterhorn was in the full strength of mountainhood—back to its growth and origin; halting not there, his thoughts wandered back through molten worlds to that nebulous haze which philosophers have regarded as the proximate source of natural things.

He says: "I tried to look at this universal cloud containing within itself the prediction of all that has since occurred. I tried to imagine it as the seat of those forces whose action was to issue in solar and stellar systems, and all that they involve. Did that formless fog contain potentially the sadness with which I regarded the Matterhorn? Did the thought which now ran back to it simply return to its primal home? If so, had we not better recast our definition of matter and force? for if life and thought be the very flower of both, any definition which omits life and thought must be inadequate if not untrue."

Untrammeled thinkers are mostly arriving at similar ideas and beliefs with Prof. Tyndall. "In matter they locate or discover the promise and potency of every form and quality of life."

"Christianity and Materialism," by B. F. Underwood, commands my admiration; it is concise and to the point. Although the Church has dishonored woman, sought to suppress and silence her voice, assigned her a place of servitude and subjection, still, like a beaten cur, she caresses the hand which smote. Her influence to-day is the fostering, sustaining, vitalizing power in the Church. Would it were directed to a higher, grander, truer, nobler work!

I am deeply interested in brother Lucifer's botanical researches. His familiarity with botanical terms and knowledge of vegetable life awakened my former interest in this pleasing and instructive department of science, as only the pure and good find delight in the pursuit of the true and beautiful. Herein we have another proof of the high tone and lofty nature of our most worthy brother.

Praying the coming of another leisure day for reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, I fortify myself with patience.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

LA HARPE, ILL., Aug. 14, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: At a meeting of the friends of Freethought held in this place Saturday, August 10th, it was decided to hold a mass meeting some time this fall, as early as speakers can be procured. It was also decided to have the meeting commence on Friday afternoon and hold over Sunday. We desire to obtain the services of at least two or three good speakers. Will you please give notice of the meeting, and request speakers to correspond with me, stating when their services can be had; also their terms.

Yours truly. S. PALMER.

MILLVILL, PICTOU COUNTY, NOVA SCOTIA, July 23, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: When Joshua said to the sun, "Stand thou still," I think that he had more power than God had, for the Bible says that the sun stood still, so when Joshua could stop the sun I think we all ought to do something to stop evil and help good along. We should have a copy of the "Champions of the Church." Liberals and Christians should read such a grand and good book as it is. It is to be lamented that our friend of the Index has gone after Comstock and the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Abbot might have taken the lead instead of turning weak-kneed and going away and letting brother Bennett take the lead, and worse than all that, trying to kick him down. It is to be hoped your paper will still live for a thousand years to come. I don't intend to say stop my paper as long as I can pay for it any time within the year. Times are very hard at present. If the Liberal brothers and sisters will let THE TRUTH SEEKER and brother Bennett die of want it will be the greatest loss that we could meet with. I am glad that you got out of Mr. Christian Comstock's clutches, for I think that he intended to make a good supper on you and then to go off crowing to roost, as owls do when they catch a squirrel and eat it. If Comstock will come to Nova Scotia I will tell him where he can get some obscenity, but I will not warrant him whether he will find as much of it as he wants or not, and about his getting back to New York, I know nothing of. Some of the Nova Scotian ladies would like to get hold of him round here.

It is to be hoped that Sara B. Chase will give Comstock what he has worked for so that he will never turn his holy eye to a lady afterwards. Yours fraternally,

JOHN SILLARS ARTHUR.

MORRILL, KAN., Aug. 11, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: When I look through the "Champions of the Church," and read of the cruelties, crimes, vices, and immoralities of the grossest kind, it makes me abhor the very name of Christianity. It should be read by every Christian to show them the kind of men that have built up and are building up their religion. Some put it on for a cloak to cover up their sins. Thousands of our business men support it, not because they believe it, but for policy. I know some ministers who don't believe what they preach, but that is their living, and they would rather live a deceitful life than go to work; and I dare say there are thousands more in the same boat. Christianity is a living lie, a cancer on the body of the civilized world, a great overcoat for all conceivable crimes that civilization is guilty of. The Church is the embodiment of everything that is mean, low, contemptible, and cruel—the quintessence of nastiness. If they don't believe it let them read its history and the lives of its champions. I would write more but I have not time now. Yours ever, J. W. SCOTT.

PRATT, ILL., August 7, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I notice an article headed "Courtesy in Discussion," by B. F. Underwood. Your remarks are just what they should be, as I do not think Mr. Underwood is a man that would go back on his word or principles. But I do think that he should say something more definite in regard to your action in the Comstock petition, as he permitted an article to be published in The Index with Mr. Abbot's remarks, conveying the idea that Underwood was opposed to you. This I do no believe. Mr. Underwood believes in modification and you in repeal. I do not think Mr. Underwood believes you dishonest or in favor of obscenity, as the The Index charges you with being, and I think Mr. Underwood should say so. How can Mr. Abbot or Mr. Underwood believe that it is better not to repeal when such men as Heywood are fined and imprisoned—a man which they believe to be honest and free from any intent of obscenity! Were they put in the place of Heywood, would they not think that a law that was so indefinite as to send innocent men to prison had better be repealed? At least, they should have the charity to admit that those who did favor repeal, like yourself, were honest; I believe Mr. Underwood thinks you are, and he should so state it through the papers.

But Mr. Abbot, as I believe, is actuated by selfish motives and a jealousy of your growing favor as a journalist. I tell you, friend Bennett, I have heard only one sentiment expressed in this neighborhood, and that is that you are right and Abbot wrong. Respectfully yours,

JAMES M. PRATT.

Comstock's Dream.

TRANSLATED FROM THE SPANISH OF TORQUEMADA, THE TYRANT OF THE INQUISITION, A. D. 1482, AND PARAPHRASED FOR THE BENEFIT OF ANTHONY COMSTOCK, A. D. 1878.

The night was dark, the hour was late;
The fire burned low in the parlor grate;
As, leaning back in his chair of state,
Sat Tony, fast asleep.
Y. M. C. A. friends had gone; he'd done his best,
With tales of his victims, to please each guest,
And now was taking a little rest,
And snoring loud and deep.

Ah, who shall say but some conscience freak
Had made his digestive organs weak,
Or his gizzard was soured by some Bennett speech,
Or obscene literature theme?
Or if 'twas because he'd been handled so rough
By papers that never would give him a puff,
Or whether his perquisites wern't quite enough—
But he dreamed a horrible dream.

Released from the Y. M. C. A. clan,
He was back to his Connecticut home again,
And with joy he gazed through the window-pane
On scenes he used to roam.
'Round there were men of Infidel race,
All honest men with an unscarred face,
So Tony felt quite out of place
While enjoying the scenes of home.

When suddenly came an infernal din,
As if walls and roof were tumbling in.
With awful oath and devilish grin,
Two demons strode the floor.
The women shrieked with sore affright,
The children cried with all their might,
And all that could got out of sight
Where'er they found a door.

But Tony backed and kept aloof,
For his cowardly mind saw positive proof,
In the barbed tail and parted hoof,
Of the errand on which they came.
"Your business, gents?" spoke he in fear;
Said one, "I'm Obscene Agent here,
Commissioned from the lower sphere—
Apolyon is my name.

"You are our prisoner, Tony!" "What! an arrest!
Why! what's the charge? I cannot guess.
But you must be cold in that summer dress;
Just try some toddy, hot.
There's brandy, and water, and sugar—mix!"
"All right," says the devil; but, Tony, your tricks
Won't get you out of your little fix.
We'll drink, then off we'll trot,"

"There is something wrong," said C.; "that's plain.
If I but could a hearing gain
Suspicious facts I could explain
And truth make clearly seen."
Then Comstock asked to see the writ,
And to hear the charges preferred in it.
But the devils went into a laughing fit,
And said it was nothing "obscene."

Tony was scared, but the devils were glad,
And a queer, sardonic laugh they had.
"You've arrested the innocent here, my lad,
Now we'll give you a little back pay."
They looked like Tony much, in the face,
Although, to be fair with the Comstock race,
They certainly had a superior grace,
And a much more courteous way.

"Never," said they, "do we answer why,
And even should you unwarily try
A word or a note to a passer by,
We'll double the load of pain.
We are never by money or malice backed
(A devil's word must be taken for fact);
And should any prisoner stubbornly act,
He never sees home again.

Oh, tight and hard was that devil's grip,
As he bade the prisoner close his lip,
For he'd got to take a downward trip—
Down to the shades below.
Comstock naturally felt unwell,
For he judged by the strong sulphureous smell
That they were taking him down to hell,
Where he didn't want to go.

What he endured you may understand
If you have Dante's "Dream" at hand,
But I've no adequate words at command
To make his anguish known
But 'mid that horrid smoke and din,
He thought how mean a cuss he'd been;
And swore if he ever got out again
He'd let Infidels alone.

"I see I have made a great mistake,
But when I leave this fiery lake
I won't do it again for Jesus' sake—
Or any other man."
And Tony gnashed his teeth in hell,
In pain and anguish he did yell,
For there's none to arrest in that bottomless well,
No "obscene" men are damned.

. . . . . .

'Twas raining hard; with a thunder stroke,
The nightmare dream of Comstock broke;
In fear and wonder he awoke,
And terror shook his bones.
He thought of the pangs of the innocent,
To prisons and Tombs and dungeons sent;
Of Train, of Foote, of Hall, of Lant,
Of Heywood, Bennett, Jones.

TO A REV. WHO PRETENDED TO WRITE FROM A CLOUD (FLOATING OVER MY HOME) WHITHER THE MUSES HAD TAKEN HIM.

BY MRS. E. D. SLENKER.

Highly honored am I, with a letter from the sky,
From regions above, where God is "all love,"
And the pure angels sing hozannas to their King.
And people wear feathers, in all sorts of weathers;
A "cloud" for their seat, O! it cannot be beat.
So nicely it reads, while the fancy it feeds.
But alas! for poor me, I'm blind, and can't see
How the muses could bring this wonderful thing
To happen alone to Bertie S. Stone;
For though he's a preacher, perhaps a great teacher,
Why favored should he of all mortals be,
Thus lifted up high to a seat in the sky?
Where he can look down, on Infidels frown,
And shout in their ear, "'Tis evident and clear
That there is a God, who holds a big rod
All soaking in pickle, our ribs well to tickle."
But shout till thee's hoarse, 'tis a matter of course
That preachers should preach, and myths they should teach;
Make Bible commands the law of the lands;
And the doctrine, too, be it false or true,
It matters no whit, they care not a bit
So long as the pay comes day after day;
Whether Gods three, or only one there be;
If sons they have any, or ever so many;
If a devil or two, a black or a blue;
A paradise high, aloft in the sky;
A hell deep and dire, where men live in fire;
And devils will broil in sulphur and oil,
Man, woman, and child, to prove a God mild,
And gentle and kind, and of merciful mind.
All these things they tell, and love much to dwell
On theories grand, of a bright summer land
Where the pious shall live, who unto them give
Their silver and gold, uncounted, untold,
The pleasures of earth, they deem of no worth;
Yet led by the time, for dollars and dime.
"In heaven," they cry, "Put your treasure on high."
But they carefully strive, while they are alive,
To get all they're able to furnish their table.
For the fat oily spirit enjoys the rich feast
Of bread, pies, and cakes which the good housewife bakes.
And above all the rest, the soft, tender breast
Of young spring chickens, with accompanying fixings.
So, Bertie, you see, 'tis plain now to me,
While so closely thee clings to these holy things,
And hesitates long to speak of the wrong
Which the church of Snowville, upon yonder hill,
Has heaped upon me, by saying that thee
Has demoralized been, and indoctrined with sin
By reading, and talking, and sittting, and walking
With us Infidels, who ignore all hells,
And heavens beside, where preachers do ride
On a cloud's silver sheen, in the blue empyrean.
O hasten to tell, that the doctrine of hell,
And the "anger of God," and his "chastening rod"
Are fables so old, they must not be told
By skeptic or doubter, or any come-outer,
For such simple truths even the tenderest youths
Must see through at once, or be written "dunce."
'Tis not in the skies that man's duty lies,
So thy cloudy seat leave and preach and believe
That matter alone is all the God known,
And to do right will make our life bright.

Hindoo Prayers.

Let me not yet, O Varuna, enter into the house of earth,
Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

If I move along trembling, like a cloud blown by the wind,
Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

Through want of strength, thou strong and bright God, have I gone astray,
Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

Thirst came upon thy worshippers, though standing in the midst of water,
Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!

Whenever we men, O Varuna,
Commit an offense before the heavenly host;
Whenever we break thy law through thoughtlessness,
Punish us not, O God, for that offense!

Loosen my sin from me, like a fetter,
Then shall we increase the source of thy law, O Varuna!
Let not the thread be cut, while I weave my prayer,
Let not the frame of my work perish before its time.

Drive away terror from me, O Varuna;
Be gracious to me righteous King!
Undo my sin, like the rope of a calf,
For away from thee I am not master of a twinkling of the eye.

Do not hurt us with thy weapons, O Varuna,
Which, when thou wishest it the evil doer would do.
May we not go into exile from light;
Destroy the enemies well, that we may live.

We shall offer praise to thee, O high-born God,
As formerly, so now and forever!
For on thee, O unconquerable God, are founded,
As on a rock, the unchangeable laws.

Send away from me my own sins,
And may I not suffer for what others have done!
Many dawns have not yet dawned for us,
Let us live in them also, O Varuna.

He who, while I was trembling in sleep, wished me evil,
Be he a companion or a friend, O King,
The thief also who wishes to injure us, or the wolf,
Protect us, Varuna, from all these.

A Letter from E. H. Heywood.

CELL 52, THE JAIL, DEDHAM,
Au 1, 1878, Y. L. 6.

DEAR MR. SEAVER: Our precious home, with all its sacred associations, went under the auctioneer's hammer on the 26th ult., and was sold to my brother, S. R. Heywood. To-day my family are houseless and penniless! I do not wish to trouble your readers with my personal matters, but as you kindly printed my letter of July 24th, I ought to state some further facts that all may judge impartially.

Recognizing the justice of my brother's desire that the house be open for boarders this season and earn the usual amount needed to pay interest money, I asked him or his representative to go in, use all of our outfit on his own terms, only requesting that Mrs. H. and our children be permitted a room or two to stay in while our affairs could be closed up in a way to promote the best interests of all concerned. Yet he refused to grant my request, because, as he said, his family and other Worcester people would not wish to come there to board if persons holding such principles as Mrs. Heywood and I do were even on the premises. Those who think the age of persecution past can see in this case how cruel and even savage one brother can be to another brother's family in distress when the main provocation is merely a difference of opinion on religious and social questions! It is an eviction that might be expected of an English landlord in Ireland, but which rarely occurs in these States.

My brother has been very kind to me heretofore, and incurred heavy pecuniary obligations in my behalf. He employed no by-bidders, the sale was otherwise open and fair, and he allows my friends sixty days to redeem the estate; but he asks an advance of $1,700 above what he paid, and has thrust my family into the street, even though the house is likely to stand empty till next summer. I can cheerfully bear persecution, even the torture of imprisonment for my belief; but this treatment of my family (when I am forbidden to be with them or help them) by one who I had a natural right to suppose would be friendly to them in a crisis like this causes me sad days and sleepless nights.

However, I know friends will not see them suffer. It has been my good fortune, for thirteen years, to share a home with a woman who now would rather go with our precious children (Vesta Vernon, nine years, and Hermes Sidney, four years old) to the poor-house and stay there during my two years' incarceration, than have me retract one word I have conscientiously published, or yield one iota of the citizen's right to freedom of conscience and speech, of the press, and the mails, now invaded but not conquered in my person.

Many thanks for your timely, intelligent, and generous explanations of my views on Freelove. I agree almost entirely with what you have said, and will write something for the Investigator on those points soon. It will be well for High-Church "culturists" to "go slow" in the use of adjectives regarding my theories until they show a more intelligent comprehension of them. No issue was ever broached in reform so irresistible in logic and in fact as the Freelove issue. I would like much to be at the Faneuil Hall meeting to-night, but I suppose Sheriff Wood will not let me come! He is a very kind, humane, and gentlemanly officer, as indeed all my other keepers are.

With profound gratitude to you and Mr. Mendum for your noble and manifold deeds for Liberty, I am ever yours to serve it,

E. H. HEYWOOD.

The Champions of the Church.

We have received from the author and publisher, D. M. Bennett, a large and valuable octavo volume of 1120 pages with the above title. The "Champions of the Church," of course, includes all the eminent Christians from the reputed founder of Christianity to the present time. Here we have a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters that have upheld the Church for sixteen centuries. Here, too, is given a full history of the Inquisition, and the fearful and bloody wars which were waged by Christianity to help spread its rule. Also a full history of Jesuitism for three centuries, and also over 100 pages are devoted to the no less hellish crimes and cruelties of that distinguished saint, Anthony Comstock. The main purpose of this valuable work is to give briefly but succinctly an authentic history of the cruelties and persecutions practiced by distinguished leaders of the Christian Church in the past. While the author claims little for originality, yet he does claim that his work is entirely accurate, true without exaggeration, and although it is unfortunate for so-called Christianity that its reputed founders and leaders rest under such a cloud of mysticism and uncertainty, yet the sole aim of the author has been to state absolute historical facts. No idea of the real worth of this great work can be given. Its 1120 large pages contain in one volume a history of all the principal characters, whose acts it truthfully records. Beginning with Jesus, his miracles, etc., it gives also all that is known as to the Evangelists, numerous saints, Constantine, St. Augustine, Gregory, Boniface, Charlemagne, and others, including the human hyena Torquemada, who burnt 12,000 persons alive for the good of the Church. Calvin, Knox, and others, have due attention. Over 800 illustrations are given of the crimes of so-called Christian ministers, and the volume is fitly concluded with a full history of the crimes, outrages, and perjuries of Anthony Comstock, who is shown to be a fit companion of the other bloodthirsty villains of whom this work treats. We repeat, no notice can do justice to this invaluable volume. It is a record of absolute historical facts, and those who would know what the early Church was, in fact, what it is to-day, should secure this book. Of course the churchmen will not indorse it, but to the thinking person, who would know what the Church was and is, the book will be desirable. We trust it will have a large sale, as it certainly deserves. The work is finely printed, contains a fine steel portrait of the author, 1,120 large octavo pages, and yet will be sent free anywhere, in fine cloth binding, only $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50. Address D. M. Bennett, publisher, 141 8th street, New York, or it may be ordered from this office.—The Star Spangled Banner.

A GOOD PLAN.

The best and most popular plan for operating stocks is that of combining capital of various sums, or pooling the orders of thousands of customers and operating them as one mighty whole in which shares are issued, which has been made so successful by the firm of Messrs. LAWRENCE & CO., Bankers, 55 Exchange-place, N. Y., the profits of which are divided pro rata among the shareholders at the expiration of thirty days from date of certificate. By this excellent plan each investor is placed on an equal footing with the largest operator. For example, within a month you made $2,000 upon an investment of $100, upon $25 the profit would be $500. An investment of $10 would pay $50, making 5 per cent. during the month. An investment of $100 would pay $1,000 profit, making 10 per cent.; an investment of $500 would pay $2,500 profit, making 5 per cent.; and so on, according to the market. The firm's circular explains everything. The editor of the Brooklyn Journal says: "The very satisfactory results made in these combinations by friends led us to order 20 shares, and at the final result we made a clear profit of $101.25 after deducting all commissions and our original investment. The firm is in every respect worthy of the utmost confidence. Send for their explanatory circular." Mr. H. F. Giddings has kindly tendered the firm his experience over his signature, as in no event would they use any of their customers' names without such authority:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1878.

LAWRENCE & Co., 55 Exchange Place. Dear Sirs:—Your favor containing your check for $1,376.63 at hand for which I thank you, as it is in excess of what I expected. As to your request for an expression in writing from me, I can cheerfully say that the above result is very satisfactory, and I believe I can safely recommend your combined system to everybody. And further, more, I would say that I first saw your advertisement in a N.Y. paper, and sent for one of your circulars, on receipt of which, as you know, I remitted you $300 for 300 shares in Class C in one of your combinations, and by return mail received your certificate for the same, and during the month received five notices of purchases and sales of different stocks, in all amounting to 4¼ per cent., or $1,275 profit on my 300 shares, after deducting your commissions of $198.37, leaving me a net profit of $1,076.63 over and above my investment of $300. Yours truly,

H. F. GIDDINGS,
837 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

An article in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, under date of June 29, 1878, says: "The reports of fabulous profits realized to numerous parties by this plan led us to investigate the matter closely. The system is based on safe business principles, and is the only method by which large operators attain their greatest success. The pools in which their customers are interested are placed on an equality in every respect with the leaders of the street. As the firm's whole interest lies in their commissions, they naturally wish to make their operations aggregate as large as possible. We believe the method of Lawrence & Co. to be the most safe and successful of any that can be found. New combinations and pools are formed every day or two. The firm will send their comprehensive circular, giving full details, to any applicant. One of their old customers, who held a few shares in one of these combinations, after receiving check for his profits, writes: 'Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, N. Y.: Your remittance for my profits, $393.75 is received. I again most heartily thank you, &c.' Numerous testimonials are contained in their circular." New York Illustrated Times says: "A safe method of dealing in stocks.—The great desideratum has always been to discover some method by which a party, operating on limited capital, can stand an equal chance with men like Gould, Vanderbilt or Keene. A plan has lately been adopted by the banking house of Messrs. Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, that seems to fill the bill completely. The reports of numerous parties who have made large sums of money by this plan, has led us to investigate the matter, and we find the rumors are based on facts. They are also large dealers in all kinds of bonds.

Their circular is truthful and instructive," send for it.

THE ETHICS OF SPIRITUALISM;

A SYSTEM OF

MORAL PHILOSOPHY,

Founded on Evolution and Continuity of Man's Existence beyond the Grave.

By HUDSON TUTTLE,

AUTHOR OF

"Arcana of Nature," "Antiquity of Man," "Career of the God-Idea in History," "Career of Religious Ideas," "Arcana of Spiritualism," etc., etc.

THE FOLLOWING LIST COMPRISES SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL SUBJECTS TREATED:

The Individual; the Genesis and Evolution of Spirit; The Laws of Moral Government; Analysis of Mind in reference to Ethics; The Appetite; The Propensities; Love; Wisdom; Consideration of Rights of the Individual, of Society; Consideration of Duties and Obligations; Duties of the Individual; To God; Of Self-Culture; Duties of Society; Marriage, its Foundation and Responsibility.

The "Ethics of Spiritualism," while running in the columns of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, was widely noticed and commended by the public and the press. From the various published notices we quote a few as follows:

"Contains matter of much interest to Liberal minds."—Pequabuck Valley Gazette.

"Hudson Tuttle's Ethics of Spiritualism, now being published in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, is alone worth the subscription price to that journal. When Hudson Tuttle writes he says something."—Spiritual Scientist.

. . . "We congratulate our brother of Chicago on his securing these valuable contributions. No one is better qualified to treat the subject intuitively and philosophically." . . .—Banner of Light.

. . . "Such a work has long been needed, and never more so than at this time. . . . To me the crowning glory of Spiritualism is its ethical system, its pure and perfect code of morals. . . . I am profoundly grateful to Mr. Tuttle that he has undertaken the work. . . . —Wm. E. Coleman.

. . . "This subject should have been thoroughly treated before now by some of our ablest minds, but it may be for the best that it has been comparatively neglected, and the duty left to him of presenting it in his unequaled way. . . . —Eugene Crowell, M.D., author of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism.

"I have just read your announcement concerning the series of articles you will soon begin to publish from the ever-active and thoroughly honest pen of Brother Hudson Tuttle. He is a farmer, and knows how to plow and sow and reap; a grape-grower, and can discriminate between good and bad fruit. He writes from the fulness of the spirit, and therefore he constantly rises above the clouds of materialism. He is no sophist, no hair-splitting apologist for the loose practices of mankind, and so you may look for the highest and most philosophical statement of the morality from his faithful pen; and the comfort is great when one reflects and knows to a certainty that Hudson Tuttle is no hypocrite, and hence is always personally as good as his written word."—Andrew Jackson Davis.

. . . "The questions he proposes to answer are important and concern us all, and no writer is better qualified to enlighten the world on these topics. I congratulate you on being able to secure the services of this inspired philosopher." . . . . —Warren Sumner Barlow, author of The Voices.

The author has steadily aimed to bring his work within the smallest possible compass, and has most admirably succeeded. Though the subjects treated are of the highest importance, Mr. Tuttle has restrained every disposition to dilate upon them, and has thus condensed the book into one hundred and sixty pages. The book is well printed on heavy paper, and altogether is a work that every Spiritualist and Liberalist should own.

12mo. Cloth, 160 pp. Price, in cloth, 60 cents; Pamphlet, 40 cents.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned, a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

INTERROGATORIES TO JEHOVAH

A long series of questions, upon a great variety of subjects, to which answers are urgently desired. Offered up at The Truth Seeker Office by its devout editor.

260 pages, 12 mo. Paper, 50 cts.; cloth, 75 cts.

The distinguished physician for all Private Chronic and Sexual Diseases, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an External or Outside Application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his External Remedy for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his Private and other Circulars, with cures sworn to, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. Terms extremely low in all cases. Write your address plainly.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

Gems of Thought.

JUSTICE is the virtue of rendering every man his due.—Aristotle.

LABOR of head or labor of hand is needful to health of mind and body.—F. W. Newman.

WHEN old people go back to their childhood, what things do they remember most?—Anon.

WORK runs through the universe: it is the condition of permanence and growth.—John Wise.

ONE knows very well that in reducing ideals to practice, great latitude of toleration is needed.—Carlyle.

WHEN men grow virtuous in their old age, they only make a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.—Pope.

THE milk of human kindness, like other milk, is very apt to turn sour when affected by moral thunder and lightning.—Anon.

DEATH is but a valet who after a hard ride through bog and mud, takes off our dirty garments and clothes us in purple and fine linen. —Anon.

WE are members of one great body. Nature planted in us a mutual love, and fitted us for social life. We must consider that we were born for the good of the whole.—Seneca.

GIVE me the storm and tempest of thought and action rather than the dead calm of ignorance and faith! Banish me from Eden when you will; but first let me eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge.—Ingersoll.

WHAT do you remember about your mother that is gone? Not anything by which she was formally known to the world, but some picture some scene of tenderness, some fragment sentiment which lingers in your imaginations.—Anon.

IT is dangerous to gather flowers that grow on the banks of the pit of hell, for fear of falling in. Yea, they which play with the devils rattles will be brought by degrees to wield his sword, and from making of sport they come to doing of mischief.—Fuller.

DOTH not the heart create—invent? Doth it not dream? Doth it not form its idol out of air? Goeth it not forth into the future, to prophesy to itself? And, sooner or later, in age or youth, doth it not wake itself at last, and see how it hath wasted itself on follies?—Anon.

THE central pivot of the universe is life, and around that pivot are circling individual atoms, each one of the countless number imagining itself the only important and necessary link that keeps the great universal whole in upright, proper, and perpetual motion.—Lessie N. Goodell.

EVERY schism is an idea; every scheme more or less new implies an idea mere or less original; every scheme proceeded with implies an idea vivid enough to prompt action; and every scheme which succeeds implies an idea so accurate and exhaustive that the results correspond with it.—Herbert Spencer.

IT is idleness that creates impossibilities; and where men care not to do a thing, they shelter themselves under a persuasion that it cannot be done. The shortest and the surest way to prove a work possible, is strenuously to set about it; and no wonder if that proves it possible that for the most part makes it so. —Washington Irving.

WHEN a great man, who has engrossed our thoughts, our conjectures, our homage, dies, a gap seems suddenly left in the world; a wheel in the mechanism of our own being appears abruptly still; a portion of ourselves; and not our worst portion—for how many pure, high, generous sentiments it contains, dies with him.—Eugene Aram.

WHEN one object passes away and is succeeded by another, the cause of the disappearance and reproduction still remains, as it is an eternal operation; the powers of production, preservation, dissolution, and renovation reside in nature; they are attributes of nature; every thing is renewed in the bosom of death.—Epicurus.

TO BE no better, no wiser, no greater than the past is to be little, and foolish, and bad; it is to misapply noble means, to sacrifice glorious opportunities for the performance of sublime deeds, to become cumberers of the ground. We can and must transcend our predecessors in their efforts to give joy, peace, and liberty to the world.—William Lloyd Garrison.

OH the grave! the grave! It buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment. From its peaceful bosom spring nought but fond regrets and tender recollections. Who can look down upon the grave, even of an enemy, without feeling a compunctious throb that he should have warred with the poor handful of dust that lies mouldering beneath him?—Washington Irving.

THE ignorant and unthinking have no idea beyond the present, the now and to-day: so they say, "Eat, drink, and be merry," but as we trace the effect of moral and intellectual culture upon the mind of the individual and of the race, we perceive a gradual evolution of that grander and higher nature which makes provision for the future, which gathers and hoards up sustenance for the subsequent needs of body and mind, which looks forward to the future welfare and happiness not only of self, but of the family and of the whole coming race, and builds and plans in consideration thereof. These wider and broader views increase and grow in proportion as we evolute from the plane of a lower into that of a higher civilization.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

"WHEN tempted to anger," says a writer, "breathe a prayer." Jes' so. When you happen to stub your toe, for instance, murmur: "Now I lame me."

NOTHING tries the patience of a man more than to be sitting on a sofa in a dark room with a pretty girl, and be compelled to listen to her brother giving the history of a base-ball club.

ONE of the most disgusting things known is to have a vest which has not sufficient longitude to enable it to connect with the trousers below, especially when the shirt billoweth up between the two.

"MR. PRESIDENT," said a Buffalo Alderman, "I makes der motion as der new jail be built on der same spot as der old jail what's now stand; dat saves der money for der land. I makes der motion as der old jail shall not be pull down till der new jail is built, so ve vill not be widout der jail."

COUGH DROPS BY JOSH BILLINGS.

Bachelors are always a bragging of their freedom! Freedom to darn their own stockings and poultice their own shins. I had rather be a widower once in two years, regular, than to be a grunting, old, hair-dyed bachelor only for ninety days.

Ambition to shine in everything is a sure way to put a man's candle all out.

Some people won't believe anything they can't prove; the things I can't prove are the very things I believe the most.

Good examples among rulers are the best laws they can enact.

One of the saddest sights of all to me is an old man, poor and deserted, whom I once knew living in ease and luxury.

He who spends his younger days in dissipation is mortgaging himself to disease and poverty, two inexorable creditors, who are certain to foreclose at last, and take possession of the premises.

The world owes all its energies and refinement to luxuries—digging roots for breakfast and going naked for clothes is the virtuous innocence of a lazy savage.

Prudes are coquettes gone to seed.

A dandy in love is in just about as bad a fix as a stick of molasses candy that has half melted.

There is no good substitute for wisdom, but silence is the best that has been discovered yet.

There are lots of folks in this world who, rather than not find any fault at all, wouldn't hesitate to say to an angle-worm that his tail was altogether too long for the rest of his body.

A man who is good company for himself is always good company for others.

Cunning is too apt to outwit itself. The man who turned the boat over and got under it to keep out of the rain was one of this kind.

I have seen men who had worn out their vices and supposed of course that they were living on their virtues.

The man who dies the richest is the one who leaves the least here and takes the most with him.

WILYUM'S WATERMILLON.

You, Willyum, come 'ere sir, kernegiate! Whut dat you got under dat box?

Disgracin' yo' ole Christian mammy, an' makin her leave cookin' dinner!

Now, ain't you asham'd o' yo'se'f, sir? I am asham'd you's my son!
An' de good old Recorderer Angel, he's asham'd, sir, o' what you has done;
An' he's wroted it down up yonder, in burnin' an' great big letters,
"One watermillion, stoled by Wilyum Isaac Pettus."

An' whut do you s'pose Brudder Bascom, yo' teacher at Sunday-school,
Would say, ef he knowed how awful you's gressioned de Golden Rule?
Boy! whar is de raisin' I gied you? Is you boun' fur to be a black villiun?
I'm s'prised dat a chile of yo' mammy would steal any man's watermillion.

An' I'm gwine now to cut it right open, an' you, sir, shan't have narry bite!
Fur a boy who will steal watermillions—an' right in de open day light—
Ain't—Lawdy! its GREEN! Abe Lincoln! Abe L-i-n-c-o-l-n! make 'as'e wi' dat switch!
Well! stealin' a g-r-e-e-n wa-ter-mil-lion! who ever heerd tell of jis sich?

Can't tell when dey's ripe? W'y thump um—an' when dey go punk dey is green;
But when dey go punk, now you mind me, dey is ripe—an, dat's jes whut I mean!
An' nex' time you hook watermillions, you heerd me, you ign'ant young hunk!
Ef you don't wan't a lickin' all over, be sho' dat dey all 'll go "punk!"

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 35. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, August 31, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

WHY doesn't the Pope issue a bull against the yellow fever?

AN Ohio woman died not long ago at the advanced age of 117 years.

THE Christain Bulgarians continue to plunder and outrage the Mussulmans.

IT is now proposed to issue irredeemable greenbacks to the amount of five hundred dollars for every man, woman, and child in the country.

OVER one thousand applications have been made for positions in the New York Custom House since the advent of the new Collector, but there is only one vacancy.

A MODERN Jesus Christ, named Lazzeretti, arose in Italy a few days ago and proclaimed himself prophet and king. He was promptly killed. He had twelve apostles and three thousand followers at the time of his death.

IT is eighteen hundred and odd years since a Christian gentleman named Paul wrote to one Timothy, "I suffer not a woman to teach, or to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence." And now as many as twenty-nine women are advertising in the Chicago papers as conducting religious services and preaching on a single Sunday.

PROF. STEWART of San Francisco puts forward this theory as to why earthquakes have become rare in that region: "At all seasons of the year there is vastly more moisture in the air in the Atlantic States than in California, and I firmly believe that our overcharged coast is being constantly relieved of its plus electricity by the iron of the overland railway, and that California eartqhuakes are now appearing in the form of frightful tornadoes and electrical storms east of the Rocky Mountains.

SOME time ago the religious press overstocked a confiding public with cheap chromos as premiums. Then it took to dictionaries, which were much more costly than the chromos, and troublesome to send to the subscribers. The rage this year is for watches, which are offered for subscriptions at prices so low as to make people wonder whether they are real watches or make-believe ones, stuffed with sawdust. A prodigious business is being transacted with these watches.

"HAVE you got your lesson to-day?" asked a Brooklyn Sunday-school teacher of a little maiden, whose head was bandaged in red flannel. "No, ma'am," said the child. "Well, then, have you got your catechism?" "No, ma'am," again answered the child. "Well, have you got your hymn?" The child drawled out, "No, ma'am." "Well, then, I'd like to know what you have got?" impatiently continued the teacher. "Please, ma'am, I've got the mumps," patiently responded the little unfortunate.

IT it said that some of the Methodist Conferences are considering the matter of insuring their own churches, instead of patronizing the insurance companies. They are led to this by the failure of some of the companies in which churches have been insured. The last thing a Conference ought to do is to go into the earthly insurance business. If they confine themselves strictly to their legitimate line, the post mortem fire insurance business, even if not successful, we will never hear of their failures, for "Out of Hell there is no redemption."

WALTER SCOTT loved to tell a story of a certain Baronet who made himself the host of a number of Presbyterian ministers, seven of whom were put into a capacious many-bedded room, where the butler had carefully provided for each a Bible and a bottle of beer. "My friend," said one of the divines, addressing this functionary, after a short general consultation, "you must know that the youngest member reads aloud a portion of Scripture to the rest; only one Bible, therefore, is necessary. So take away the other six, and in their place bring six more bottles of ale."

THE DEED OF TWO BRUTAL MONKS.—Near Kieff there is a monastery of the Russian Church. Several students, while walking with their professor, discovered the body of a girl of thirteen hanging to a tree. They succeeded in cutting the rope and applying restoratives before life was extinct, but they were interrupted in their humane work by the monks of the institution, who declared that the girl had been put to death because she was possessed of a demon. The story goes that the child belonged to an honorable family, and that the monks had attempted to murder her after one of their number had subjected her to brutal treatment.

THE people of Moscow declare that their great bell shall never be pulled down from its glittering steeple, where it reigns over all other church bells in the world. Its weight is 443,772 pounds, while the other famous bells are light in comparison: St. Paul's, London, 13,000 pounds; Antwerp, 16,000; Oxford, 17,000; York, 24,000; Montreal, 29,000; Rome, 19.000; Bruges, 23,000; Cologne, 25,000; Erfurt, 30,000; English House of Parliament, 31,000; Vienna, 40,000; Novgorod, 69,000; Pekin, 136,000; Sens, 34,000; Moscow (its second), 141,000. The great bell of Moscow is 19 feet high and 64 feet round; its noise is tremendous.

THE curate of a church near Kidderminster in England has been dismissed by the rector for presuming to wear during service a pair of trousers, the color of which was considered a violation of good taste. The people sympathize with the curate, and show their sympathy by declaring that they will present him with a testimonial. This should be a pair of trousers of just such color as it pleases him to wear. In this country black was formerly the universal garb of the clergymen, but now some are so bold as to appear in the pulpit with apparel of various fashionable shades. Among the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal and the Catholic churches the regulation style of dress continues to prevail. The Baptists and Congregationalists exercise the largest liberty as to costume and color.

ONE of the surgeons with Admiral Hornby's fleet in the East, writes thus of the Bulgarian Christians, whom he calls "the most lying, dishonest, and bloodthirsty race under the sun:" "I could not trust them with common food, for if I did not see them eat it they would sell it for grog; then, feeling brave, would steal some more. These orthodox church-goers are so thoroughly bad in every way that it makes one have great sympathy with the Mohammedan contempt for them. I hope to go up to Philippopolis, Sophia, Orchanieh, and Plevna at the end of the month, but I know what I shall see; all the bad qualities of human nature in power, lust, murder, and plunder rampant, and the fairest portion of earth's surface in the hands of the worst of its inhabitants. Several years' service at different times in this country has removed the cloud from my eyes, which blinds the rabid Moscophils at home."

IN a village graveyard in Lancashire, England, an Episcopalian rector refused to read the burial service over the body of a child, having learned, after he reached the ground, that the child was unbaptized. There was considerable excitement in the midst of which somebody started the hymn, "Safe in the arms of Jesus," in which the multitude joined lustily. The voice of the indignant rector was heard above the music of the hymn crying out, "It's all hypocrisy; the child is lost." This is a terrible warning to parents. That poor, innocent child must roast and broil and stew and fry and sizzle all through the endless ages to come, and in an Episcopal hell, too, which, as all theological explorers and experts know, takes rank among the hottest and strictest of hells. By all means, parents, have your little innocents baptized, even though you are compelled to beg or borrow or steal the money with which to pay the parson.

FREETHINKER'S JUBILEE.—Next Thursday there is to be a convention of Freethinkers at the town of Watkins, near which Watkins Glen is situated. Fred. Douglas, James Parton, Geo. W. Julian, and Elizur Wright are expected to address the meeting. We shall be anxious to read the reports of the speeches made, for some clever, a few wise, and a good many funny things will be sure to be said. The principle of free thinking is admirable, signifying, as it does, merely a freedom to think as one pleases. There is also a sense in which Freelove is admirable, though that is not the sense in which the word is generally employed. The legitimate and admirable meaning is freedom to love whom one chooses, provided, in doing so, he wrongs no one else. However, the actual reason why both Freethinkers and Freelovers are visited with so much and such severe criticism is because of the extravagance of their claims, and the outlandishness of their theories. Taking them as a whole, they are not a well-balanced set. We do not demand that they shall be conservative, for if they were they would cease to think freely; but we do demand that the majority of them should have more of the balance of common sense. Men and women of genius are to be found among them, but the common sense people are few.—Telegram.

THE following is the nauseating speech of the leader of four beastly negroes who were hung in Donaldsonville, La., for a peculiarly brutal murder. It is a specimen of the effects of certain religious teachings which led the blackest criminals to look upon themselves as martyrs, ready to be received into the arms of a forgiving Savior: "Good morning. Welcome all. I came to tell you all to-day that God has done freed my soul. I'll soon be up yonder. God has freed me from the greedy jaws of hell. I stand before you now. In a little while I will be setting in my Father's kingdom. Fare you well, world—I'll meet you all in heaven. Jesus is waiting for me now. I'm going to the land of God, where there's no sickness, no trials, no backbiters. Last night when I went to rest I saw a big crowd of 10,000,000 Indians, and right behind them 10,000,000 more of all colors and all nations. I'm not guilty—I am not guilty; before my God I know nothing about that for which I am to suffer. I ain't got time now to talk about it—I must talk about Jesus. I thank you all everybody. Weep and pray, all of you, and meet me in heaven."

AT the dedication of a church, the other day the officiating clergyman expressed his belief that his deceased predecessor in the holy office of pastor was spiritually present. Why not bodily? The dead are fond of religious ceremonies of this character. At the consecration of a new convent near Tours, in the sixteenth century, all the nuns who had died in the old one arose and passed around the new edifice three times, chanting a hymn. This is related by Brabius, who seems to have risen from his own grave to relate it, for his account of it is dated 1583, whereas he died in 1567. When the church in which Charlemagne was afterward buried (in the discarded sarcophagus of Augustus) was consecrated in 804 there were present 363 prelates of the Church. (The world was not then afflicted with a famine of clergymen. It has not been since.) Two bishops of Tongres then arose from their graves at Maestricht and attended the performance in order to make the number of prelates equal to the number of days in a year. If you do not believe it, reader, you can easily satisfy yourself that a year has exactly 365 days. What more would you have? —The Argonaut.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER XII.

Leaving the sorrowing, yet patiently resigned family of the Darwins to find solace for their loss in clinging yet closer to the joys that still remained, and in building up little by little new shrines upon which to lay the sweet and holy offerings of love, we will now take up the thread of Jennie Martin's web of life, and see whereunto it leads. She is one destined by force of circumstances to live a varied and useful life, one full of duties, of work, and of blessing to her kind. As a wife and mother, she will never know the sweet, womanly joys and blisses, cares and anxieties that most of her sex accept as the only inevitable end for which they were created. But as holy, natural, and happifying as the marital relations are, it is not every woman's duty to enter upon them; nor should the whole end of her girlish aims be directed to winning a companion for life. The great world has need of something more from woman than the mere duty of making a home happy for some man and rearing his children. The female element is needed throughout all the social, moral, intellectual, and governmental departments of our land. Woman is needed in the full vigor, enthusiasm, and magnetism of her youthfulness. She is needed before she has spent her best days in brooding over a family of dependent little ones whom she can never rear as they should be, for the very reason that her own mother was too young, too immature, too unlearned to train her own mind into paths of knowledge, science, and true culture. No woman can rear and train a family and educate them and herself at the same time, especially if she has the thousand multifarious cares and duties of household labor to perform, as well as the family sewing, gardening, poultry-yard, etc., etc., to attend to. Of course our Jennie did not realize all this in its fullest sense, but when a mere girl she had read a few strong articles on woman's rights, and they had so impressed her that she had learned even then to ignore the command that is so often hurled at poor overburdened mothers who so piteously beg for a rest from too frequent child-bearing (the holy word of God says to every one of his children, "Increase, multiply, and replenish the earth").

Jennie having become convinced that she was now sufficiently well grounded in her new opinions to be able to give her father good reasons for holding them, wrote to him and in as gentle a manner as possible informed him of her "fall from grace," told him that the date of her doubts was from the afternoon when she had heard the conversation between Mr. Lusk and himself about the Cushites. She told him that her aunt Mary believed just as she did, and that they had been reading all the Liberal books they could get, all the best ones especially, and that her aunt had subscribed to THE TRUTH SEEKER, an Infidel paper, and that she had now come to the conclusion that it was best to tell him, and to ask him to give her every argument in favor of religion that he could, so that if it was possible for her to ever believe again, he might be the one to win her back. She knew in her own mind that no one could ever make her believe any more in the old myths, fables, and traditions, but she thought that it would not fall with such a stunning force upon her father to know that she had become an Infidel if he could be made to think there was a chance of his arguing her out of her new opinions. She knew her father was a stern man, but a very just one. She knew it would be a hard and severe blow to him, but he must know it some time, and she preferred he should hear of it while away, rather than have him come home and talk with her face to face while the sorrow was strongest upon him. She had never willingly grieved him in all her life, and she felt that if she met his sad, sorrowing countenance as she told him of her Infidelity, it would be almost more than she could bear. She knew, too, she could write things she would not have the heart to say, and that they could both talk more freely on paper than they could face to face.

When her letter was done she read it to her aunt Mary, who pronounced it "very good," and just what was the best to have been said. She sent it off and then waited with anxious impatience for the reply, and when it came she went to her room to read it, for she could not bear that even her dear aunt should witness her conflict of emotions as she perused what she felt would be a great burthen of sorrow and wailing from the innermost depths of the good old man's heart.

She tremblingly tore off the envelope, and read as follows:

O MY DEAR, DARLING, UNFORTUNATE CHILD! O! I'm miserable! What have I done that this horror should fall upon me in my old age? Can it be possible that the God I have so long served, loved, and worshiped has sent upon me this direful, awful, terrible affliction? My child whom I have guarded as the apple of my eye! my darling whom I have kept from all taint of unbelief! my child! my own child! O how my heart throbs and beats with anguish for thee. What can I do? what can I say? O God! help thou me in this awful hour of supremest woe! My soul is sick and faint within me. O Jennie, Jennie, beloved child, my darling dead wife, how could you so grieve, shock, and horrify me? For hours and hours after receiving your letter I sat as one stunned and dead. I have thought till thought was the direst agony; I have revolved and revolved in my heart every argument I could think of. O! how can I convert you once more back to the pure, loving Gospel truths of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ? O! have I lived to see my child deny her Creator and turn against her blessed Savior and Redeemer? It cannot be. It is a dream, a delusion, a wicked snare of the devil to tempt me to 'curse God and die.' It is all a hallucination, and I shall, I must, I will rouse myself from it. . . . Am I awake? O, yes, it is not quite so bad as I feared. My child! my child! I have just had such a horrid, horrid vision, and I believe God sent it as a warning to you.

"Just as I had written the last word of the foregoing sentence, I dropped on my knees to pray to the Lord to help me say something that would turn you once more in his blessed ways, and suddenly I seemed to be standing on the brink of a great gulf of lurid darkness, of indescribable blackness, and yet somehow illuminated with a death-like, corpse-like phosphorescence. I looked down into the fathomless abyss with a strange yearning, longing gaze, and all at once my eyes seemed to be touched with a supernatural magnetism, and I saw clearly, O such horrid sights, such woe unutterable that my pen could never, never describe it. Suffice it to say, that amidst all that foul, unseemly horde of earth's foulest offscouring I saw you, my child, my heart's darling, and all around you were the horrid, loathsome forms of drunken, lecherous, beastly, disgusting beings, too foul, too awful to be called men, and they were caressing with their bloated lips and filthy hands your beautiful limbs and sweet mouth that no unholy touch had ever before profaned. O! never, never shall I forget the supreme agony that was imprinted upon your anguished, upturned face as your eyes met mine. You shrieked out in wild, imploring tones for me to save you. But alas! I was too infinitely distant from you to do aught but look and weep. It was too late! No power on earth or in heaven could save you. The die was cast. You had rejected the Savior, and now he had forever and forever forsaken you. You did not accept him when he was willing to listen to you, and now it was vain to plead and pray for mercy or to expect aid from God or man. Once more your anguished, pleading, terror-stricken voice fell upon my ear, thrilling my soul with a death-like agony such as no mortal man could bear and live. I fell to the ground (or seemed to) as if shot by an unseen hand, and a merciful oblivion veiled all sights and sounds from my senses.

"I think it must have been hours ere I came too, for I have no idea of the time as it passed from the moment of first getting your letter till I awoke from that sleep of apparent death. It was three o'clock in the afternoon when the letter came, and when I revived it was midnight and all was dark around me. I for a moment thought I had fallen into the horrid abyss that had apparently yawned at my feet, but as soon as I began to fully recover I saw by the glimmer of a street-lamp through the half-closed blinds that I was really here in my room, and that all hope was not quite gone. O, my darling! what can I do, what can I say to help you at this fatal, fatal crisis? Now, now, is the accepted time. O listen ere it is too late. O that you could see as I saw the awful fate that will surely be yours if you do not turn once more to the blessed Savior who suffered, bled, and died for you!

"'Argue,' how can I argue? What can I say that I have not said a thousand times over in the pulpit, as well as in the sacred sanctuary of home? Have we not read together God's holy word and the lives and writings of all the holy fathers and the sainted martyrs, and of pious, good men who have given all for God and his cause? But I'll try. I'll do anything you ask, vain though I feel it would be. Write all you wish, pour out every Infidel argument you can, I'll combat them one by one with the holy strength of a father's love. I'll pray to God and the blessed Redeemer to help me. I must, I will save you from the snares Satan has set for your soul. I would come home at once and pray with you, but my sister is not expected to live the week out. I am her only brother, and she says she cannot part with me till death severs us. But I may be able to write something that will do you more good than even personal conversation will."

WE TAKE the following notice of our friend, Mrs. Henrietta Buckner, from the Paris North Texas. We are sure it is not too extravagant in her praise:

The school advertisement of Mrs. Buckner will be found in another column. It is only necessary to announce that she will teach to insure a good school. There is no disguising the fact that she is one of the very best teachers in all the section, and it is right that success should attend her labors. Her buildings are an ornament to the city, and are a monument to her industry and enterprise. We are glad to know that Mrs. Buckner is a fixture in this city, and trust that she may be long spared in her field of usefulness.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

But the power of free locomotion, and hence, also, of active migration, is not confined to animals alone, but many plants likewise enjoy it. Many lower aquatic plants, especially the class of the Tangles (Algæ), swim about freely in the water in early life, like the lower animals just mentioned, by means of a vibratile hairy coat, a vibrating whip, or a covering of tremulous fringes, and only at a later period adhere to objects. Even in the case of many higher plants, which we designate as creepers and climbing plants, we may speak of active migration. Their elongated stalks and perennial roots creep or climb during their long process of growth to new positions, and by means of their widespread branches they acquire new habitations, to which they attach themselves by buds, and bring forth new colonies of individuals of their species.

Influential as these active migrations of most animals and many plants are, yet alone they would by no means be sufficient to explain the chorology of organisms. Passive migrations have ever been by far the more important, and of far greater influence, in the case of most plants and in that of many animals. Such passive changes of locality are produced by extremely numerous causes. Air and water in their eternal motion, wind and waves with their manifold currents, play the chief part. The wind in all places and at all times raises light organisms, small animals and plants, but especially their young germs, animal eggs and plant seeds, and carries them far over land and seas. Where they fall into the water they are seized by currents or waves and carried to other places. It is well known, from numerous examples, how far in many cases trunks of trees, hard shelled fruits, and other not readily perishable portions of plants are carried away from their original home by the course of rivers and by the currents of the sea. Trunks of palm trees from the West Indies are brought by the Gulf Stream to the British and Norwegian coasts. All large rivers bring down driftwood from the mountains, and frequently alpine plants are carried from their home at the source of the river into the plains, and even further, down to the sea. Frequently numerous inhabitants live between the roots of the plants thus carried down, and between the branches of the trees thus washed away there are various inhabitants which have to take part in the passive migration. The bark of the tree is covered with mosses, lichens, and parasitic insects. Other insects, spiders, etc., even small reptiles and mammals, are hidden within the hollow trunk or cling to the branches. In the earth adhering to the fibres of the roots, in the dust lying in the cracks of the bark, there are innumerable germs of smaller animals and plants. Now, if the trunk thus washed away lands safely on a foreign shore or on a distant island, the guests who had to take part in the involuntary voyage can leave their boat and settle in the new country. A very remarkable kind of water-transport is formed by the floating icebergs which annually become loosened from the eternal ice of the Polar Sea. Although these cold regions are thinly peopled, yet many of their inhabitants, who were accidently upon an iceberg while it was becoming loosened, are carried away with it by the currents, and landed on warmer shores. In this manner, by means of loosened blocks of ice from the northern Polar Sea, often whole populations of small animals and plants have been carried to the northern shores of Europe and America. Nay, even polar foxes and polar bears have been carried in this way to Iceland and to the British Isles.

Transport by air is no less important than transport by water in this matter of passive migration. The dust covering our streets and roofs, the earth lying on dry fields and dried-up pools, the light moist soil of forests, in short, the whole surface of the globe contains millions of small organisms and their germs. Many of these small animals and plants can without injury become completely dried up, and awake again to life as soon as they are moistened. Every gust of wind raises up with the dust innumerable little creatures of this kind, and often carries them away to other places miles off. But even larger organisms, and especially their germs, may often make distant passive journeys through the air. The seeds of many plants are provided with light feathery processes, which act as parachutes and facilitate their flight in the air, and prevent their falling. Spiders make journeys of many miles through the air on their fine filaments, their so-called gossamer threads. Young frogs are frequently raised by whirlwinds into the air by thousands, and fall down in a distant part as a "shower of frogs." Storms may carry birds and insects across half the earth's circumference. They drop in the United States, having risen in England. Starting from California, they only come to rest in China. But, again, many other organisms may make the journey from one continent to another with the birds and insects. Of course all parasites, the number of which is legion, fleas, lice, mites, moulds, etc., migrate with the organisms upon which they live. In the earth which often remains sticking to the claws of birds there are also small animals and plants or their germs. Thus the voluntary or nvoluntary migration of a single larger organism may carry a whole small flora and fauna from one part of the earth to another.

Besides the means of transport here mentioned, there are many others which explain the distribution of animal and vegetable species over the large tracts of the earth's surface, and especially the general distribution of the so-called cosmopolitan species. But these alone would not nearly be sufficient to explain all chorological facts. How is it, for example, that many inhabitants of fresh water live in various rivers or lakes far away and quite apart from one another? How is it that many inhabitants of mountains, which cannot exist in plains, are found upon entirely separated and far distant chains of mountains? It is difficult to believe, and in many cases quite inconceivable, that these inhabitants of fresh water should have in any way, actively or passively, migrated over the land lying between the lakes, or that the inhabitants of mountains in any way, actively or passively, crossed the plains lying between their mountain homes. But here geology comes to our help, as a mighty ally, and completely solves these difficult problems for us.

The history of the earth's development shows us that the distribution of land and water on its surface is ever and continually changing. In consequence of geological changes of the earth's crust, elevations and depressions of the ground take place everywhere, sometimes more strongly marked in one place, sometimes in another. Even if they happen so slowly that in the course of centuries the seashore rises or sinks only a few inches, or even only a few lines, still they nevertheless effect great results in the course of long periods of time. And long—immeasurably long—periods of time have not been wanting in the earth's history. During the course of many millions of years, ever since organic life existed on the earth, land and water have perpetually struggled for supremacy. Continents and islands have sunk into the sea, and new ones have arisen out of its bosom. Lakes and seas have slowly been raised and dried up, and new water basins have arisen by the sinking of the ground. Peninsulas have become islands by the narrow neck of land which connected them with the mainland sinking into the water. The islands of an archipelago have become the peaks of a continuous chain of mountains by the whole floor of their sea being considerably raised.

Thus the Mediterranean at one time was an inland sea, when, in the place of the Straits of Gibraltar, an isthmus connected Africa with Spain. England, even during the more recent history of the earth, when man already existed, has repeatedly been connected with the European continent and been repeatedly separated from it. Nay, even Europe and North America have been directly connected. The South Sea at one time formed a large Pacific Continent, and the numerous little islands which now lie scattered in it were simply the highest peaks of the mountains covering that continent. The Indian Ocean formed a continent which extended from the Sunda Islands along the southern coast of Asia to the east coast of Africa. This large continent of former times Sclater, an Englishman, has called Lemuria, from the monkey-like animals which inhabited it, and it is at the same time of great importance from being the probable cradle of the human race, which in all likelihood here first developed out of anthropoid apes. The important proof which Alfred Wallace has furnished, by the help of chorological facts, that the present Malayan Archipelago consists in reality of two completely different divisions, is particularly interesting. The western division, the Indo-Malayan Archipelago, comprising the large islands of Borneo, Java, and Sumatra, was formerly connected by Malacca with the Asiatic continent, and probably also with the Lemurian continent just mentioned. The eastern division, on the other hand, the Austro-Malayan Archipelago, comprising Celebes, the Moluccas, New Guinea, Solomon's Islands, etc., was formerly directly connected with Australia. Both divisions were formerly two continents separated by a strait, but they have now for the most part sunk below the level of the sea. Wallace, solely on the ground of his accurate chorological observations, has been able in the most acute manner to determine the position of this former strait, the south end of which passes between Balij and Lombok.

Thus, ever since liquid water existed on the earth, the boundaries of water and land have eternally changed, and we may assert that the outlines of continents and islands have never remained for an hour, nay even for a minute, exactly the same. For the waves eternally and perpetually break on the edge of the coast, and whatever the land in these places loses in extent, it gains in other places by the accumulation of mud, which condenses into solid stone and again rises above the level of the sea as new land. Nothing can be more erroneous than the idea of a firm and unchangeable outline of our continents, such as is impressed upon us in early youth by defective lessons on geography, which are devoid of a geological basis.

I need hardly draw attention to the fact that these geological changes of the earth's surface have ever been exceedingly important to the migrations of organisms, and consequently to their Chorology. From them we learn to understand how it is that the same or nearly related species of animals and plants can occur on different islands, although they could not have passed through the water separating them, and how other species living in fresh water can inhabit different inclosed water-basins, although they could not have crossed the land lying between them. These islands were formerly mountain peaks of a connected continent, and these lakes were once directly connected with one another. The former were separated by geological depressions, the latter by elevations. Now, if we further consider how often and how unequally these alternating elevations and depressions occur on the different parts of the earth, and how, in consequence of this, the boundaries of the geographical tracts of distribution of species become changed, and if we further consider in what exceedingly various ways the active and passive migrations of organisms must have been influenced by them, then we shall be in a position to completely understand the great variety of the picture which is at present offered to us by the distribution of animal and vegetable species.

"A very natural curiosity calls us to inquire," says Moshiem, "how it happened that the Romans who were troublesome to no nation on account of its religion, and who suffered even the Jews to live under their own laws and follow their own method of worship, treated the Christians alone with such severity. . . A principal reason of the severity with which the Romans persecuted the Christians notwithstanding these considerations, seems to have been the abhorrence and contempt, felt by the latter for the religion of the Empire, which was so intimately connected with the form, and indeed with the very essence of its political constitution; for though the Roman gave an unlimited toleration to all religions which had nothing in their tenets dangerous to the commonwealth, yet they would not permit that of their ancestors, which was established by the laws of the land, to be turned into derision, nor the people to be drawn away from their attachment to it. These however were the two things with which the Christians were charged, and that justly, though to their honor. They dared to ridicule the absurdities of the pagan superstition, and they were ardent and assiduous in gaining proselytes to the truth" (Ecc. Hist., vol. 1, p. 30).

The persecutions of the Christians by the pagans, it is now universally conceded by Christian historians, have been greatly exaggerated; Christians have killed in one day for their faith nearly half as many heretics as all the Christians put to death by the pagans during the whole period of the pagan Empire.

"We may search in vain," says Renan, "the Roman law before Constantine for a single passage against freedom of thought, and the history of the imperial government furnishes no instance of a prosecution for entertaining an abstract doctrine" (Apostles, p. 259).

The teachings and examples of the Stoics were not without their force and influence. "The austere purity of their lives and the heroic grandeur of their deaths kept alive the tradition of Roman liberty even under a Nero or a Domitian." "To the Stoics and the Roman lawyers," says Lecky, "is mainly due the clear recognition of the existence of a law of nature above and beyond all human enactments which has been the basis of the best moral and most influential though most chimerical speculations of later ages, and the renewed study of Roman law was an important element in the revival that preceded the Reformation" (Hist. Morals, vol. i, p. 287).

The same writer tells us that the golden age of Roman law was not Christian, but pagan. It was "in the reign of pagan emperors, and especially of Hadrian and Alexander Severus, that nearly all the most important measures were taken redressing injustices, elevating oppressed classes, and making the doctrine of the natural equality and fraternity of mankind the basis of legal enactment. Receiving the heritage of those laws, the Christians, no doubt, added something; but a careful examination will show that it was surprisingly little" (Ibid, vol. ii, p. 42).

With the polytheism that existed there was general dissatisfaction. Thinking minds regarded the whole system that prevailed as a superstition. Virgil, Seneca, Quintilian, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, all speak of God as the "Father of men" and the "Preserver of worlds." Cicero, Seneca, Plutarch, and the later Platonists generally, maintain that the special deities mean but the various powers of the one God.

As Gibbon says, when Tertullian or Lactantius employed their labors in exposing the follies and extravagance of paganism, "they had only to transcribe the eloquence of Cicero or the wit of Lucan." Although the ministers of the established religion continued to perform the ancient rites according to the laws of their country, philosophic and reflecting minds generally, although treating them with respect on public occasions, felt only contempt for them; and the people, "from the master to the menial slave who waited at his table, and who eagerly listened to the freedom of his conversation," were filled with doubts respecting the popular faith. The established faith no longer satisfied an age in which the tendencies were toward monotheism. It is unquestionable that the unity of the empire had helped to create a demand for a religious unity. An able writer has claimed, and justly, I think, that the deification of emperors was an unconscious effort to realize this device for a monotheistic faith. The religion of this period, although the necessity for its existence was continually urged in the professed interests of order and virtue, as that of Christianity is to-day, did very little, if anything, to restrain the ignorant and the vicious, while its old stereotyped forms and ceremonies and mythological fables were undoubtedly an obstacle to reform and advancement. This fact, together with the tendencies I have mentioned, directing the mind to one sole divinity instead of a multitude of godlings, explains in part the rapid progress of the Christian Church.

During all this time, philosophy, as much as it has been sneered at by Christian theologians, from St. Paul down to the present time, was a constant protest against superstition and vice alike.

"There was as much grandeur," says Renan, "in the struggle of philosophy in the first century as in that of Christianity; but how unequal has been the recompense" (Apostles, p. 277). "It is thine to murder," said Helvidius Pricus to Vespasian; "it is mine to die." "You may menace me with death, but nature threatens you," said Demetrius the cynic to Nero. But superstition triumphed over philosophy, and while religious martyrs became an object of veneration amounting to worship, the martyrs of philosophy are unhonored and forgotten.

A few words in regard to the intellectual condition of the pagan Empire. The age of Augustus, we all know, was one of the most brilliant in history. It was an age of learning, elegance, and refinement. The brighter periods of literature have since taken name from Augustus. The age which gave to the world those two great luminaries in the hemisphere of letters, Bacon and Shakspere, is still called the Augustan Age of English literature.

Greece was still a land of letters. Though plundered of her richest ornaments, and dependent for protection on Rome, Athens could still boast of schools and scholars worthy of her fairest days. Alexandria was also a seat of learning. Regarding the Germans, Celts, and Britons, although comparatively unenlightened, Mosheim tells us "it is certain they were not destitute of learned and ingenious men." Among the Gauls, the people of Marseilles had long acquired a shining reputation for their progress in the sciences, and there is no doubt that the neighboring countries received the benefit of their instruction. . . . The Romans, indeed, introduced letters and philosophy into all the provinces which submitted to their victorious arms, in order to soften the rough manners of the savage nations, and infuse in them imperceptibly the sentiment and feelings of humanity" (Ecc. Hist., vol. i, p. 36).

After the age of Augustus there was an intellectual decline. "The schooled and lettered amateur," says Renan, "replaced the creative and original student." Intelligent society continued, however, and men like Lucilius, Pliny, Gallio, and the Senecas still lived to adorn the age. After the accession of Trajan this decay of intellect and degeneracy of erudition was arrested, and philosophy and letters were restored, in some degree, to their former luster. Looking forward from the middle of the first century, Renan exclaims, "Plutarch, Epictetus, Dionysius the golden-mouthed, Quintilian, Pliny the Younger, Tacitus, Juvenal, Rufus of Ephesus, Aretalus, Galen, Ptolemy, Hypsicles, Theon, and Lucan will renew the palmy days of Greece—not that inimitable Greece which existed but once for the simultaneous delight and despair of all who love the beautiful, but a Greece abounding, which will mingle her own gifts with the Roman genius, and produce works of novelty and originality, yet able to charm the world" (Apostles, p. 268–9).

The accurate historian Hallam, speaking of the times of Marcus Aurelius, says: "There were men who made the age famous—grave lawyers, judicious historians, wise philosophers; the name of learning was honorable, its professors were encouraged, and along the vast surface of the Roman Empire was, perhaps, a greater number whose minds were cultivated by intellectual discipline than under the more brilliant reign of the Cæsars" (Middle Ages, p. 451).

THE popular pride of undeviating "consistency"—of not changing your opinions, not acknowledging yourself mistaken—is the Apolyon of our bottomless pit of wickedness. Beware of men who refuse to look new evidence in the face, They shut their eyes to new light, by which alone new convictions can enter, displacing old errors in the affections and understanding. Such a bigot in society, in politics, in law, in religion, is the very Evil One. "Dare to be true," says the minister of honest and honorable progress; "nothing can need a lie." Suppose your neighbors say, "Oh, you turncoat! you weak-minded changeling! you fickle, inconsistent fellow!" Suppose the hard-shell and the iron-clad monitors of old error do hoot and sneer at you! Remember that

> "Great truths are portions of the soul of man;
> And great souls are a portion of eternity."

Abandon error as soon as you discover it in any department of your nature. Remove all stones from your grain fields. One truth is better than all the errors of Christendom.—A. J. Davis.

The Freethinkers' Convention.

Resolutions Passed at the Convention

Of Liberals held at Watkins Glen, N. Y., under the auspices of the Freethinkers' Association of Western New York, Aug. 22d, 23d, 24th, and 25th, 1878.

WHEREAS, It is proper that some of the more important practical objects and general views of this Convention of Liberal citizens should receive formal expression, therefore,

1. Resolved, That we believe that the security of our liberty, and the progress and welfare of our country, require the thorough separation of the Church, and of all Religions, from the State; the abolition of theological chaplaincies and the use of the Bible and other theological books in the Army, Navy, Courts, and Public Schools; the taxation of all Church property; and the equality of all citizens before the law and the departments of the Government; and the competency of all persons as witnesses in courts of law, without regard to religious belief or total absence of such belief.

2. Resolved, That the attempts to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to include God and the Christian or any other religion, are fundamentally opposed to the very liberty and rights of man which the Constitution was framed to secure, and to the solemn compromise of the States and of all sects and peoples by whom it was adopted; and that we look upon the efforts of theological partisans to practically reestablish the union of Church and State with the deepest concern and regret, and as fraught with imminent danger.

3. Resolved, That in this view we regard the enactment and enforcement of the Comstock Postal Laws as the work of the same influences that procured twenty-eight votes (within two of two-thirds) in the U. S. Senate in favor of the amendment to place God and the Christian religion in the Constitution; and that since these votes were Republican, and since these Comstock laws were passed by Republicans, and since he was appointed and retained as a United States official by Republican administrations, we cannot but regard him as religiously a creature of the Church, and politically of the Republican party; that, if it has not been done, we demand his immediate dismissal from office by the President; that any laws found on the Statute Books of either the General or State Governments that enable any person or persons to arrest and punish other citizens for the honest expression of their opinions on questions relating to religion, morals or science, should be at once repealed; that we recommend that all Liberals and all independent citizens should refuse to act further with the Republican party until this is done or some party assurance is given that such laws shall be repealed; that all other political issues should stand aside until the liberties of thought, speech, and the press are secured.

4. Resolved, That we make this demand for the repeal of these United States laws, and the dismissal of this Special Agent of the Postal Department, from the conviction that these laws are clearly unconstitutional, impolitic, and subversive of the liberties and morals of the people; that this Agent is a bigot or fraud, and unfit to be intrusted with any duty of an important public character; and that he has been guilty of gross outrages and immoral practices, the infamy of which only should preserve his name from oblivion.

5. Resolved, That in this view we regard the arrest, trial, conviction, and sentence of Ezra H. Heywood, the editor of The Word, now published at Cambridge, Mass., as an outrage upon the freedom of speech and the press, in which the Federal Judiciary, from the Trial Judge even to the Supreme Court of the United States, have come to share the responsibility; that we protest against the decision of the U. S. Supreme Court, and the rulings of the minor courts by which these laws have been sustained and enforced; and we declare that in our conviction they are not, and that they can never be made, the "law of the land."

6. Resolved, That the arrest of Messrs. D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Miss Josephine S. Tilton while attending this Convention and on its grounds was an inhospitable act and without any just or reasonable cause; that the pamphlet complained of had only been sold to adults attending the Convention and only at its meetings, and was necessary to enable them to judge of the questions before it in regard to the Comstock Laws and Mr. Heywood's arrest; that these arrests were prompted, as we are informed and believe, by over-zealous theological partisans, simply as a mode of harrassment and persecution, and that the general circulation of the book is their work, for without these arrests very few copies would have been left in the village, if any at all.

That while this Convention has no interest in, nor responsibility for any one of the hundreds of books offered for sale by private parties at its meetings, it has no hesitation in declaring that any person under the Constitution of our State has the right to express and publish his opinions on all social and moral questions freely, and to sell such publications to adult citizens of this State; and that the State Comstock Laws, under which these arrests are made, are unconstitutional, indefinite, and partial, and should be repealed or radically modified at the next session of the Legislature.

7. Resolved, That we regard the power to suppress obscenity and indecency to be one of those powers reserved in the U. S. Constitution to the People and the States, and that it should be exercised by them, not by the passage of laws surreptitiously for religious sects and partisans, but by laws passed under general consent and after public notice, and which can apply only to unequivocal and well-defined cases; that we regard the true cure for obscenity and all danger therefrom to be the care of children by their parents and guardians, and their truthful education, at the proper age, as to the nature and duties of the sexual relations; that profanity, obscenity and debauchery are the sure results of retrograde and repressive theologies; that the Liberal cause is the cause of knowledge, liberty, and purity, which are the best guarantees of each other, and that this Convention hereby emphatically puts itself upon record as in no sense sympathizing with, but as holding in severe reprobation, those who seek, by the circulation through the mails or otherwise of literature of an obscene spirit and character, to corrupt, debauch, and inflame the public, and especially youthful minds; and it hereby declares its emphatic approval of the use of all such means as may be within the legitimate scope of the Government to secure the repression both of the issue and circulation of such matter by the press.

8. Resolved, That we sympathize most heartily with the Laboring Classes in their efforts to obtain a more equitable distribution of the products of their labor, by which they should have the means and time to rise from the position of wage-serfs to that of educated, independent, and useful citizens of the Great Republic; that the union of theologians with the people's oppressors is a natural alliance which has continued for ages, and which can be broken only when the working people resolve to become free in soul, and refuse to sustain "Religions" which keep them in the hands of those who, by legal and political forms, morally rob them of the results and benefits of their toil.

9. Resolved, That we also sympathize most heartly with the efforts of Woman to obtain the right and duty of the suffrage; that we regard it as the first and most imperative duty of all Liberals, of every kind and class, to do all they can by voice and vote to remove the subjection of woman, and to advance her social, political, and material emancipation. That to give her political power seems to us the first step towards her education and material independence by which only we believe she can worthily perform her indispensable duties to the Race.

10. Resolved, That in this view we regard with deep concern, the retrograde action of the leading theological sects among us, as for example, the action of the Episcopal Convention in Boston last year, looking to the Church control of marriage and divorce by law, the recent decision of the Presbyterian General Assembly sustaining the action of the New Jersey Synod in the condemnation of Rev. Isaac See, for admitting women to speak in his pulpit; the refusal of the Methodist Church to ordain their acknowledged effective co-worker Mrs. Van Cott; and the withdrawal by the North Carolina Diocesan Convention of the right of woman to vote upon Church questions;—that we regard these and similar instances as showing the continued alliance of Theology with the oppression of woman which began when the Christian Church took away her equality and independence under the laws of the Roman Empire.

11. Resolved, That we hail with cheer and gratitude the noble stand taken by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant of England in favor of the emancipation of the common people from theology; and particularly her efforts to advance sexual purity by bringing to bear upon the most vital and delicate of subjects the light of science; that we sympathize with her in her efforts to resist the outrage of tearing her daughter from her for theological reasons, and we join in consigning to infamy the Hebrew judge whose rulings in Christian hands would deprive Hebrew parents of the custody of their own children.

12. Resolved, That we regard as a happy omen of future success the perfect harmony with which Liberals of every variety of origin and thought have met and co-operated in this Convention; that we earnestly urge upon all Liberals the duty of organization in every city, town, and village, so that a general co-operation of all for general Liberal, or, if need be, political, purposes may be had; and also for the reason that it is evident that Liberalism is no longer simply negative, but also constructive, and that it has social, educational, and political duties that require every emancipated man and woman to become a member of some Liberal society.

13. Resolved, That we give our hearty thanks and encouragement to the Liberal press, and urge upon all its liberal and grateful support; that in the absence of other modes of union and communication it has been the life of the Liberal cause; and that its field of usefulness needs to be enlarged by persistent canvassing for it by every one, as an individual duty; that only by cordial contribution of material aid and moral support can we expect our editors to keep pace with the times and give the people still greater benefits from their labors.

14. Resolved, That we recommend the confederation of all Liberal societies and associations under a general League, and the holding of annual Conventions of the character of the present gathering, to the end that each may be sustained and encouraged by all.

15. Resolved, That our thanks are eminently due, and are gratefully tendered, to H. L. Green, Esq., the Secretary of the Freethinkers' Association of Western New York, for his untiring efforts in organizing this Convention and securing its successful result.

Editorial Notes.

Discarding the Bible in France.

SHELBYVILLE, MINN., April 18, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have often heard it said by the priests that Infidel France once did away with the Bible, and there followed such a reign of anarchy and terror that they called aloud for the Bible again. Please state whether they tell the truth or not, and oblige,

Yours truly, MOSES KUNSELMAN.

REPLY.—Christians are very much in the habit of misstating the facts with regard to the French Revolution, and Freethinkers and unbelievers in theology have been blamed for much that they were not guilty of. The French Revolution was brought about by the tyranny and corruption of the royal family, the nobles, and the clergy. Michelet states the case very clearly when he says, "The clergy had so well kept and augmented the property of the poor that at length it comprised one-fifth of the lands of the kingdom." The remainder was in the hands of the nobles. It is not strange that under these conditions—all the land and wealth in the possession of the nobles and the priesthood—the oppressed should rise in rebellion against such robbery. Anything less than that would be a depraved human nature. It was not because they were unbelievers that they raised that revolt, but because they were human beings deprived of the rights which by nature belonged to them. The larger portion of them belonged to the Church but had been acute sufferers by it; but it was not so much a revolt against religion in any form as it was against the oppressive rule of the upper classes and the want and suffering they spread over the land. The movement was political and not religious. That excesses were committed by the exasperated lower classes it is needless to deny. The extravagant conduct of those who became invested with power was but a natural rebound from the oppression and restraint under which they had been groaning from a corrupt aristocracy and a rotten priesthood. It is a law in human nature that when a nation or a community emerges from a state of oppression, before a proper state of equilibrium is gained, it rebounds to the opposite extreme.

The causes which led to the Revolution had long been working. Under the reign of Louis XIV. corruption, extravagance, and licentiousness reached a great extreme, no less upon the part of the monarch and nobility than the ecclesiastical authorities. The king wasted the revenues of the government in the greatest extravagance in building useless palaces, reclaiming waste places, etc. The treasury was also sadly depleted by the licentious clergy and aristocracy. Rioting, revelry, court carnivals, mistresses, royal favorites, and debauchery were the order of the day until the wealth of the nation was exhausted. This state of things was followed in 1788 by a devastating hail storm which cut off the crops over a large portion of the kingdom and brought the people to starvation. The cry was "Bread or blood!" The enemies of Marie Antoinette excited the prejudices of the hungry mobs against "the Austrian." The issue became between the starving masses on the one hand and the oppressive nobles on the other—between monarchy and mobocracy; and the heavy exactions of a corrupt priesthood added greatly to the existing evils.

The noted and abused Infidels of Paris, so far as they meddled with the terrible transactions of the times, sought to stay the threatening storm. Count Mirabeau, an Atheist, and the most powerful man in France, both with the people and with the nobility, sought to reconcile the frantic factions, and probably would have succeeded, to a great extent, had he lived; but at the critical moment he suddenly died, while negotiating between the mob and the monarch, and the saturnalia of blood succeeded. The throne of the Bourbons was dashed to pieces, and the "Reign of Terror" was duly inaugurated.

The "Reign of Terror" and the reign of Robespierre were identical. He was the ruling spirit of the times, the head and front of the wild movement, and at his death the reign of terror gradually passed away. But Robespierre was not an Infidel; he did not denounce the Church nor the Bible, nor discard either of them. He was simply a political enthusiast whom power rendered practically mad. To give an idea of what his religious ideas were, we will briefly quote his own words from Thiers' "French Revolution," vol. ii, pp. 275, 276: "There are men who would fain go farther, who upon the subject of destroying superstition would fain make a sort of religion of Atheism itself. Every philosopher, every individual, is at liberty to adopt on that subject what opinion he pleases; whoever would make a crime of this is a madman; but the public man, the legislator, would be a hundred times more insane who should adopt such a system. The National Convention abhors it. The Convention is not a maker of books and systems. It is a political and popular body. Atheism is aristocratic. The idea of a great Being, who watches over oppressed innocence and who punishes triumphant guilt, is quite popular. The people, the unfortunate, applaud me. If there are any who censure me they must belong to the rich and to the guilty. I have been from my college years a very indifferent Catholic; but shall never be a cold friend or an unfaithful defender of humanity. I am on that account only the more attached to the moral and political ideas which I have here expounded to you. If God did not exist, it would behoove man to invent him."

Touching further Robespierre's religious views, we will quote a few passages from Lewes' Life of that individual:

"I attribute it further to his sincere religious convictions, rather than to any political foresight, such as Michelet discovers, and that he should have relied upon the lower clergy (a powerful body of 80,000 priests) as well as the Jacobins for his support" (p. 148). "On the sixteenth of June he asked the Assembly to provide for the subsistence of aged ecclesiastics who had no benefices or pensions" (p. 148). He thus quotes Robespierre's words: "How could I be equal to struggles which are above human strength if I had not elevated my soul to God" (p. 237). French journalists of that period speak of Robespierre in this way: "He is a kind of priest, who has his devotees, his Marys, and his Magdalens." "He has all the characteristics of a founder of religion; he has a reputation for sanctity. Robespierre is a priest who wishes to become a god."

On the 7th of May, 1794, when in the height of his power, Robespierre proposed the following decree: "Art. I.—The French people recognize the existence of the Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul. Art. II.—They acknowledge that the worship of the Supreme Being is one of the duties of man" (Thiers', vol. iii, p. 13). By these extracts it is clear that Robespierre was no Freethinker or Infidel. He was an ardent religionist, and almost a Christian. He acknowledged himself a Catholic, though an "indifferent" one.

One thing is very clear: that the leader of the French Revolution was not an Infidel, nor did he denounce the Bible. The Convention did not denounce it nor throw it out of use. Neither was there a public cry against it or in its favor. The Christians were all Catholics, and they at best attach comparatively little importance to the Bible. The charges and representations usually made by the Christians in reference to the French Revolution and the Reign of Terror are grossly exaggerated and untruthful. Those who wanted the Bible were not prevented from reading it.

PROF. R. D. ECCLES has just closed a series of four lectures before the Liberal Society of Kirksville, Mo. The Professor is an able and eloquent speaker, and no society will regret having engaged him. He uses a strict scientific method in his lectures, and carries conviction to his hearers.

THE Liberal League and Lyceum recently organized at Kirksville, Mo., is in a prosperous condition. Its hall, dedicated to Freethought, will seat from two hundred and fifty to three hundred persons. Though recently organized, it has a membership of upwards of forty. Hon. S. M. Pickler, President; F. A. Grove, Vice-President; W. M. Gill, Secretary.

The Disjointed Times.

The editor of Zion's Herald has climbed upon the mount, and, sitting there, weeping, bewails the godlessness of the times. With that deep regard for truthfulness and honesty of expression peculiar to religious editors he proceeds to point out the cause of the numerous crimes committed in our midst. Hear him:

"The times are out of joint. One direction the public mind takes is to inquire into the causes of the business and other immoralities so prevalent and mischievous. Now is the time to show that one grand source of these immoralities is the prevalence of false religious opinions and our failure to put in their true light the moral government and sanctions of God. The prevalence of Materialism, the reiterated cry, "No God, or, at best, an unknowable God; no soul or immortal spirit; the present terminates all; men are either punished not at all for their conduct here or are restored, after a term of gentle discipline, after death; annihilation; religion a tradition; the Bible a fable, a poem, a grand psalm!" —these are the currents of popular thought which are washing the foundation from underneath manhood and honor. Men are beginning to feel this and to be alarmed. The standard of public and private morality has been lowered. The substitution of a godless culture for religion; of philosophy and speculation for the Bible; of the thoroughly Infidel and audacious assumption and blundering of so-called scientists for the clear declarations of Christ, have wrought a subtle and wide-spread delusion, the evil influence of which is seen in the prevailing worldliness and demoralization of the hour."

The cool assurance with which he assumes philosophy to be at the bottom of all crime is as refreshing as his disregard of facts is apparent. When it is borne in mind that three-fourths of our criminals are Catholics, and that a large proportion of the other fourth is composed of ministers, deacons, and "pious and highly respectable" defaulters, like Chace, Hathaway, and Angell, it must require a large share of the love of Christ and hatred of science to indite so palpable a falsehood as our Christian editor has given us. Were it the philosophers, scientists, and Infidels, one or all, who contribute to the prevailing demoralization, his remarks would be less senseless. But with the records before our eyes, so plain that "he who runs may read," "even though he be a fool," which our editor is not, it requires a bigotry amounting almost to madness to find in philosophy a source of crime.

Who are the men that commit the numerous depredations upon the life and property of others? Are they the philosophers and scientists? Did Huxley or Tyndall ever steal? Did Frothingham ever betray a member of his congregation and perjure himself for twelve consecutive days? Did Ingersoll ever speculate in stocks and steal nearly a million from his confiding employers? Was it Underwood or Angell that went to Europe with $120,000 of the company's fund? Is it the philosophical Prof. Youmans or the pious Gilman who is now serving his sentence in State prison for stealing? Was it an Infidel or a Catholic priest who died from delirum tremens at a hospital in this city recently?

It is true that the standard of public and private morality is low. But is it the Infidels or the Christians who have lowered it? If it is low now, it is not so low as when all Europe was Christian and the shadow of the cross fell from the Mediterranean to the Black Sea. It is not so low as when every nunnery was a brothel and murderers bought absolution with a few pence. And why? Because of the "substitution of a godless culture" for a religion which killed for Christ's sake, and burnt in the name of God; because philosophy has taken the place of the Bible, and science has done away with a God who commanded men to steal?

If the editor wants the religion of the past substituted for the culture of the present, he must either be ignorant of its history or bigoted enough to tread in the footsteps of his predecessors. The "clear declaration" of Christ was, "Believe or be damned." Shall it take the place of the "audacious assumption" that man cannot believe without evidence? Have not "the so-called scientists" "blundered" around till they have found facts which clearly overthrow a system of morals founded upon the childish idea of rewards and punishments for good or evil? Which is best calculated to guide us aright through life—a rule founded upon the principles of right and wrong, or arbitrary commands which as often conflict with the right as they forbid the wrong?

A great deal of useless talk is wasted by ministers and pious editors upon the "Christian standard of morality." The truth is, that if the teachings of Christ were lived out in practical, every-day life, we should be a nation of beggars and imbeciles. The only valuable sayings attributed to him were stolen from older saviors, and his teachings are original only in the worthless advice given and the bitter reviling heaped upon his opponents. When the world struggled in the Dark Ages, the Church raised the "standard of Christian morality," and under that flag fought the fight of the assassin and thief. There is no period in which such utter abandon to licentiousness and crime of every kind abounded as when the people of the world squared their moral compass by the Bible and followed implicitly its teachings and doctrines. The "standard of Christian morality" was the standard of Charles the Fifth, of Philip the Second, of the Duke of Alva, of John Calvin, of Martin Luther, of Henry the Eighth, of James the Second, of Louis the Ninth and his mother, and of innumerable other wretches. For an editor now to howl for the "standard of Christian morality," when the only ones who adhere to it are fast getting into State prison or editing religious papers, is to ask for a repetition of the centuries of moral degradation which all decent men, and especially all "so-called scientists," had hoped were passed away forever.

The talk about "false religious opinions" being the "one grand source of these immoralities" is, to put it mildly, bigoted nonsense. As we said, three-fourths of the petty criminals are Catholics, and of the numerous "business and other immoralities" nearly all are committed by "pious" and "highly respectable" members of some one of the many sects of Christians. The ministers alone, in proportion to their number, furnish more candidates for prison than any class of professional men who are not tainted with the overpowering love of Christ—or love of the sisters—and who were never touched by the spirit which quickens and regenerates. If the Herald wants to get at the real cause of these "business and other immoralities," it can best do it by seeking it in that religion which puts a premium on a life of crime by allowing the perpetrator to sneak into heaven on another man's virtues if he repents at the last moment, instead of teaching that he who sows must reap, whether it be tares or wheat.

To say that philosophy and science have spread a subtle influence for bad throughout the land, is a reckless assertion, bordering on the maliciousness engendered by a hatred of everything not essentially Christian, and a desire to put down all opinions not held by the particular sect to which the editor of the Herald lends such blind support. Science is the only savior of humanity, and its worst enemy is that religion which engenders a hate that kills, and justifies in its defenders such vicious misstatements as we have quoted from the Herald. The fact that Christianity is slowly but surely passing away may well cause alarm to its defenders who depend upon its fading superstitions for their pecuniary support; but all good men who have the cause of humanity at heart, all who value truth above a pet scheme, see in its dissolution a cause for rejoicing, and a nearer approach of that blessed era of "peace on earth, good will to men," when man will work for man, and not for the protean phantom so ignorantly believed in by the deluded millions.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

M. Liais, in the course of his numerous sea voyages, devoted special attention to this phenomenon, and he communicated the result of his observations to the Académie des Sciences in 1858. "I have demonstrated," he says, "that one can only account for the zodiacal light by admitting that it is due to an imponderable substance forming around the Sun a sort of nebulosity, in which the earth is completely plunged. The annular aspect of this nebulosity is caused by its forming a sort of flattened ellipsoid round the Sun; that is to say, a thin stratum of matter very slightly inclined towards the terrestrial orbit, which is entirely contained in the interior of this stratum. If, therefore, we look in the direction of the flattening, or, in other words, of the ecliptic, we remark a greater thickness of matter than exists in any other direction. Consequently, we receive more light from the side of the zodiac than we do from other quarters, so that this zone appears to us more luminous than the other parts of the sky, without being so in reality. Everybody must have remarked that when the weather is very clear no part of the celestial vault is completely somber. Owing to the limpidity of the air, the light from the nadir is also more pronounced at the tropics than in the temperate regions. This comes from the solar nebula, to the glimmer of which is conjoined the slight quantity of light transmitted to us by the stars.

"The zodiacal light, when a good view can be got of it, as in the intertropical zone, is the most beautiful of all phenomena. In color it is pure white, though, as seen in Europe, certain observers have thought that they could discern a reddish tint. This latter has not, however, any real existence; for if so it would be better seen at the tropics, as coloration always becomes more marked in proportion to its intensity. I believe that observers have in this instance confounded the zodiacal light with the last red traces of twilight. At the tropics themselves, in the months of July and August for that of Capricorn, and in the months of January and February for that of Cancer, the zodiacal light is visible in the evening after sunset, perpendicular to the horizon. When night sets fully in, there rises in the west a white vertical column, the central axis of which equals and even exceeds in intensity the most brilliant parts of the milky way. Upon the edges of this column the light gradually tones off to the faint glimmer of the heavens. It differs in this respect from the milky way, the edges of which at certain points present a striking contrast to the surrounding sky, as in the black aperture of the Southern Cross called the coal-sack."

Silbermann deduces from the observations which he has made that the zodiacal light has close affinity with the affluence of shooting-stars and the apparition of Auroræ Boreales. In a memoir communicated to the Académie des Sciences he says: "Whenever there is an affluence of shooting stars, there is an Aurora Borealis, either luminous or else merely cloudy, in the mean latitudes. Numerous facts make me think that such is also the case with the zodiacal light, and this recalls to my mind that the zodiacal light, like the Auroræ, concurs with sudden oscillations of the barometer, and that it is sometimes, also, like the Auroræ, of a bright red color. . . . The sudden changes of intensity, as well as the appearance of undulatory motions, were observed by Humboldt. A zodiacal light, extending from one edge of the horizon to the other, like that seen by Béguelin, was observed by M. Liais. Respighi, again, has recently ascertained by spectrum analysis that the zodiacal light offers the brilliant ray of nitrogen discovered by Augtröm in the Auroræ Boreales. All these facts, as well as the coincidence of the zodiacal light with the affluences of shooting stars and the Auroræ Boreales, tend to show that this light is in reality a zodiacal Aurora, corresponding to the tide wave, and not to that of cosmical matter. It is known, too, that Laplace would not admit that the zodiacal light might be a wide extension of the Sun's atmosphere.

XVI.

This notice would not be complete without a succinct summary of the scientific notions concerning the Sun which have now long been acquired and popularized in elementary works of education.

The Sun is incessantly darting its rays from all points of its surface, and there is not an instant during which its light ceases to permeate every corner of the universe.

From the close of June it undergoes a daily decrease of elevation, but the heat, nevertheless, continues to increase during the summer. And this is easy of comprehension, for we know that a body warmed by the Sun retains its heat for some time after it has ceased to be exposed to the solar rays. If a good-sized piece of metal is exposed to the Sun during a very hot summer day, it will be found to retain a certain amount of heat an hour after sunset. It therefore follows that the earth, which is so much larger, will retain during the night, and even until the following morning, part of the heat communicated to it by the Sun on the previous day. The Sun adds a fresh amount to that already existing, and so the earth obtains an increasing balance of heat. In this way the heat goes on increasing in the bosom of the earth, or in the air to which it communicates itself, until the nights get longer, when our globe gradually loses the heat which it had contracted during the summer.

The Sun is placed in the centre of our planetary system, the earth revolving around it in about 365 days 6 hours. Until the time of Copernicus it was generally believed that the earth was motionless, the Sun revolving around it; but at that period people were ignorant as to the immense distance of the Sun from us, and of its real size (1,260,000 times larger than the earth), so that they did not see any reason why it should not revolve around our planet.

How could it be possible for a body so enormous as the Sun to travel an orbit of 500,000,000 miles in twenty-four hours? The stars, immense globes, whose exact size we are unable to ascertain, would, to speak only of those that are least remote from us, have to travel 125,000,000 miles per second. And, lastly, how could the radiant globe of the Sun circulate around a body so small as the earth without dragging it from its place, if it were united to it by invisible ties? Or, if the Sun were not attached to the earth, would it not pursue its course in space, leaving our planet hopelessly in the rear?

If two stones tied together are thrown into the air they will be seen to circulate around a point comprised in the interval between them, and which is their common center of gravity. If one is much heavier than the other, the center of gravity will be proportionately nearer to the former, and may even be situated within it, in which case the small one will seem to circulate by itself around the larger one, which will only be slightly displaced. Physics teach us that the center of gravity of two bodies is to be ascertained by dividing their mutual distance in inverse ratio to their weight or volume, and by means of this calculation we learn that the proportion of the Sun's mass to that of the earth is as 354,936 is to 1. It follows, then, that the common center of gravity of these two bodies is situated at 243 miles from the Sun's center. The latter, therefore, does not move, the earth revolving around it in the space of about 365 days, and turning upon its own axis every twenty-four hours. The first impression of our eyesight would of course lead us to suppose that the Sun and other planets revolve round the earth, and it is this illusion which led the ancient astronomers into error.

The Sun's distance from the earth is about 91,430,000 miles; a cannon-ball traveling at the rate of 1,637 1-2 miles an hour, or 39,750 miles a day, would take 6 years and 110 days to reach it. The Sun's diameter is 852,584 miles, or nearly four times the distance between us and the moon. Its distance varies with the different seasons, and this is why the apparent diameter of the Sun is not always of the same dimensions. This remarkable phenomenon is occasioned by the translation of the Earth in an elliptic curve which brings us nearer to the Sun in summer than in winter; whence it is that the solar disk seems larger to us in the former than in the latter season.

Now if we compare the Sun with other bodies which people the immensity of space, we are taught by science that it is but an insignificant star amongst the countless legion of luminaries which shine before our eyes.

Centenary of Voltaire.

THE 30TH OF MAY, 1878.

I regretfully leave Voltaire, after having passed three months with him.

I had long been an admirer of the great philosopher who was the leader of Freethought in the eighteenth century. By living in his intimacy, by scrutinizing his life and work, I have become his friend; and, if they are not already so, I am convinced my readers will become his friends as I have, after perusing this work, where I have endeavored to seize upon his encyclopedic genius, his mobile and multiple physiognomy.

How can we but become the liegemen, the intellectual associates of Voltaire, when we see him consecrate all his life to the cause of civilization, of truth, of the liberty of conscience and thought; when we behold his struggle in France against political despotism and religious obscurantism; when we accompany him to his retreats in exile where he courageously takes up again his interrupted work and freely publishes his productions?

It is with an inexpressible joy that we follow the steps of this scout of the human army, of this pioneer making deep gaps in the forest of prejudices, bringing new light at each one of his stages, and that we behold the victory of the spirit upon human errors and folly.

Voltaire will be the great figure, eternally bewitching and attractive, of the eighteenth century. He fought the good fight, and carried the victory. He established tolerance, liberated conscience from its oppressions, affranchised thought from its chains, wrote the preface of the Civil Code and of the Revolution of '89, destroyed the barbarous legislations, superannuated customs, old traditions, prejudices, all the obstacles, all the impediments which hindered the march of civilization. He has been the martial champion of the mind, the hero of free humanity.

His country embastilled him, persecuted him, threw his books to the flames, exiled him nearly all his life.

Voltaire burst into laughter in the face of that race of arlequins anthropophages, as he called the proscribers of Louis XV.; he made sport of censura and lettre de cachet. He pursued his crusade of Freethought in all his places of retreat; in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland; where, connected with the eminent minds of those lands, he founded the public opinion of Europe, which, through his propaganda, became an irresistible power against all public iniquities, against all infractions of the rights and liberty of man.

Voltaire sums up in himself all the eighteenth century, with his genius sparkling like champagne in its bowl, his absolute separation from a shameful and retrograde past, his vigorous flight towards progress, towards a new state of civilization disengaged from all that is base, servile, and obscure.

By this resplendent light projected by the age of Voltaire, how deformed and shrunken appears the ancient slave trembling before priest and master! But wait until the philosophers have restored to the mutilated being of the Middle Ages his mind, his soul, his will, his intellectual and moral power—until they have delivered him from the jail of the seventeenth century; and you will see the poor man renewed and transformed by the Promethei of the Encyclopedia; you shall see him walk erect and firm in his strength and liberty. Ah, masters! you throw Voltaire in the Bastille, and you proscribe him. His vengeance shall be exemplary. He will bring out with him from his dungeon the enchained generations, and he will return, in spite of you, triumphant in those lands from which you had believed him forever banished.

There is not in the world a more marvelous, more attractive spectacle, one better demonstrating the power of a luminous and sagacious mind, than the polemic of Voltaire against the birds of prey and the men of darkness of his time. What a vivacious and high intelligence, what ardor of conviction, what good sense, what acumen in critique, one of his creations! What lucidity of conception and expression! What a pliant and fine blade! "His prose is a sword," says Nisard; "it sparkles, it whizzes, it thrusts forward, it slays!"

A knight armed from head to foot, brilliant and sprightly combatant, how well he strikes at the fault of the cuirass, the leviathans, the mastodons of the old regime! He harasses them ceaselessly with his barbed arrows; he smites oppression in all its forms, snatching away the mask of religious hypocrisy, stigmatizing superstition, lifting up man bent under secular servitudes, extricating his mind from the silly errors, from the chimeras, that dwarf him, by saying to him:

"Cultivate thy garden and thy brain; cleanse them from the old sediments, from the calcareous deposits and the detritus of the past. Burn the brambles and parasite herbs; destroy the noxious insects; let the mattock pass everywhere. Thou art king, lord, and master at home. Draw straight and see clearly. Do not fall in the rut of Utopia; do not lose thyself in the abyss of dreams. No power has the right to weigh down upon thee, to violate thy intellectual property and material good. Throw to the garret all the worm-eaten cabalistic books, the old Bibles and old codes, and find thy evangel in thy reason; thy law and rule in thy conscience."

The universality, the prodigious intellectual activity, of Voltaire allowed him to span all problems; his quick and sensitive genius, his straightforward sense, carry him wherever there is a truth useful to bring forth, an error to confound, an injustice to disgrace.

He is the support, the spur, of that valiant crew of encyclopedists who forged the conception of the new society; he encourages them, animates them with his noble ardor, with his hatred against the Catholic denomination, by preaching through example and ceaselessly exclaiming, "Crush the wretch!"

We find the generous and beneficent hand of Voltaire in the salient facts of the eighteenth century. He touches everything; nothing for him lacks interest. He was not only a profound thinker, philosopher, historian, man of letters, poet, dramatic author, popularizer of science, but he was, besides, "the hero and the man of action of right," as a Belgian deputy, M. Belgé, has said in a lecture. Possessing to a supreme degree the love of humanity, he considers all wrong done to others as if it were personal to him. He leaps with indignation on witnessing a public iniquity. He constitutes himself the jurisconsult, the high judge of his time. The victims of fanaticism, persecution, and judiciary errors come to him. He welcomes them, he throws wide open to them the doors of his house at Ferney, takes in hand their grievances, becomes their eloquent defender, and succeeds in snatching them away from the fury of the Catholic tribunals.

The obscurantist and Jesuitic pack threw itself, howling and furious, upon this knight of Freethought; but, smiling in the thick of the melee, Voltaire marked with his eagle claw the enemies of reason, and devoted the spirits of darkness and the Tartuffes to the immortality of ridicule.

After fifty years in the philosophical arena, fifty years of conflicts constantly renewed without exhausting the athlete, Voltaire remains at last master of the field. He triumphs over the retrograde elements of the old society. All the despotisms, temporal and spiritual, have Voltairian shot in their wing. They have lost their assurance, their audacity; they drag themselves and gasp, mortally wounded by the skillful hunter.

Is it to be wondered at that, a hundred years after the Iliad, after the great battle of the eighteenth century, "the deceiving spirits, teaching lies and hypocrisy," has said Marina de Sainte-Aldegonde, "the 'black band,' Jesuitic and despotic, shudders at the very name of Voltaire, of that Satan of the mind, as he is qualified by one of the greatest coriphæi of the Church, Joseph de Maistre, who expressed the wish to see a statue raised to him by the hand of the executioner, and who, in an avowal devoid of artifice, exclaimed, "Ah! what harm Voltaire has done us!"

The labors of Hercules are but child's play by the side of Voltaire's.

His encyclopedic mind has shone upon all the branches of human knowledge. Philosophy, politics, legislation, morals—there is not one social element which he has not touched, shed light upon, and reformed.

Let the Revolution come; it will only have to bind up in sheaves the grain of the Voltairian harvest, to countersign and decrete the ideas of Voltaire. And in '89 Condorcet will be able to say with truth, "Voltaire a fait tout a que nous voyons!" ("Voltaire is the author of all that we see!")

All the sons of Freethought unite to-day in the glorification of Voltaire, in his centenary, honoring in him the luminous genius that has more and better than any other honored and served humanity, the highest expression and the most illustrious representative of European civilization.

INTRODUCTION.

Voltaire, that Wandering Jew of intelligence and Freethought in the eighteenth century, does not belong only to France, from which he was forced to flee nearly all his life, but to all the lands where he sought refuge to save himself from the chronic intolerance of his fellow-countrymen—to the Netherlands, to England, to Prussia, and to Switzerland. At these hearths he found established, radiant and powerful, the political and religious liberties which he strove to take back and to make triumph in his native land.

Voltaire forged his genius upon the hard anvil and at the rough school of exile. To this he owed his fame. Had he remained at the French court he would have been but a mere witling, a rare bird in the golden cage of Versailles.

In London, in Amsterdam, Berlin, Brussels, Geneva, Voltaire found the lever of Archimedes, the fulcrum that was necessary to him in lifting the world and enlightening it. It was abroad that he was able to fight openly, to write freely, to publish his works, to propagate his ideas, without risking, as it had happened to him in France, to be bastinadoed, embastilled, and to see his books burnt by the hand of the executioner.

The funeral march of the Wandering Jews of Freethought begins with the revocation of the edict of Nantes and the dragonnades of the Cevennes, under King Louis XVI, in his second childhood, that nec pluribus impar which terminated his existence by the fistula and Madame de Maintenon. The Huguenots deserted en masse from Catholic France, carrying away with them their gold, their art, their science, their industry, to take them to the Protestant nations, by whom they were received with open arms.

After the religionists of the seventeenth come the Freethinkers of the eighteenth, lastly the politicians of the nineteenth century.

It is the great and painful pilgrimage of Liberty in mourning.

Belgium, Holland, England, Switzerland, Germany, behold coming to them legions of fugitives, seeking a new hearth, a new fatherland.

In the seventeenth century the Huguenots leaving France merely passed through Catholic Belgium.

The United Provinces received no less than 55,000 French Protestant refugees; England received 100,000 of them, who endowed her with all the precious industries of France.

Migrations, whether voluntary or forced, have two consequences: impoverishment of the countries they abandon, increase of vitality and riches for the regions where they land and which they fructify, as the periodical overflows of the Nile fecundate the lands they water.

Emigration alone has created the formidable power of the United States. The emigration of the Old World has brought forth and enriched the New.

But refugees do not only carry material benefits to the countries that receive them; they carry to them, besides, the precious tributes of their science, of their art, of their intelligence. In return they receive a strength, a development, an increase of light, as is proven by Voltaire, exiled in the Netherlands, in England, and in Switzerland.

The Radical Pulpit.

If you Take Away my Religion, What will you Give me in its Stead?

DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEWARK LIBERAL LEAGUE, JUNE 2, 1878, BY H. B. MARTIN, M.D.

This question is one which the Liberalist is frequently called upon to answer, and it is certainly one of the utmost importance. When we pull down a house, we are generally supposed to be able to replace it with something better, so if we take away a long and time-honored theory or belief, we must be able to at least give something equally valuable in its place. In order to give an intelligent answer to this question, I shall be obliged to draw liberally on your patience while I examine the merits of the Christian religion, that we may be able to make an intelligible choice between the two.

On all hands it is admitted that the Christian religion is a matter of the most serious importance; it is so, if it be truth, because in that truth, a law of faith and conduct, measuring out to us a propriety of sentiment and action which would otherwise not be incumbent upon us, is propounded to our observance in this life; and eternal consequences of happiness or misery are at issue upon our observance or neglect of that law.

To deny to the Christian religion such a degree of importance, is not only to launch the keenest sarcasm against its whole appearance of supernatural phenomena, but is virtually to withdraw its claims and pretensions altogether. For if men, after having received a divine revelation, are brought to know no more than what they knew before, nor are obliged to do anything which otherwise they would not have been equally obliged to do; nor have any other consequences of their conduct to hope or fear, than otherwise would have been equally to be hoped or feared; then the divine revelation reveals nothing, and all the pretense thereto is driven into an admission of being a misuse of language. On the other hand, the Christian religion is of scarce less importance, if it be false; because, no wise and good man could possibly be indifferent or unconcerned to the prevalence of an extensive and general delusion. No good and amiable heart could for a moment think of yielding its assent to so monstrous an idea, as the supposition that error could possibly be useful, that imposture could be beneficial, that the heart could be set right by setting the understanding wrong, that men were to be made rational by being deceived, and rendered just and virtuous by credulity and ignorance. To be in error one's self is a misfortune; and if it be such an error as mightily affects our peace of mind, it is a very grievous misfortune. To be the cause of error to others, by deceiving them ourselves, or by causing them to be deceived, is a most cruel triumph over nature's weakness, a most barbarous wrong done to our brother man; it is the kind of wrong which we should most justly and keenly resent, could we be sensible of its being put upon ourselves. As then there is no falsehood more apparently false, and more morally mischievous, than to suppose error can be useful, and delusion conducive to happiness and virtue; so there can be no place for the medium or alternative of indifference between the truth or falsehood of the Christian religion. Every argument that could show it to be a blessing to mankind being true, must in like degree tend to demonstrate it to be a curse and a mischief, being false. If it be true, there can be no doubt that God, its all-wise and benevolent author, must have given to it such sufficient evidence and proofs of its truth, that every creature whom he hath endowed with rational faculties, upon the honest and conscientious exercise of those faculties, must be able to arrive at a perfect and satisfactory conviction. To suppose that there either is, or by any possibility could be, a natural disinclination or repugnancy in man's mind to receive the truths of revelation, is "to charge God foolishly," as if, when he had the making of man's mind, and the making of his revelation also, he had not known how to adopt the one to the other; nor is it less than to open the door to every conceivable absurdity and imposture, and to give to the very grossness and palpability of falsehood the advantage over evidence, truth, and reason.

"To suppose," says the eminent commentator, Dr. Whitby, "that belief or unbelief can either be a virtue or a crime, or any man morally better or worse for belief or unbelief, is to assume that man has a faculty which we see and feel he has not, viz.: a power of making himself believe, of being convinced when he is not convinced, and not convicted when he is, which is a being and not being at the same time, the sheer end to 'all discourse of reason.'" To suppose that a suitable state of mind, and certain previous dispositions of meekness, humility, and teachableness are necessary to fit us for the reception of divine truth, as the soil must be prepared to receive the seed, is in like manner to argue preposterously, and to open the door to the reception of falsehood as well as of truth; as the prepared ground will fertilize the tares as prolifically as the wheat, and is indifferent to either. And in proportion as the state of mind so supposed to be necessary is supposed to be an easily yielding, readily consenting, and feebly resisting state, the more facile is it to the practices of imposture and cunning, and the less worthy conquest of evidence and reason. All the mighty question now before us requires is attention and ability; without any presentment or prejudice whatever, but with a perfect and equal willingness to come to such conclusions as the evidence of moral demonstration shall offer to our conviction, and to be guided only by such rules of evidence as determine our convictions with respect to all other questions.

By the Christian religion is understood the whole system of theology found in the Bible, consisting of the two volumes of the Old and New Testament, and as that system now is and generally has been understood by the general community of persons calling themselves Christians. The time assigned as the historical origination of Christianity is reckoned from the reign of the Roman Emperor Augustus to its ultimate and complete establishment under Constantine the Great. Any proof of its existence therefore prior to that time is fatal to its specified origin. The place assigned as that of its historical origination is the obscure and remote province of Judea, between thirty-five and thirty-six degrees of longitude east from Greenwich, and between thirty-one and thirty-three degrees north latitude, in the neighborhood of Egypt, Arabia, Phœnicia, and Syria; a territory one hundred and sixty miles in length, and forty-six miles in breadth. Any proof of its origin in any other country would therefore be fatal to its localized origin. The circumstances assigned as the historical basis of religion are most clearly set forth by the Rev. Robert Taylor, A. B. and M. R. C. S., in the following language, which I give verbatim: "In the reigns of the Roman Emperors Augustus and Tiberius, and in the province of Judea, a Jew, of the lower order of that lowest and most barbarous of all subjects of the Roman Empire, arose into notoriety among his countrymen, from the circumstance of leaving his ordinary avocation as a laboring mechanic, and traveling on foot from village to village in that little province, affecting to cure diseases; that he preached the doctrines, or some such, as are ascribed to him in the New Testament; and that he gave himself out to be some extraordinary personage; but failing in his attempt to gain popularity, he was convicted as a malefactor, and publicly executed, under the presidency and authority of the Roman procurator, Pontius Pilate."

This extraordinary person was called Jesus, a name of ordinary occurrence among the Jewish clan; and from the place of his nativity, or of his more general residence, he is designated as Jesus of Nazareth; the obscurity of his parentage or his equivocal legitimacy having left him without any name or designation of his family or descent. If there be no absolute certainty, says he, that such a man existed, we emphatically say, such a person as Jesus of Nazereth, because the name Jesus being as common among the Jews, as John or Thomas among Christians; nothing hinders, but there might have been some dozen, score, or hundred Jesuses of Nazereth; so that proof (if it could be adduced) of the existence of any one of these unless coupled with the accompanying proof that that one was the Jesus of Nazereth distinguished from all others of that designation, by the circumstance of having been "crucified under Pontius Pilate," would be no proof of the existence of the Jesus of the gospel, of whose identity the essential predicates are, not alone the name Jesus and the place Nazareth, but the characteristic distinction of crucifixion. Still less, and further off than ever from any absolute identification with the Jesus of the gospel is the regal title Christ, or the anointed, which was not only held by all the kings of Israel, and even the heathen prince Cyrus, is called by Isaiah the Christ of God (Is. xiv, 1), but was so commonly assumed by all sorts of impostors, conjurors, and pretenders to supernatural communications, that the very claim to it is in the gospel itself considered as an indication of imposture, and a reason and a rule for withholding our credence, there being no rule in that gospel more distinct than that "if any man say to you, lo! here is Christ, or lo! he is there, believe him not" (Mark, xiv, 21). No reason more explicit than that "many false Christs should arise" (Matt. xxiv, 24; Luke xxi, 8); and no statement more definite than that, when one of his immediate disciples applied that title to the Jesus of the gospel, he himself disclaimed it, "and strictly charged and commanded them to tell no man that thing" (Luke ix, 21; Matt. xvi, 29). So that should authentic history present us with a Christ who was crucified, though such a record would certainly come within the list of very striking coincidences, in relation to the evangelical story; yet as we certainly know that Christ was one of the most ordinary titles that religious impostors were wont to assume, and crucifixion an ordinary punishment consequent on detected imposture, a Christ crucified, would by no means identify the "Jesus Christ and him crucified," of the New Testament. But further off, even to an infinite remoteness from any designation or reference to the person of the crucified Jesus, are the complimentary and idolatrous epithets of honor or of worship, which the heathen nations, from the remotest antiquity, were in the habit of applying to their Gods, demigods, and heroes, who from the various services they were believed to have rendered to mankind, were called saviors of the world, redeemers of mankind, physicians of souls, etc., and addressed by every one of the doxologies, even, not excepting one of those which Christian piety has since confined and appropriated to the Jewish Jesus. Nor are any of the supernatural or extraordinary circumstances which, either with truth or without it, are asserted or believed of the man of Nazereth, at all characteristic or distinctive of that person, from any of the innumerable host of heaven-descended, virgin-born, wonder-working sons of God, of whom the like supernatural and extraordinary circumstances were asserted and believed, with as great faith, and with as little reason.

To have been the whole world's desideratum, to have been foretold by a long series of undoubted prophecies, to have been attested by a glorious display of indisputable miracles, to have revealed the most mystical doctrines, to have acted as never man acted, and to have suffered as never man suffered, were among the most ordinary credentials of the gods and goddesses with which Olympus groaned.

In order that you may be better able to judge whether the Christian creed and religion was copied from the pagan, I will now give you so much of the Christian creed as is undoubtedly and unquestionably of pagan origin. That only which could not, or would not, have expressed the fair sense of any pagan faith, can be peculiarly Christian. That only which the Christian finds that he has to say, of which a worshiper of the gods could not have said the same or the like before him, is Christianity,

1st. I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth. (Pagan the same.)

2d. And in Jesus Christ his only son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Spirit. (Pagan, Jasius Christ.)

3d. Born of the Virgin Mary. (Pagan, Electra.)

4th. Suffered under Pontius Pilate. (Pagan, Whom it might be.)

5th. Was crucified. (Pagan, Struck by a thunderbolt.)

6th. Dead and buried. (Pagan same.)

7th. He descended into hell. (Pagan same.)

8th. The third day he rose again from the dead. (Pagan same.)

9th. He ascended into heaven. (Pagan same.)

10th. And sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty. (Pagan same.)

11th. From whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. (Pagan same.)

12th. I believe in the Holy Ghost. (Pagan same.)

BY W. S. BELL.

The glory of our age is that truth is now tested by experimental and rational methods. Whims, caprices, prejudices, bigotry, and ignorance still fight hard against progress, but the inevitable and irresistible onward career of the race persists. Let us skirmish along the lines of this conflict.

There are two most powerful influences at work upon man which restrain his progressive impulses. I refer to the conservative forces of inheritance, and the restraining tendency of tradition. We are all prone to think the thoughts of our fathers, and to accept too freely the marvelous stories about their marvelous deeds which come down to us. To accept all you hear is to float with the stream of public opinion. But there is a spirit in every human breast which seeks at times to break out from its narrow confinement, like a bird breaking from its useless shell, and to explore new fields for new truth.

It is the very inspiration of truth which has prompted man to say, "Seek and ye shall find." Life means, to the noble-minded, something more than reaping what others have sown. It means doing something to elevate the race—to plant truth and virtue that others may harvest in days to come. It is childish and slave-like tamely to eat up the bread our fathers toiled for. If human life has anything in it ennobling, it surely consists in heroic endeavor. To remain content with the achievements of our ancestors is as grotesque and beggarly as to wear their antiquated clothing. Yet we have the mournful sight before us of those who go about clad in the vestments of ragged and tattered creeds. Such people scarcely ever ask the serious question, "What is truth?" To make such an inquiry would be equivalent to the confession that they did not know what it is, and that they did not already possess it.

There is some formal pretense of inquiring for truth when the pew looks up attentively to the pulpit to hear the mysteries of truth explained. But this is all make-believe. There is no real investigation after truth by the preacher. That question is settled. His creed tells him what truth is, and he dares not to venture off its platform. Truth with him means sectarianism. He is a retained advocate of Calvinism, Methodism, or Congregationalism. His audience is a sect, and they have secured him, as a sectarian, to plead for them.

All forms of religion are conservative; but in the spirit of the new age there is rapidly spreading abroad a secular and progressive spirit; and we pass to the more direct consideration of its elements.

What distinguishes the new age from all the ages of the past? There are two very distinct phases of modern society which display its peculiar character. First, we find at the present time a great increase in mechanical inventions, scientific discoveries, and stimulated industries. Everywhere man is turning the forces of nature to his own use. This is one aspect of the new age; and the other is the scientific spirit, the scientific method of investigation.

Let us consider the first of these phases of modern society.

On all sides man is utilizing the forces of nature. In ancient times man took advantage of the winds of heaven by constructing sails for his boat, which caught the breeze and moved over the waters along the shores, and opened the way for a more extended commerce; he used the winds to winnow his grains, and, in later times, he constructed windmills to grind it; and in other ways the capricious winds were turned into servants of men. In more recent times the rapid-running streams were in like manner made helpers in the world's great industries. The water-wheel is now the driving power in thousands of factories and mills which turn out products to bless the race. Great as was this outlet to human activity and enterprise, it was nothing compared with the enterprise consequent upon the discovery of steam. The steam power has created commerce. The oceans, seas, lakes, and rivers of the world are traversed by thousands of steam vessels, carrying trade, intelligence, and brain activity from land to land. And while these sailing and steam vessels are bearing the treasures of one country to another, to bring back its rich trade, the telegraph and ocean cable are mouthpieces through which all the nations of the earth converse with each other. The daily news is flashed in a few seconds from one end of the earth to the other. The whole world seems thus to beat with one pulse.

"The physical well-being of an ancient Greek was not enhanced by an invention made in China; nor could his philosophy derive useful hints from theories propounded in Judea. But in these days scarcely anything can happen in any part of our planet which does not speedily affect every other part" (Cosmic Philos., vol. ii, p. 214).

Another Arrest.

It is to be regretted that on Saturday afternoon, the 24th inst., while the proceedings of the Watkins Convention were quietly taking place, the authorities of the village of Watkins, backed by the sectarian element of the place, caused the arrest of D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Miss Josephine S. Tilton for selling the pamphlet called "Cupid's Yokes," by E. H. Heywood, who were required to give bonds to prevent being thrown into prison.

Miss Tilton had some of the books on the ground for sale, but no other person had any. We had a variety of the books of our publication for sale, but not a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" was upon our table. Miss Tilton had a contiguous table, upon which she offered for sale several of Mr. Heywood's pamphlets, photographs, etc. Among the pamphlets was the tabooed "Cupid's Yokes." We are not sure that we sold a copy of it, but if we did it was to aid Miss Tilton when away or unable to attend to her customers. We put not a cent of the money for "Cupid's Yokes" in our pockets, nor did we have a cent of profit from the sale of them. Mr. Bell simply proffered his services to help us in selling our books, as a matter of kindness, without remuneration of any kind. If he sold any of "Cupid's Yokes," it was during her absence, and as a matter of kindness. What will be the result of the arrests time will disclose. At this writing we are waiting the action of the Grand Jury. If they find a bill against us, it will subject us to the necessity of making a defense hundreds of miles from home, attended with many inconveniences, and in a bigoted, unfriendly community. It is expected the Grand Jury will reach our case on Tuesday, the 27th inst., when it will be known what course they will have taken. We shall be compelled to await their action.

The whole business is but a repetition of the old Christian rule of persecution and tyranny which for more than a thousand years showed its opposition to mental freedom, and may be regarded as the expiring gasps of the rule of the Inquisition. It remains to be seen whether freedom of the press and individual liberty are in this last quarter of the nineteenth century to be crushed by the iron hand of the Church. Can it be true that the devotees of bigotry and intolerance are to continue to oppress and imprison those who do not bow down to their shrine.

Our friends, on our former arrest were prompt to kindly come forward to give us aid in the time of need, and we doubt not many will do the same at the present juncture. We greatly dislike to call upon friends for financial aid, but as we are poor and unable to meet the expense of defense in the courts, we shall continue to be grateful for any kindness that may be shown us in this unpleasant emergency. Mr. Bell and Miss Tilton, who are in bonds with us, will share in the defense contributions that may be made. Donations and pledges may be forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, or to G. L. Henderson, Treasurer of the National Defense Fund.

If we rightly judge the temper and spirit of the Liberals of America, a long list of the names of those who are willing to help those in bonds and under oppression will appear from time to time in these columns. We do not beg, but the necessities of the situation render it neccessary that we should again have aid. How many of our friends will place their names upon the second roll of honor?

The Watkins Convention.

It is not improbable that our readers will be glad to hear something of the proceedings of the Free-thinkers' Convention at Watkins. A company of six of us left New York on the evening of Tuesday, the 20th, that we might have time to view some of the natural beauties in the vicinity of Watkins previous to the holding of the Convention.

We had a pleasant night's ride over the Hudson River and New York Central road, via Albany, Syracuse, and Geneva, being fourteen hours on the road. The same sleeping-cars that we took at the city brought us to the beautiful village of Watkins, of three thousand five hundred inhabitants, located in a lovely valley in Schuyler county, at the head of Seneca Lake, a body of water forty miles in length and from two to five miles in width, splendid farming lands lying on either side.

We found upon arrival that but few had preceded us. Hon. Geo. W. Julian and a few others from a distance had taken rooms at the hotels.

In the afternoon of Wednesday, the 22d, in company with G. L. Henderson and A. L. Rawson, we passed through the celebrated Watkins Glen. There is hardly to be found in the country a more strikingly wonderful and beautiful work of nature, possessing, as it does, characteristics differing entirely from other natural curiosities in the country. The Glen consists of series of glens or gorges cut through the laminated slate rocks in this locality. The course of the Glen is nearly east and west, extending over two miles in length, and has a total ascent of eight hundred feet. It is the channel of a clear, limpid stream which follows its eccentric course, making its descent from section to section by a great number of cascades and rapids, unequaled in beauty and variety.

The Glen has been accessible to visitors only for some twelve years past. It has, of course, been known a long time, but the difficulty of entering it and getting through it was a formidable barrier against its exploration; but within the last few years extensive improvements have been made in building stairs and bridges, putting up railings, cutting passages in the rocks, etc. It is now visited by from twelve to twenty thousand persons every season.

In the "Entrance Amphitheater" the rocks rise in immense walls in the form of beetling cliffs on either side. As one looks forward, the vision and passage seem barred, with the exception of a narrow rift, as if, by some mighty power, they had been torn asunder.

The "Entrance Cascade" is a narrow thread of water, shooting out from an angle in the rocks sixty feet above, and dashing into a dark, cavernous pool below. As we passed on, we passed through "Glen Alpha," crossed "Sentry Bridge," from which we looked down through the "Amphitheater" below, and between the jagged rocks, to the deep blue basin, resting in repose. As we looked forward and upward, a grand sight burst upon our vision. Towering and irregular cliffs of dark rocks rise one above another till they almost appear to meet in the clouds. A narrow thread of sky is all that can be seen between them—sufficient to keep in remembrance the world outside we had left.

Crossing the "Sentry Bridge," we ascended a short flight of steps on the south side, and before us was a pathway, cut in the solid rock, leading along under the cliffs, fifteen to twenty feet above the stream. This brought us to "Stillwater Gorge," where the façades of the high-extending rocks spread new beauties before our gaze. Next came the laughing cascade, called "Minnehaha," beautiful, irregular, and full of grace. Thirty feet above is "Fairy Cascade," which leaps into "Neptune's Pool." Next is "Cavern Gorge," where the tall rocks, extending upward nearly two hundred feet, come so near together at the top as to give the gorge much the appearance of a cavern. Further on, after ascending a long stairway and crossing a bridge, we come to "The Grotto," of strange wildness and grandeur. Next comes the "Cavern Cascade," where the fall of the water in the partially closed cavern gives a reverberating sound. Next is "Whirlwind Gorge," which presents new beauties to the eye. More climbing and winding brought us to the "Mountain House," where many visitors sojourn while stopping here, and leading to which is a roadway for carriages outside the Glen. In connection is a building where refreshments are dispensed and Glen views and curiosities are kept for sale. The suspension bridge spanning the chasm here is a good point for taking observations of the surrounding wildness and beauties. Passing on to "Point Lookout," splendid additional view are obtained. Soon we reach Hope's Art Gallery, where resides an excellent artist, Mr. J. Hope, formerly of New York. In his gallery are many specimens of his workmanship, comprising views of the most attractive points in the Glen, together with other works of art. Some of his paintings are very large and are valued at thousands of dollars.

The next noticeable point in the journey is "Sylvan Gorge," where many new beauties of wildness and grandeur are presented. After passing "Sylvan Rapids" we come to the "Glen Cathedral," where the gorge expands into an immense oblong ampitheatre nearly a quarter of a mile in length, with walls nearly three hundred feet in height on either side. The width of the Cathedral is some hundreds of feet. The stream, which in other places leaps down precipices, here passes placidly and smoothly over the flat stones that form the floor of the Cathedral. What a grand spot, thought we, in this vaulted room with the sky for a dome, to hold a large Liberal meeting! On the floor of the Cathedral is a photographer's apparatus, and here many groups of six or more, with the rocks for a background, are taken. At a subsequent visit we sat with a group of several friends and had a picture taken.

Next we passed "Central Cascade" and "Baptismal Font;" then by the "Grand Staircase" to "Cliff Platform" to the "Glen of Pools," so named from the number of the large basins in the rock worn out by the water. "The Poet's Dream" is a truly magnificent scene. "The Mermaid's Pool" is a point of attraction. "The Triple Cascade," where the stream leaps in three nearly equal bounds from one platform of rocks to another, is regarded as one of the marked beauties of the Glen. Near this are the celebrated "Rainbow Falls," where a mountain stream leaps over the shelving rocks forming the sides of the Glen. The sun's rays falling upon the spray thus produced form a beautiful rainbow; and it is one of the most attractive beauties of the Glen. The pathway leads under the shelving rocks behind the falls.

Above this are "Shadow Gorge," "Frowning Cliff," "Palace of Beauty," "Glen Arcadia," "The Artist's Dream," "Narrow Pass," "Pluto Falls," "Cavern Pool," "Pool of the Nymphs," "Elfin Gorge," "Glen Facility," "Glen Horicorn," "Glen Elysium," and "Glen Omega," two miles from the entrance, but we cannot take the time to describe their beauties. Suffice it to say, the Glen in its entirety is one of the grandest curiosities we ever beheld, rivaling Niagara Falls and the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. In passing through it one is thoroughly impressed with the conviction that it must have taken many thousand years for the water to cut and wear away the solid rocks here in the way it has done. Far more than six thousand years evidently have thus been employed.

A brief description only must suffice of the great Watkins meeting.

It was called to order in the beautiful grove in the centre of the village on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, by the President of the Association, Dr. T. L. Brown of Binghampton, who made a few appropriate remarks, after which a motion was made, that a business committee be appointed.

The President then delivered an address of more than an hour in length which dwelt considerably upon the different phases of Materialism.

Secretary H. L. Green made his annual report, after which a conference was held in which ten minute speeches were in order, Mr. Green leading off. Among the speakers were Prof. Toohey, of Chelsea, Mass.; Elder Frederick Evans, of Mt. Lebanon; Mrs. L. K. Coleman, Syracuse; Mrs. Tillotson, of Vineland, N. J.; J. M. Peebles, of Hammonton, N. J.; A. L. Rawson, New York, and Dr. Brown—when the meeting was adjourned for dinner.

Perhaps one thousand persons attended the first meeting.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

At 2 P. M. the meeting re-assembled. Albert Lomas of Watervliet read a good address, using up an hour in the same, after which addresses were delivered by Ella E. Gibson and J. H. Harter. We had during the meeting several excellent pieces of vocal music by Prof. Hudson, Mrs. Harter, and Mrs. Harvey, accompanied by the melodeon, played by the latter.

At 4 P. M. a conference of ten-minute speeches was again held. Among the speakers were G. L. Henderson, Mrs. P. R. Lawrence, Prof. Toohey, and several others. Mrs. Bristol recited an original poem, "When this Old World is Righted."

In the evening meeting addresses were delivered by Dr. T. B. Taylor, Mrs. L. K. Coleman, and Mr. A. L. Rawson. About 9 o'clock Messrs. Seaver and Mendum of the Investigator arrived upon the grounds. Mr. Seaver was called forward, and he delivered a short address which was well received. The evening meeting was estimated to have an audience of nearly three thousand persons. The day had been beautiful and everything passed off pleasantly.

SECOND DAY—FRIDAY.

The morning meeting was addressed by Giles B. Stebbins of Detroit, who read selections from the teachings of Buddha and others of the old sages, with selections also from the "Poems of the Beyond." His remarks were in advocacy of spirit life. Mrs. P. R. Lawrence gave a splendid address on the effects of superstition upon the young. Her speech was able and eloquent; it produced an excellent effect, and was warmly approved.

Elder Frederick Evans followed with a very good address, during which he showed the wrong of non-taxation of church property, the supporting by government of chaplains, etc., etc.

The afternoon meeting opened with an address by W. S. Bell, followed by an able speech by Mrs. Laura Kendrick, also a discourse by the Rev. J. L. Alcott of Ohio. The latter was a regular orthodox sermon, and was followed by Prof. Toohey, who refuted many of the positions taken by the reverend gentleman. In the conference short speeches were made by Dr. T. B. Taylor, Dr. Davis (orthodox), G. L. Henderson, Verity, and Seaver.

The evening meeting was held in the Opera House. The principal address was given by W. E. Copeland, from Lincoln, Neb., and was followed by a poem read by Mrs. Clara Neyman, as well as speaking by others, after which a dance came off, lasting for several hours.

THIRD DAY—SATURDAY.

At 8 o'clock, as per previous announcement, a few hundred took a pleasant steamboat ride of about twenty miles down the lake and back. A meeting was also organized in the grove before the return of the boat, and was addressed by J. M. Reynolds of Chicago, G. B. Stebbins, J. M. Peebles, Mrs. Coleman, Mrs. Tillotson, and Mr. Reynolds again. The excursionists returned between eleven and twelve A. M.

In the afternoon meeting Mr. G. L. Henderson led off, his subject embracing the principles of heredity and the transmission of qualities from parents to children, together with the modes necessary to be employed to perfect the human race.

The next speaker was Rev. E. W. Abbey of Terre Haute, Ind., Presbyterian. He showed up the excellencies of the Bible and endeavored to show the superiority of Christianity over all other forms of religion. He condemned Ingersoll, and criticised his utterances. This sermon was followed by an able refutation by Prof. Toohey, who showed that Christianity is chargeable with immense persecutions, tyranny, and oppression; that it has retarded civilization and human advancement.

At this point an event took place which affected to some extent the editor of this paper. While the Liberals were courteously extending to Rev. Mr. Abbey the privilege of engaging the attention of the Liberal audience for the space of an hour, the legal and ecclesiastical dignitaries of Watkins were getting up a vile scheme to throw certain persons attending the Convention into prison. A constable and a police officer appeared upon the grounds and arrested D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Josephine S. Tilton, and took them before Justice A. C. Kingsbury upon the charge of selling obscene and indecent books, to wit: "Cupid's Yokes" and other similar works. The movement was said to have been instigated by the ultra orthodox sentiment in the town, and especially in the person of Frederick Davis, Jr., a leading member of the Episcopal church. Persons were employed to buy copies of "Cupid's Yokes," upon which the complaint was made. The arrested parties, when arraigned before the court, pleaded "not guilty," and were held to bail to await the action of the Grand Jury in the sum of one thousand dollars each. Mr. Fox Holden of Watkins and Mrs. Amy Post of Rochester went on the bail bond of Bennett and Bell. They were arrested half an hour before Miss Tilton was, and when bail was required for her, Mrs. Miller, daughter of Gerrit Smith, was offered and accepted.

When the intelligence was given to the meeting that the arrests had been made, the greatest indignation was manifested by the several speakers, Mrs. Coleman and Prof. Toohey being especially emphatic in their disapproval of the conduct which had been evinced by the illiberal people of Watkins. Upon the return of Bennett and Bell to the meeting-ground, they were received with demonstrations of sympathy and friendship. Hundreds of the audience were eager to shake hands with them, and assure them of their warmest sympathy.

In the evening a meeting and council was held at the Opera House, Mr. Cortlandt Palmer presiding and making a short address. Mr. James Parton delivered a most excellent address on the subject of "The Coming Man's Religion; will he have any?" Mrs. Bristol recited a beautiful original poem, and spoke some fifteen minutes. Speaking was also done by Mrs. Coleman, Mrs. Laura Kendrick, Mrs. P. R. Lawrence. Mr. C. D. B. Mills read several letters to the Convention from Professor Olivia, and others. Among the letters was one from Mrs. Miller, apologizing for having gone on the bail bond of Miss Tilton. She had since read the pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," and found she did not approve of it in tone and temper. On account of Mrs. Miller's regret for having gone bail, Miss Tilton announced her determination to surrender herself on Monday. At this juncture a gentleman offered himself as bail, but Miss Tilton declined the same, saying if she could not have a woman for bail she would accept none. At this moment, Mrs. J. K. Ingalls offered herself as bail, and was accepted. The audience was munificently supplied with music by the Hudson Troupe.

SUNDAY MORNING.

A profuse rain fell in the night, in consequence of which the first meeting was held in the Opera House. Some remarks were made by the Secretary, H. L. Green. He spoke of the proposition to publish the proceedings of the meeting, and asked that those who wished a copy would rise. Some two hundred rose from their seats.

J. M. Peebles addressed the audience for some forty minutes. His subject was Spiritualism. He was followed by Elder Frederick Evans, who spoke in condemnation of the rule of ecclesiasticism, the wrongs of priestcraft, the union of Church and State, etc. He gave interesting reminiscences of the origin of the land reform movement, originated by his brother, George H. Evans, nearly half a century ago. He denounced land monopoly and many of the connecting evils.

Elizur Wright of Boston read an able paper on the untruthful claims of Christianity.

A committee was appointed in part and elected in part on lectures and lecturers for the next year's meeting, consisting of Horace Seaver, G. L. Henderson, J. M. Peebles, D. M. Bennett, H. L. Green, Mrs. L. K. Coleman, Mrs. Amy Post, Mrs. Laura Kendrick, Mrs. Clara Neyman, and Mrs. and F. W. Titus, to which was added the name of the President, T. L. Brown, M.D.

G. L. Henderson, Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, read the fifteen resolutions which the committee had agreed upon, and which are given in this paper. They seemed to give satisfaction, and would doubtless have been passed unanimously by the meeting, but at the request of Mrs. Gage they were laid over till evening, when Mr. Mills, a member of the Committee, and who in common with her was not fully satisfied with all the resolutions, objected to some portions of them.

T. C. Leland, of New York, read an excellent paper on "Organization." It contained many important suggestions, and gave much satisfaction. At the close of the meeting some pointed and excellent remarks were made by Horace Seaver.

In the afternoon, the weather having cleared off, the meeting was held in the Grove. Hon. George W. Julian led off with an able paper in which theology, politics, and finance were duly considered. Prof. Toohey followed in a half-hour's speech, when T. B. Wakeman gave an address of some forty minutes.

A large portrait of Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll, drawn by Mr. J. H. Harter of Auburn, was presented to Mr. H. L. Green as an appreciation of his labors as Secretary of the Association, in an appropriate speech by Dr. T. L. Brown. The picture had been subscribed for by various persons unknown to Mr. Green. The presentation took him by surprise. He was evidently affected, and made some very feeling remarks by way of returning thanks. Several other short speeches were made.

SUNDAY EVENING.

The last meeting was held in the Opera House.

Mrs. Clara Neyman of New York delivered the only regular address of the meeting, after which the Hutchinson family, four in number, gave a concert of several of their unequaled songs. They were repeatedly applauded.

After this the resolutions were taken up and warmly discussed. With very slight exceptions, they gave full satisfaction save the third—in relation to the Comstock laws. The debate was participated in by G. L. Henderson, C. D. B. Mills, T. B. Wakeman, T. B. Taylor, J. P. Mendum, Horace Seaver, Prof. Toohey, Mr. Cabot of Boston, Mrs. Gage, Mr. Coleman, Mrs. R. S. W. Briggs, Mrs. Amy Post, Mrs. Kendrick, C. H. True, and others. The bone of contention seemed to be the obscenity question. Mr. Mills said the Liberals were on trial, and they should take an elevated stand and discountenance everything that might possibly be construed as having any sympathy with indecency or immorality. Mr. Cabot thought there was no more necessity for Liberals to take the trouble to announce their opposition to obscenity than to larceny, house burning, or sheep stealing. Of course they are opposed to wrongs of all kinds, but it is not necessary for them to proclaim it on every occasion. Mr. Wakeman's clear explanation produced a unity of purpose that led to a passage of the entire series.

A late hour had arrived and the larger part of the audience had left, when Prof. Toohey called attention to the matter of raising a defense fund for meeting the necessary expenses of defending Bennett, Bell, and Miss Tilton. Announcement was made that the following subscriptions were made:

James Parton,	$25.00
Cortlandt Palmer,	25.00
T. B. Wakeman,	10.00
E. M. Sellon,	10.00
Mrs. F. W. Titus,	5.00
H. Seaver,	5.00
S. Bremner,	2.00
Mrs. E. Wilcox,	10.00
T. S. Verity,	2.00
F. S. Cabot,	2.00
J. K. Ingalls,	25.00
T. R. Smith,	10.00
R. S. Shoemaker,	1.00
R. L. Myers,	2.00

On account of the lateness of the hour and the consequent smallness of the audience, the matter of taking the names and residence of persons who were disposed to make donations was left to a committee, consisting of G. C. Hubbard, Fox Holden, T. L. Griswold, F. W. Evans, J. K. Ingalls. The remaining portion of the audience departed at 11 1-2 P. M.

Thus closed the Watkins Convention, which had been in its main features a decided success and it is to be hoped will be productive of much good. It has been a pleasant reunion of Liberals from all parts of the country. A great number of excellent speeches have been listened to and many will return to their homes greatly cheered by the opportunities enjoyed.

In the morning meeting it was decided by unanimous vote to hold the next yearly meeting again at Watkins.

It should be stated that at a meeting of the Business Committee, the Association was enlarged so as to embrace the whole State, and the officers of last year were re-elected for another year, to wit., T. L. Brown, M. D., President; H. L. Green, and E. M. Sellon, Secretaries.

[The resolutions passed will be found on page 548 of this paper.]

THE address of Mrs. Colby and Smith will be at Holland, N. Y., during September.

A Hint to the Wise.

BY WM. J. GORSUCH.

We are on the eve of change. Too long has the false usurped the place of the true; too long has labor been held slave, enchained in the galling bonds of aristocratic capital; too long have our prisons been filled with criminals—made thieves and murderers by drink, made drunkards by the false state of society in which we live; too long have beggars thronged our streets, asking for the bread they do not get, compelled to choose starvation or crime.

This country is too wide in extent, too grand in its resources, developed and undeveloped, for such things to be, if there was not something radically wrong in our interpretation of the laws governing man's relation to man.

We all see the evil. Wherein lies its cause and remedy? Its root is not found, as our political leaders say, in the mistakes and abuses of the opposite party; neither is it due to an incarnated principle of evil—Satan—in our midst, misleading, perverting, and influencing man to his destruction. The only devil in the whole universe of God is Ignorance, and this has always been, and will always continue to be, the only obstacle in the way of man's advancement and improvement.

This, then, is the general cause. But the trouble with our so-called leaders and thinkers is, they are too fond of indulging in generalities, and of not descending from their native altitude of transcendentalism to the solid reality of specialities; of vaporing platitudes, and shirking the exertion of laborious research, and the responsibility of advancing ideas that may be fruitful in practical result, and dangerous to the financial success or physical safety of their promulgators.

My desire is to place clearly and, if possible, forcibly before your minds a thought that contains much of practicality, and strikes at the root of the greatest portion of evil that surrounds us in our present condition of civilized barbarism.

The Communist says: "Some have too much, while others have none; some are rolling in wealth while others, just as deserving, are starving; some are satiated with luxury, while others cannot call a crust their own. The goods of this world belong equally to all men, therefore, we must take from the rich and give to the poor; we must have an equal distribution of the wealth of the world; all must stand on the same footing, and have equal shares of what Nature says belongs equally to all." Very good, so far, but there he stops short, while Common Sense mildly asks, "How long will such an ideal state of affairs exist? Will not one rapidly waste his original portion, and, as it cannot be destroyed, will it not pass into other hands, and our former condition of unequal distribution and its attendant evils soon be reached? Must we then let matters remain as they are, or have continual redistributions?"

I fully sympathize with communistic ideas, and offer the following solution to this vexed problem:

Let a limit be fixed by law to individual monetary accumulation. Place that limit wherever you choose—$1,000,000 or $5,000,000; give us the Solonic, or graduated, system of taxation; low rates on small accumulations, and proportionately increased on larger, until when the legal limit is reached, the overplus will be equaled by the taxes. Then we will have an overflowing treasury, pouring out its surplus into the hands of the struggling and needy; a continual and ever-acting state of redistribution, through natural and easy sources, for the good of all and the injury of none.

The question may be raised, "If such a condition of affairs be realized, will it not cripple enterprise? When a man has attained the amount allowed, will he not sit down in inglorious idleness, and instead of continuing aims projected, or entering into new combinations, and so giving employment to thousands of his less fortunate fellow creatures, cease operations, and by this cessation turn out to shift for themselves those who so long have looked to him for guidance, and by a lengthy apprenticeship at following have unfitted themselves to be leaders in this ravenous battle for wealth, or even subsistence? Will not the affairs of this world, instead of being conducted on the grand scale to which we so long have been accustomed, settle down into a narrow, circumscribed condition of mediocrity or stagnation?" To all of this, or any kindred objections that may be urged, I answer "Nay!" When the theory I advocate becomes practically realized, man will never be dwarfed by the long course of subservience to which I have alluded, for, knowing his birthright is independence, and individual, uncontrolled manhood; keeping this idea always prominent, though bowing to ulterior circumstances for a time, yet, in the end, like the butterfly breaking from the chrysalis, he will spring forth in native beauty and power. Also, what is impossible to the individual is easily accomplished by the "joint stock company."

As the weight of a ton, as a ton, depends upon the weight of its component pounds as pounds, so does the strength, value, or rank of a nation, as such, depend upon its composite parts as men; and as a pound must always be equal to any other pound in the ton, or the identity of the whole as a ton is lost, so must a man ever be equal to any other man in the nation, in respect to what constitutes manhood in its broadest sense, or the balance is destroyed, and the success and prosperity of the same impaired or dissipated.

Before the light of scientific research, public schools, and a free and enlightened press, the dark, suffocating clouds of ignorance, bigotry, and tyranny are rapidly rolling back, showing in the foreground of the picture a people free, intelligent, and happy. Free, because they have no masters but their own consciences; intelligent, because sensibly educated; and happy, because their inter-relations are governed by laws looking to the good of the weak as well as the strong, of the few as well as the many, of the individual as well as the body politic.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

Jesus here teaches secondary motives; a lower morality than that of Juvenal. He proceeds to another prudential precept: "Compromise with thy legal opponent quickly, lest he prosecute thee and get thee cast into prison." It does not seem to need a messenger from heaven to inculcate such wisdom. But is he perhaps propounding an allegory? Is the God of all mercies the legal opponent intended? Or is possibly Satan pointed at? Hardly; for how are we to agree, to compromise, or be reconciled to him? God himself must be the adversary alluded to—another appeal to our fears. In any case the solemn declaration, "Thou shalt not come out of prison until thou hast paid the last farthing," is strange, if it be literal; too obscure to instruct, if it be metaphorical. Presently we have the prudential advice to cut off a limb or pluck out an eye, rather than have one's whole body cast into hell. Thus again he appeals to our lower nature, our fears. It may be doubted whether any passionate and brave soul is thus turned away from sin—indeed, whether fear of hell has ever cured even a wretched drunkard. We next find a positive prohibition of swearing. The reasons assigned are wholly unsatisfactory; no definition of swearing is given, nor any explanation whether he means to forbid an oath taken at the command of a magistrate and an oath in sanction of international treaties. Paul more than once swears what may seem to be a full round oath (Rom. ix, 1; 2 Cor. i, 23; Gal. i, 20); he surely must have been profoundly ignorant that Jesus forbade it. After an excellent precept, if somewhat overstated, of kindliness to enemies, Jesus in Matthew damages it by the idea of reward. "If ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the taxgatherers the same?" As if to respond to love without an extra recompense were folly and unthrift, and as if no one who gathered taxes for Cæsar could be other than a reprobate soul, wholly unfit for reward. So in Matt. xviii, 17, he joins a "heathen man and a taxgatherer" as co-ordinate. This seems to denote that Jesus, as much as any Pharisee, thought that to collect tax for Cæsar was a wicked deed, distinctly forbidden by Deut. xvii, 15; though when his opinion is formally asked, he uses a monstrous sophism (according to Matthew) in favor of Cæsar. The command to be perfect as God is perfect shoots as much too high as other precepts too low. It not only commands a simple impossibility, but it propounds nothing tangible or intelligible. Most of our virtues belong only to a being who is finite, frail, and member of a community. We do not praise God for his bravery, for his chastity, for his contentedness and freedom from covetousness, for his modesty or humility. He cannot be our pattern for imitation in such things; and the argument used by Jesus is purely delusive. "As God sends rain on the just and unjust indifferently, so are we to love the just and the unjust indifferently." Is this indeed perfection? Moreover, the tragic argument that in the necessary slaughter of enemies we need not spare women and children, inasmuch as God's earthquakes and hurricanes spare neither sex nor age, is hardly a caricature of that which is here put forward as sacred wisdom. It may be added that such argument implies the very opposite to that noble utterance, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for THEY have vision of God." The speaker had not thought his subject out. At one moment he follows the higher and Hebrew inspiration, which sees the heart of God not in the whirlwind or the earthquake, but in the still, small voice within; at another moment he is carried into the lower pagan idea, which, like our modern Agnostics, judging of God solely by facts which the outward senses attest, logically finds nothing of him but a huge power, reckless of moral considerations, careless of the difference between the just and the unjust.

Next, we are not to do our alms before men, else we shall have no reward in heaven; but if we do our alms in secret, we shall be rewarded by God in public. Is then desire of reward the only or the chief reason for kindness to the needy? Similarly we must pray in secret to get a reward in public! We are to forgive men's trespasses in order to get forgiveness of our own trespasses from God. Did such a motive ever produce real virtue? When we fast, we must not show any neglect of our appearance; then our Father in heaven will reward us. Is then fasting in itself a virtue deserving heavenly wages? Surely it deserves not even human esteem, if presented as a meritorious act; but is delusive and dangerous. Further, we are to abstain from judging, in order to escape being judged; a very mean reason.

In this rapid review we are not comparing the doctrine with any new lights of modern times, but with those of "pagans," so called; with Aristotle, Zeno, Cicero. But besides, while the motives suggested by Jesus are constantly too low, the deeds commanded may be called too high; that is, the precepts are simply extravagant, and thereby pernicious. It is indeed extravagant and false to say that a lustful look is equivalent to adultery; for out of twenty men who might wrongfully indulge the eye, which does not hurt one's neighbor, there might not be so much as one who would guiltily wrong a woman or her husband. Overstrained doctrine can only have morbid results. Surely he overstrains hurtfully in commanding us, if struck on the cheek, to court a second blow; a thing which, according to our narrators, neither Jesus nor Paul did (John xviii, 23; Acts xxiii, 3; xvi, 37). Such precepts in fact tend to insincerity and an evil conscience, because we cannot wholly lay aside good sense. Those which range from Matt. vi, 19 to 34 never have been obeyed, except in a socialistic community which disowns private property; even there it is a virtue and a necessity, in the interest of all, for each to take earnest thought for the morrow, and to lay up stores for future need.

Three Days with the Ghosts.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of July 20th I see a letter from Mr. D. Jenkins, of Hannibal, Mo., giving his experience of "One Week with the Ghosts." Having had the opportunity of spending three days with the same ghost (as I believe there is but one ghost there), and as Mr. Jenkins has made use of my name in his make-up, I would like briefly to give my experience, and at the same time make a few remarks on the subject discussed by him. I will take no exceptions to his description of Mr. Mott except the "honesty and truthfulness" part, and that I will leave to the hundreds who have visited him. In his description of Mott's room he forgot to say that it is located near the center of the house; there is not a room in the house that is used for his guests that does not join his room—a fact which will explain itself when we come to the intelligence part of his seances. In his description of the cabinet, and the "bell ringing one afternoon when no mortal hands could have come in contact with it," how could he have overlooked the window in the south end of the cabinet, 17x18 inches, with a sash in it hung on hinges, and a common slat blind? The bell is not hung more than six inches from this window. In describing the furniture of the cabinet he does not mention the foot-stool, which is very convenient to stand upon to make a tall ghost; and that footstool is covered with cloth, both top and bottom, so it will not make any noise moving around. The cabinet is also carpeted, to soften the tread of the ghosts. He says that "on the outside of the aperture is a shelf, on which, for convenience, stands an ear-trumpet." That is so; and it is very convenient; for should one put the ear-trumpet to his nose instead of his ear, he will get a good smell of tobacco fumes, after Mr. Mott's having smoked a strong Missouri leaf. I could detect it, and have received several letters from parties who have visited Mott's seances, stating the same facts.

As to the light, one can recognize a person sitting next to him, but six or eight feet away it would be difficult; but in the cabinet it is not so light; one can only see the outlines of a face—they cannot distinguish the features, or that peculiarity that makes a person look different from everybody else. I could not tell a child's face shown me there from half of a grown person's face, the other half covered with a dark cloth; or a person's hand partly folded moving about. There were no features about it. The small faces I saw were all low down, and hardly visible at all. And then one can only see the faces by "glimpses," as Mr. Jenkins says. A person might catch a glimpse of a resemblance to some person they knew, but not the features, so as to identify them beyond a doubt. He says: "Each in his or her turn goes up to the door; . . . a large and rather portly apparition appears, to whom you are introduced as Saul Bludsoe, . . . as the spirit-manager of the circle." He ought to have said, also, that when Mrs. Mott introduces you she says he will tell you if there are any of your friends here to see you. This is the time when the timid break down. The carbolic acid smell one gets then, to give them a funereal-like feeling and make them think they are in the presence of the dead, will drive some to their seats weeping. This spoils them from getting much till they are put through a course with Von Hivens; but it has a good effect on the stronger ones; it begins to take the skepticism out of them. They go up, and Mr. Bludsoe says, "Good evening;" of course they say "Good evening," and ask if any of their friends are there. He usually asks, "Who do you want to see?" You ask for a brother, son, or daughter, and before he gets through with you he will know their names; consequently he knows yours. This smell dies away with Bludsoe; you seldom get it with other spirits.

What is the object of having every one of the company go up to see this Bludsoe—he is a stranger to all—unless it is to gather information to give back again at some other time? If he is not successful you will have to wait until another night, till after you have had a talk with Von Hivens.

Bludsoe and Dr. Reed are, no doubt, masked faces; they are different from the other apparitions. I think Mr. Jenkins will remember that Mrs. Mott usually goes up between each visitor in front of the aperture and ascertains who is wanted next. How easy it would be, in a room with a "subdued light under a transparency," for her, several feet away, with her back towards you, to pass in and take out false whiskers, nightcaps, etc., necessary to make up a variety of ghosts. As for clothing, it only requires a white napkin over the shoulders and a cap or handkerchief over the head to change a man ghost into a woman ghost. It is not necessary that she should assist him unless there was to be a test seance, as Mott goes in and comes out of the cabinet without being examined, and gets very indignant should one even insinuate that he was not genuine. His guests are usually so intimidated in this way that they will seldom question or investigate him very closely for fear of offending him. I took notice that Mr. Mott was careful to take off his watch every time before entering the cabinet. He told one person of this place that it was a habit he had; he told another that he was afraid the spirits would break it—that they had done so once; but I think the reason is that when one puts their ear to the aperture, in the death-like stillness, to hear the faint whispers of the loved ones, and should hear the watch tick, they would be surprised at the idea of the spirits carrying a timepiece.

The evidence of Mr. Jenkins appears to be pretty much all hearsay. He did not get anything satisfactory the first two nights. That is the way with all who do not talk too much, or where Mott has not been posted ahead by a confederate. One has to board with Mott long enough for him to get the cue before they can get satisfaction, and then a large proportion—Spiritualists, as well as skeptics—go away dissatisfied and convinced that Mott is a trickster—with all his shrewdness in rejecting everybody that looks suspicious or that does not see fit to board with him. It is a well-known fact that a great many are rejected even when he is not crowded.

It appears that, from "the glimpses given him" (that is right; no one gets anything but glimpses), looking into that black hole, he recognized, with some exceptions, his sister, who had been dead THIRTY years. He did well; I think he ought to be satisfied. From the intelligence he got, it only shows that Mott must have been better posted about some particulars in Hannibal than himself. He relates the stories that "pious brethren employed a professor of jugglery to expose Mott, at an expense of three thousand dollars, and was confronted by his dead father, and that rascals have acknowledged and given up their ill-gotten gain," etc.; all of which he must have got from Mott himself, for Mott told me the same stories, and others ten times more ridiculous—about stones coming down through the roof of his house into his room, and no visible marks left showing where they came through, and numerous others; but I will not sicken the reader by relating them. The fish story quoted by Mr. Jenkins is big enough; but Mott can beat anything recorded in ancient writings. It is all well enough for those constituted in a way to take it in. It is good food to prepare the mind for the evening services or seances at Mott's. Everything is conducted there in a way to lead the believer in the right direction.

The certificate he (Mr. Jenkins) furnishes from Memphis, Mo., looks bad without a name to it, although he says it was signed by fifteen persons who have attended from "three to a thousand seances." I would like to see the shape of a man's head that has attended a thousand seances at Mott's. The list of names of prominent men taken from Mott's register is no evidence. You will often find the names of prominent men on the register of a country hotel; still, that is no evidence that they would recommend the hash they got there. I would like to see the written opinion of these men. He says: "A lady conversed with the control (Christopher Johanness Von Hivens) in Dutch fluently and accurately, as she states, although Mr. Mott knows little or nothing of it." How does Mr. Jenkins or anybody else know that Mott knows little or nothing of it? Mr. Mott is probably smart enough to keep that to himself. I have been told that a German who has attended Mott's seances says Von Hivens cannot talk German with any accuracy; that he can only about half talk the language. When Von Hivens (Mott, in his pretended trance) is talking to his visitors, he speaks in broken English, and it is the worst imitation I ever heard; such as "congumption" for consumption, etc. I will agree with Mr. Jenkins that it is amusing and sometimes interesting—so much so that it throws his visitors off their guard, and it is supposed, especially with the faithful ones, that Mr. Mott's ears are closed, as well as his eyes, and they are apt to say things that are interesting to Mott. They will call one another by name; then they will be called up by name the next night. Von Hivens will tell you who was there to see you, if you will ask him. He seldom tells their name, but says an old man or a young man, a little girl or a middle-aged woman, etc. The company present will begin to get anxious and ask if their brother John or daughter Mary, etc., were there, and name over all the relatives they have lost in the past ten or twenty years. It appears Mr. Jenkins went back thirty years. So you will see Mott is posted for the next night; and this is the reason one does not get anything the first night and seldom the second, as Mr. Jenkins informs us. Should any one inquire earnestly about a person that never lived, or for some one that is still living, that spirit will appear to them the next night, and give the name correctly. This Von Hivens is an ingeniously arranged intelligence office for the benefit of Mott, by gathering information from the company. Mrs. Mott leaves the room immediately on Von Hivens taking control, leaving the company free to prepare the way for a successful seance the next evening. If Von Hivens is so wonderful and such good authority (as he represents), why not take his explanation of the analine stains found on Mr. Mott's face? Von Hivens said repeatedly, as soon as he took control of Mott, that I threw the stuff in the face of a spirit; that it was the spirit I was talking with—a brother to one of the party present. He told the brother of the spirit that he ought to whip me for insulting his brother by squirting the nasty stuff into his face. He said that they (the spirits) would fix me when I came to the spirit world. Von Hivens was very much excited, and talked loud; so I think I shall stay on this little ball of dirt as long as I can conveniently before going to see him. I shall give him all the time possible to cool off. When asked how the dye came on the medium, he said that when the spirit dematerialized and the substance drawn from the medium went back to him, it left the imprint on the medium. All of Mott's friends present concurred with Von Hivens in this theory until some time afterwards, when they, together with outsiders who know nothing of the facts, invented different theories, and gave the lie to Von Hivens.

In referring to this analine test, Mrs. Mott says, in a letter published in the Memphis, Mo., Reveille, and the substance of which was published in the Chicago Religio-Philosophical Journal June 1st: "When Mr. Mott came to consciousness he knew nothing of what had happened, but asked me the usual question, 'What kind of a seance did you have?' and went to get his segar, as is his custom. I said to Mr. Pitkin, 'Shall I tell him now?' and he replied, 'Oh, no; not to-night.' . . . As I thought he would notice that we were excited, I told him; he then went to the glass and saw that his shirt was wet and stained; then he was angry, and got his shot-gun," etc.

Now, Mr. Jenkins and everybody else that ever attended a seance there knows that Mr. Mott remains in the chair in the cabinet while under the control of Von Hivens, usually from twenty to thirty minutes; the time depends upon how interesting it is to Mott, not the company. He always comes out of the trance in the cabinet. On the evening referred to his face was washed about half an hour in the cabinet; then he was taken out through the seance room to his room or sitting-room, and there he was put through the scrubbing process, using soap, lard, and sweet oil, for fully two hours, his necktie and collar taken off, his shirt wet and stained, and he remaining in the trance all this time. It was past one o'clock A. M. when he came out of the trance, and he was "unconscious that anything unusual had taken place." Why are they so anxious to make the public believe what they do not believe themselves?

Mr. Jenkins says he is an "incorrigible disbeliever; . . . that the evidence is not convincing." If he was not convinced, why should he try so hard to convince others? These manifestations of Mott's are either genuine or frauds; and if he does not believe them to be genuine, he must believe them to be frauds. If he is Mott's attorney to plead his case, let us so understand him. If he considers himself a witness, I certainly shall have to call him a willing one.

I have offered to try the analine test over again. Prominent and worthy Spiritualists here have offered to give him fair and honorable tests in his own house; but he remains silent. Scientific Spiritualists of Chicago offer him reasonable and liberal terms to redeem himself; as yet I do not hear of his having accepted. He and his relatives prefer to establish his business again by sending their traveling agents over the country, hire articles written for the press, and pay newspapers to publish articles devoid of truth and full of misrepresentations, as was the case with the Quincy, Ill., Herald.

I will give you some of the intelligence I got at Mr. Mott's seances. The first form I saw, representing a woman, I asked (rather anxiously), "Is that you, mother?" The answer was, "Yes." I conversed with her a short time, but could not understand her distinctly. When I asked if she was not my grandmother, as she looked too old for mother, the answer was, "I am your mother." I asked her some more questions, when she abruptly bid me good-night. At the close I asked Von Hivens if it was mother or grandmother I saw. He snapped out that it was my own mother; that she did not like it because I was not willing to recognize her. I apologized, and let the matter drop, though not satisfied, as my mother is living in New Hampshire.

To test the accuracy of Mott's ear, I remarked to the party with me, after we had retired to our room one night, that I thought I saw a cousin of mine who died in the East a few years ago—giving his name, place, etc.—but he seemed to be too weak to talk; but I was in hopes he would get strong enough the next night, as it would be a good test. I described him as having chin whiskers. Sure enough, the next night he came, gave me the same name, place, etc., just as I had related the story the night before, which was all false, as I never had any such cousin and do not know of any such place.

During the same seances Mr. Regnier asked a spirit if it was his sister; the answer was, "Yes." He got considerable information about his family from her—some truth, mixed with a great many mistakes. It was convincing to him, as he never had a sister on this side of the river; but if Mott is genuine he must have one on the other side. Mr. Regnier had long communications from his brother Austin. When he inquired of his spirit-brother if he wished to send any word to his widow, he said, "Yes; tell her not to marry again. I do not want her to marry." As Austin is still living, he did not think it important to hurry the message to her.

We received many similar communications. It depends a great deal on how inquisitive one is, and how they ask their questions, whether they are successful. The whispers (when the spirits do not know just what to say) are very indistinct. If one is asking for the name of a spirit that appears to them, they will get the sound of different letters with a hissing sound connected to them. You ask several times, and you hear the sound c with a tail to it; if you have lost a relative or friend by the name of Charles, you will say, "Did you say Charles?" The answer will be, "Yes." You will say, "I am glad to see you;" and the conversation will go on in this way. Some get intelligence there that seems astonishing. So we do with the gypsies; but, like them, Mott makes a great many mistakes. He ought to do better than they; he probably does, as he has the advantage that the majority of his visitors that are admitted are too much like Thomas R. Hazard and Stephen Young; they think it would be sacrilegious to ask questions that would test the genuineness of a medium or in any way say anything that would have a tendency to lead the pretended spirits from the truth, but think it their duty to lead them in the other direction.

Mrs. M. F. Barnes (who permits me to use her name) writes as follows:

LINCOLNVILLE, IND., May 19, 1878.

J. H. PATTEE, Dear Sir: I write to render the thanks of my husband and myself to you for the only method there was of exposing that miserable, wretched piece of humanity, Mott. . . . We are rejoiced, for I have been there, and know how Bludsoe, Von Hivens, and Mott—the trinity—are resolved into one, and that one a drinking, debauched soul, trifling with the affections of people all over the world. . . . When at the aperture, listening to the pretended spirits, I could smell the fume of tobacco distinctly. . . . I think we will get these disgusting barnacles off the old ship of Spiritualism after a while; then the dear old ship will hoist her flag of truth and justice to all men and women at the mast-head, and sail into port with a clear hull.

MRS. M. F. BARNES.

I could quote similar testimony from about forty letters I have received, would space admit. I have no desire to injure the cause of Spiritualism or any other ism. I am free from any sect or religious society, and am at liberty, and have no other interest, than to express myself as I believe, and state the facts as I saw and heard them at Mr. Mott's.

Parties writing me say Mott was making from ten to fifteen dollars a day when they were there. A Memphis, Mo., gentleman writes that it was the only business there that was making money without any capital invested. So Mr. and Mrs. Mott are interested, and after they have published their articles and advertisements over the country, it is right that the other side should be heard, so that those contemplating going there will be better prepared to decide before taking the trip. Should they go, they will find it about as Mrs. Mott said to me, "That if one seeks truth they will get truth, should they seek falsehood they will get falsehood." Yours respectfully, J. H. PATTEE.

The Mott Case Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Will you allow a word in reply to the statement of your correspondent who skulks behind the pseudonym of "Anti-Fraud," contained in your issue of the 3d inst.? If conscious of truthfulness, he should be neither afraid nor ashamed to give his real name; but it is quite evident to those who witnessed the signal failure of Pattee & Co., including Col. Bundy, to convict Mott of fraud, whence it comes.

As Thomas Paine showed up the errors, absurdities, and diabolisms of the Bible by the contents of the book itself, so have these confederates been convicted of fraud and falsehood by their own words and works, which must, of course, rankle in their breasts as do the labors of Thomas Paine in the hearts of the priesthood; hence this covert attack on Mott and his friends.

I hereby challenge your correspondent to a fair discussion of the question of Mott's fraudulency through any paper that will open its columns to us, and I will give him twice the space that I may occupy. But he must come out from behind his screen like a man. His tirade contained scarcely a word of truth. There is no one here or elsewhere having any pecuniary interest in Mott's mediumship, as he insinuates. As for myself, it has cost me many dollars, but I consider it money well laid out. Whatever I have said in favor of Mr. Mott's mediumship has been in the spirit of the Golden Rule. "Anti-Fraud" says, "Col. Mackay of Leavenworth obtained passes for Mott to go to Colorado, on promise to stop off on his return and give some test seances." False! Col. Mackay had nothing to do with obtaining passes for Mott. They were presented by Mr. E. J. Halsted of Chicago. Col. Mackay needs no tests for himself, having had them repeatedly here to his entire satisfaction. He was here a few months ago, and among his other spirit friends who greeted him and identified themselves was an Indian chief. And the Colonel is expected here soon again, not to become convinced of the truth of form manifestations, for that he is perfectly satisfied of already, but to exchange civilities with friends in the summer-land.

"Anti-Fraud" is equally at fault if he supposes the Pattee abortion has lessened the confidence or interest of the public in the mediumship of Mr. Mott; there have been more applications during the "heated term" than could be entertained. He bids fair to become "honored even in his own country," several neighbors having attended and seen their lost ones simply from learning of the fraud attempted by this same "Anti-Fraud" or his ilk. Even Col. Bundy felt constrained to state in his paper of June 1st—the proof becoming so conclusive that Pattee was the exposed party—that "We give Mr. Mott the benefit of ample space this week, and present evidence which, taken as a whole, seems to establish the proof of spirit form-manifestations in his presence beyond a reasonable doubt."

But I am extending this beyond my proposed limits, and will close by saying that the tests which we get at Mr. Mott's are entirely independent of the question of the medium's honesty or freedom; and no logical mind can fail to see it by attending three or four seances.

Mr. Mott offered the Pattee party the privilege of selecting one of their number to sit in the cabinet with him as a test to them, but they declined; it would have interfered with the consummation of their fraudulent designs—but as it was they completely exposed themselves.

Book Notices.

WE HAVE received the eleventh annual report of the meeting of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston, May 30, and 31, 1878. It contains an account of the work of the Association for the past year, the statement of the treasurer in regard to their financial standing, which is good considering the obstacles they have overcome, and addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George William Curtis, T. B. Wakeman, Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith, Miss Anna C. Garlin, Wm. H. Spencer, Mrs. Clara Neyman, and Maurace Ellinger. The speeches and essays are worth several times the forty cents asked for the book, being full of advanced thoughts and ideas—ideas with which the Liberals of the country cannot be too familiar. That of Mr. Frothingham is a ringing plea for freedom and the need of such organizations. He says in regard to the work which they have in hand: "The battle of the Association, so far from being finished, is as yet scarcely begun. It will not be finished until there is a complete divorce between religion as instituted and all secular human affairs—until human affairs are conducted on their own natural and reasonable principles. As long as a man like Charles Bradlaugh, in London, is persecuted because he is an Atheist; as long as a man like D. M. Bennett, of New York, is persecuted because he is a come-outer; as long as any men or women in Boston and other cities are kept under the eye of surveillance on the ground that they are preaching blasphemy because they do not preach the orthodox opinions—so long will the Free Religious Association have all its work to do. So long as there is any mist of confusion in the public mind between free-thinking and free-living, between heresy and immorality, so long will the Free Religious Association be called upon to come to the front and make its earnest protest against such a barbarous confusion of ideas, and insist upon it that things shall be rightly defined, shall be fairly understood, and that principles shall be acted upon, not prejudices."

THE ETHICS OF SPIRITUALISM; A System of Moral Philosophy, Founded on evolution and the continuity of man's existence beyond the grave. By Hudson Tuttle, author of "Arcana of Nature," "Antiquity of Man," "Career of the God-Idea in History," etc. Chicago: Religio-Philosophical Publishing House. 160 pp. Price, in cloth, 60 cents; pamphlet 40 cents.

Not having had time yet to give this volume a thorough examination, we take the liberty of inserting here the review of the same from the Religio-Philosophical Journal:

"We have carefully read "Ethics," and must say the subject has been admirably handled all the way through. Mr. Tuttle's style may be called incisive, for he cuts boldly into and clear through many errors, and unhesitatingly lays them open to view; then leaping the chasm thus caused, he conducts the reader into the fields of deductive truth with the hand of a ready master.

"Starting with the proposion that 'A correct system of morals must be founded, not on any supposed revelation or ancient form of faith, but on the constitution of man,' he shows the fallacy of the dogmas that would attempt to contradict that statement, and reasoning from evolution as a basis, demonstrates that 'Man, never having fallen, needs no redemption.' Man is then considered as an individual, his susceptibility of infinite improvement is shown as residing in his moral faculties, and his position and destiny pointed out. The growth of the body and subsequent advancement of mind are presented, and matter and force defined as the foundation upon which Spiritualism is based. The doctrine of reincarnation is shown by logical deduction to be a fallacy; the origin of life traced to the primordial cell, and man is shown to be the outgrowth of the ages. The aim of the creative energy is shown to be the conferring of immortality—that the body was made to serve the mind, and not the mind the body.

"The chapter on the Appetites shows the benefit of being natural, temperate, and judicious to insure happiness. The selfish propensities are discussed somewhat at length, and it is shown that when held to their true sphere, they are pure and right; perverted or in excess they lead to wrong doing and the injury of others. Love, Benevolence, and Justice are examined in their different bearings, and their true relations are presented, in connection with Wisdom and Conscience.

"The province of the Will is carefully examined, and shown to depend upon the action of all the faculties. The relations of labor and capital are tersely stated, and the rights of labor clearly though briefly laid down; the illustration of the mill is very happily presented. The rights of woman are shown to depend upon the question, 'Is she a human being?' The duty of individuals, of parents to children, and children to parents, forms an interesting section.

"The duty and obligations of society to individuals are well presented in the 'Fable of the Wheel.' One of the very best chapters is on the duty of society to criminals; and although the ideas advanced may seem to be utopian, yet society can never be free from the depredations of criminals until its efforts are directed to the reform of that class of persons, and, through their radical cure, cease to bind upon the children the burdensome sins of the parents. The chapter on the duty of self-culture presents more food for thought than many entire books, or even some whole libraries.

"Monogamic marriage is presented as the only true domestic relation, and is viewed in its different bearings. Mr. Tuttle concludes the work with the idea that what is possible to one is possible to all; that Spiritualism makes man the divine center, and that he should purify the inner temple of his soul in order to have healthy spiritual growth; that we are not living for ourselves alone, but for the good of all.

"The author grasps his ideas with a strong mind, and indites them with the pen of a ready writer. The book is replete throughout with suggestive ideas, calculated to stir the minds and impart an impulse to the thoughts of the reader, and is a work every Spiritualist and every opposer of Spiritualism should thoroughly read and ponder."

A CATERPILLAR improves in morals—when it turns over a new leaf.

Letters from Friends.

BUCHANAN, MICH., Aug. 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Being a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper in my opinion that was ever published on this continent, I ask the privilege through its columns to correct an error that some of its contributors have fallen into. In looking over the past we find but few men that have dared to publish an outspoken journal of any kind against old theology. The Boston Investigator has been in existence nearly half a century, but it has failed to grapple with all the errors that have been forced upon mankind by old theology. It has been either from lack of a proper knowledge of science, connected with man's spiritual nature, or a lack of moral courage. I notice that a portion of the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are on the same plane, and a portion of them are adverse to rendering unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; they dreadfully hate to give to Spiritualists or Spiritualism any credit for the present state of advancement from a Liberal standpoint. Allow me to say to all such, that had it not been for Spiritualism THE TRUTH SEEKER would never have been in existence. Had it not been for one of our sisters that was put in Ludlow street jail by that hypocrite Anthony, the tool of Plymouth Church, Sister Wheelock would not have dared to write the articles she writes for your paper on sexuality. No, friend Bennett, to Spiritualism almost alone belongs the credit of unfolding the minds of the people and bringing them to a standard where they might discuss the philosophy of sexualism outside of a doctor's shop. I object, as one, to the Liberalists taking all the glory to themselves out of the seventy thousand signers, of that noted petition for the repeal of the fugitive Comstock law. The greater portion were Spiritualists. Freethinkers in this country are generally Spiritualists. Hoping that the contributors to your paper will not forget that Spiritualists are the greatest Freethinkers on earth, and have done more to open the eyes of the blind, unstop the ears of the deaf, and loosen the tongues of the dumb, than any or all other isms combined, we leave them to consider what we deem an error on their part. Give the devil his due if there is any. Yours fraternally, I. D. SEELEY.

We find men who claim a belief in God or a supreme power in some form is innate in man, and that there is no nation or tribe known who has not some form of worship and something to worship. If you have any work to refer to on this please let me know. Truly yours,

THE SOUL OR SPIRIT.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Aug. 19, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: In these days of inquiry after truth, the question often arises as to what is the soul, or spirits of man. Whence came it? Did it have an existence before it was made manifest as a thinking, reasoning attribute of the physical body? or is it a new creation at or about the time of the birth of every nestling infant? Now all, or nearly all, that we know from personal knowledge in the present undeveloped state of psychical science on this question is a good deal shrouded in mystery and speculation. Psychic science is comparatively a new science in the world, and it is opening a new field of inquiry, and over its portals is written, "Enter and know thyself." In ages past this has been forbidden ground, guarded by the dogmas of religions and creeds. And any of the inquiring minds, who have dared approach this fruitful field of knowledge have been met at its portals by the emissaries of these dogmas, with a "Thus saith the gods," or a "Thus saith the Lord," and woe be to him who dared to proceed beyond the limits marked out by the various religious creeds and dogmas of all the nations that have had an existence upon earth, from the days of the Athenian martyr, Socrates, down through all of the ages of cruelty and crime of the Roman and Christian persecutions, even to this day of the nineteenth century and the persecutions of Anthony Comstock and his backers, the Society for the Suppression of Obscenity, vice, upheld and backed by an arrogant and assuming Christian Church.

But notwithstanding the persistent opposition psychic and occult science has had to meet, the few years past have developed men of science who have dared to think and dared to utter their thoughts, and we have no doubt but that ere another half century shall have passed, the philosophy of the soul will be as well understood as the philosophy of light, electricity, or gravitation now.

So what I shall have to say on this subject of the soul or spirit will only be the emanation of my own thoughts.

As to whether there is a supreme mind or essence, called God, supervising and controling the universe of matter, I will not attempt to discuss at present. The more advanced scientists of the day are adopting the evolution theory and teaching that there are no new creations, but that all matter and things that now exist have always existed in some form of matter, and will always continue to exist.

And as this is the theory advanced by the most enlightened thinkers that we have at the present time, as well as the most reasonable that has as yet been educed, we cannot do better than accept it until some more advanced minds may perhaps produce something better, and thus demonstrate to us that we have not yet reached the whole truth.

Therefore, taking this theory of perpetual and endless existence as the ground-work of my reasoning, I claim that the soul or spirit is a substance, no matter how refined or subtile it may be.

It then becomes a reasonable supposition or hypothesis that the soul has always existed in some form of matter, somewhere in the universe, even though it may have been in the most inconceivably infinitesimal particles of matter, and that these infinitesimal particles of spiritual matter have had conjointly a united existence with equally infinitesimal particles of physical matter, and these unitedly have been, are, and ever will be the germinal principle from which human beings have been, are, or will be fecundated. The two principles are doubtless insolubly connected until fecundation takes place, after which they may separate and have a separate existence. That this principle of continuous life is confined to the human race I am not prepared to say. While these two principles are united here on earth they usually grow with each other's growth, but not always, for there are many cases of long spiritual growth, in a feeble or dwarfed physical body. And again, there are many cases of long healthy, physical growth in connection with a weak spiritual growth, showing the capability of the one growing independent of the other, and in many cases we see the mind, which is an emanation of the spiritual, and with it constituting the soul, vigorous and healthy when the physical body is at the same time beginning to show symptoms of decay.

All of these things show to us evidences of a continued existence, outside of the hundreds of other evidences we see around us every day.

Notwithstanding that nearly all professed Infidels, Materialists, and Iconoclasts accept the evolution theory, yet many of them will keep saying, that the soul must of necessity cease to exist when the body goes to decay, on the assumption that it had a beginning and must of necessity have an end, at the same time adhering to the law of evolution which teaches that there is no beginning or end to anything. If the perfume of the rose that floats on the desert air is never lost, be it ever so diffused, then why would not the soul, the grandest thing of which we have any knowledge continue to exist. Yours in search for truth,

F. F. FOLLET.

WHEATLAND, IOWA, Aug. 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I cannot close without saying in hopes to encourage you, "Go in" Bennett, you have "got the bulge" on the cultured gentleman. I have got a bet on you and think you are a long ways ahead. Had been thinking of becoming a member of the Liberal League but excuse me while Abbot is president. Give us Bennett or T. C. Leland for president, then we will "go in" and be happy, but as at present officered too much kulture kant kum in and feel at hum! Yours truly,

JEROME DUTTON.

SPRINGFIELD, MO., August 4, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Many thanks to both you and our dear mutual friend, Mrs. Henrietta Buckner, of Texas, for the reception, as a present from her of a copy of your morrocco, gilt-edged "Champions of the Church," a work I have greatly desired to peruse, and which, I assure you, was a welcome, as well as unexpected, surprise to me. It did me good, truly, to rest my eyes upon the elegant profile contained therein of its author, and to feel assured that the Liberals of America had in D. M. Bennett so able an exponent of the principles of freedom and justice.

I don't much wonder at the "cultured editor's" jealousy toward you, when it is apparent to all that you so far outrival him in the great work of elevating and benefiting humanity. While he is cogitating, you are executing; and when once fully cognizant of the masterly work you are accomplishing he can but ejaculate in tones of nervousness, "Go slow!" Do not step on Mother Grundy's toes, for if you do you are likely to bring reproach upon all "refined Liberalists," and array the whole orthodox world against us, in your great haste to expose and subvert their acts of cruelty and oppression. This you doubtless have well done in the work before me. I have just barely had time to scan its table of contents, and carefully read its introduction, which I find to be both comprehensive and elucidative.

The book doubtless deserves greater eulogy than I am competent to give it, but suffice to say, it must be very unlike other productions of yours not to be useful and instructive. Be assured, dear friend, it will be duly prized, and all the more so because of the pleasant remembrances of its highly esteemed donor. Again many thanks to you both.

Fraternally yours, J. S. LYON, M.D.

THREE GROVE, NEB., Aug. 18, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I received the "Champions of the Church" with half a dozen other books. Perhaps I have become a little lukewarm, as our orthodox brethren say, but it would seem that mankind cannot easily confine their minds always to one subject. I have given much thought to the subject of religion or superstition, have read sufficient to perfectly satisfy myself on the subject. I shall leave my books where my children can read them as they arrive at an age when these subjects must claim their attention. I shall not in the future read much on the religious subject, my mind will be on politics or finance, and good government, and the best plan to save my little property from getting away these hard times and make it last a few years for my own benefit, and lastly for my children. There is no question but you have surpassed all other editors and authors in getting before the people Liberal literature. There is a difficulty, however, in getting up so large and valuable publications as you are sending out weekly, but it is to be hoped that your efforts will be appreciated by those who are with you, and that the Liberals will sustain such efforts and establish you on a permanent basis. Wishing success to your efforts, I remain yours,

L. G. TODD.

MR. MYERS EXPLAINS THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

MR. EDITOR: I write you not so much as an advocate of woman's rights as an exponent of woman's wrongs. Some one has said that an honest man was the noblest work of God. Considering the material used in making him I am not sure but what it is so; but in the construction of woman God had the advantage of what had already been done; he merely took a portion of that noble work and made an improvement on it. But, through the long lapse of time since the "creation," conceited man has treated woman, not as a superior, not as an equal, but as an inferior being.

But as man becomes more enlightened by his contact with society he is better enabled to keep pace with the rapid changes that are taking place. Customs, doctrines, fashions, are undergoing constant changes, and always for the better.

Woman is not to-day the slave she was a hundred years ago; then she was compelled to make the clothing for herself and family, and also the cloth of which it was composed. Now this is all done by steam. Woman owes this to James Watt. His brain conceived the power of steam and his hands constructed the machine through which it became the servant of man. Arkwright nearly invented a new method of making this force do old work. He released millions of fingers from the work that once indicated woman's sphere as the wife, the weaver.

The steam loom is now the wife of civilization; it spins and weaves for its countless millions.

Is this the end of woman's usefulness?

Must she fall or rise as the new servants come to do the drudgery for the world?

For answer let me show you the master-piece of art, Raphael's Madonna the emblem of grace, motherhood, and home. The artist has neither painted a virgin nor a virgin mother. She is a grand universal type of the motherhood of our race. Her face beams with love; the milk of human kindness is seen in her loving eyes as well as in her expanded bosom.

She is to be no longer the slave, the drudge, the weaver; she is to be no longer the victim of lawless or licensed caprice.

To be a mother crowns her with glory; to give to her child love is to weave the garments of grace and beauty for body and soul.

With her and her child there is what all dream and hope for—home. There is woman's world and man's heaven. Within its sacred domain mortality puts on immortality.

Strip man's world of woman and home, and all reason for activity ends. When affection and action cease there is no more need of thought.

The blank shadows of night will then close over the human world.

Man is the brain and arm, but woman is the heart.

Woman makes home in the world; true religion will make the world a home.

How many men there are who spend the best portion of their lives in undoing, that is, in unlearning the lessons of their youth. You seldom see any one that at fifty is still traveling in the path he was in his youth; his theories have changed, he has found by experience that the lessons of his youth were not all true. The multiplication table has never changed; water still runs down hill; but the many points of doctrine—that is to say, dogmas; ungrounded beliefs—he was taught in his youth he has heard contradicted; he has seen them utterly disproved.

How much better, then, it would be, in teaching the young, merely to teach such things as can be proved, and not consume the time of the young in learning such things as doctrine.

The mothers of our country hold the keys of human weal and woe. They are the potters; their children are the clay; they have the molding of them, and society is the furnace; its effect on them rarely betters their form; it merely hardens it, sometimes warps it.

Then why deprive woman of the right of suffrage; they have far more power over the country in which they live than the men have.

If the women, as a whole, want the right to vote, they can have it. If not in the present generation, they can in the next.

The common argument against woman suffrage is that if a woman votes and holds office she must perform military duty, work the road, etc. This is not necessarily the case. You will hear it asserted, too, that if a woman puts herself in a man's place, she would be more likely to be insulted. If man has appointed himself a guardian for women, it is the duty of every man to treat them with respect. You say they forfeit all claims whenever they put themselves on an equality with you. Go take lessons of the brutes; instinct will teach you to respect women.

If women were more generally distributed in their avocations; if there were not so many places where men could collect by themselves, there would be less obscenity, less low, debasing conversation. G. W. MYERS.

EAST SAGINAW, MICH., Aug. 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: I received the dozen numbers you sent me lately for distribution and sample copies, hoping they may produce new patrons for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I value it more than any other paper I can find, for the fearless and outspoken sentiments therein expressed, and the grand truths I find in it. I know old orthodoxy must feel she has but a short time longer to hold her people to listen to such twaddle as her leaders have chosen to deal out to the growing intellect of the age. People of brains now begin to think and philosophize a little for themselves, and do not accept the old dogmas of the past. I know there are many thousands who would patronize THE TRUTH SEEKER if they were able and were acquainted with its sentiments. Is it not the truth of all things that intelligent people are seeking for? I answer, Yes! and the man or woman who cannot accept facts and good philosophy is not wise. "The one who can reason, and will not, is a bigot; and he who can, and dares not, is a slave; and he who cannot is a fool." Reader, tell me, which of these will you choose for yourself? Bro. Bennett gives us the whole truth, wherever he finds it; and he who cannot bear the light of the truth, let him hide his eyes in the dark, behind superstition, where ignorance is bliss. I have read a few articles from some of your correspondents who condemned you for giving facts, as you understood the subjects at the time. "The philosophy of life—who am I, what am I, and whither am I bound?" This is a study which should engross the attention of all mankind.

I will do all I can to further the circulation of your valuable paper. I am, dear brother, yours ever for truth,

E. C. LEONARD.

JOBSTOWN, Aug. 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I like your course on the Comstock laws. I don't see how so intelligent a man as B. F. Underwood can be in opposition to you on that issue. The people are too anxious for Federal authority in every department. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction except where it is expressly delegated, and all powers not delegated are reserved to the States, or the people, who are the States. The people will wake up some time and find that instead of a Federal government they will have a despotism, with all of their reserved rights gone, by their own wilfulness or ignorance in not drawing a strict line between the Federal and State governments. The more local the government the more just and liberal the laws, and, if they should be unjust, the easier they are to repeal.

Yours respectfully, C. WETHERILL.

CARROLL CITY, IOWA., Aug. 19, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Find inclosed stamps for thirty-five cents (I could not find a solitary quarter of paper currency in town; hence the stamps), and send me forthwith Lord Amberley's article on Jesus Christ. I am very glad you thought of publishing said article in pamphlet form, as I am one of those who cannot afford the luxury of the whole book. I do wish you could get up a debate with some conceited champion of the Church, and publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours for the freedom of the race,

JOHN WILSON.

SILVER REEF, UTAH, July 28, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I received book and papers, and am pleased with contents. I wish you good speed in your advancement of the human mind. I had not heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER till last February, and was surprised that there was such a sheet in existence; we that have been raised in the Mormon Church have but a limited chance of hearing the other side. I did not know there was any other savior than Jesus till I saw it in your paper. We have very poor schools here, when we have any at all; nothing is taught by the teachers except reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic, and "the ways of the Lord" and "to do as we are told" and ask no questions.

The people in this part of Utah, of the Mormon faith, are the most abject serfs of the nineteenth century. The Salt Lake Tribune falls far short of the mark of showing up this race of willing slaves. As I have been an eye-witness for twenty-five years, and a member of the church for fifteen years of that time, I know that they do fall far short, and I do not think that human pen can do the case justice. There are many Gentiles so-called that do not believe that it is possible that any people in this age would be guilty of such consummate, unwarrantable, murderous, thieving villiany, and claim that they are doing the will of the Lord as revealed through his prophet B. Young.

John D. Lee, in his confession, does not make it as bad as it is. I was personally acquainted with Lee for twenty years, lived in the same town a part of the time, and know of a great many circumstances that he mentioned in his book, and know them to be true so far as he went, and am satisfied that he did not utter one word of falsehood in regard to the Church and its teachings, but left out the largest portion and was very careful not to criminate himself any farther than he could help in regard to the Mountain Meadow Massacre. I think that he gave about one-fourth or fifth of the names of the participants in that bloody deed. I know of twenty-five or thirty whose names are not mentioned, and judging from the little town that I lived in at the time, I think there were at least two hundred white men and about one thousand Indians. I heard the orders, and knew when the men started, and what they were to do when they arrived. They were to kill them, that the orders was from headquarters, and that all that were able to bear arms were to go and do the will of the Lord, for they were wicked men. They said they had helped to kill old Joe Smith this way. All that a good Mormon wanted was to go; and they went out of the little town of Washington where there were fifty-five men old and young; there were ten absent on business; there were three old men too old for service, all the rest shouldered their guns and left for the massacre.

Judging from this town, and comparing the population, if there was half such a turn out there must have been at least two hundred whites. Lee says fifty-four; he mentions twelve from Washington, and I know of over thirty-six, and I think forty-two; every man, woman, and child thought it was right, and gloried in the opportunity of revenging the blood of the prophets with a very few exceptions. I may say two or three that I heard express themselves but not in indignant terms, but it might been have different, as I have been fighting Mormonism single-handed for the last seven years in this part of the country. I wish to continue and throw all the light on the minds of the ignorant and oppressed. I would like it if you would send some more of your papers, some of your best arguments, that you have on hand to distribute, and I think that I can get several new subscribers. The people want to read and I think your able arguments will do an immense good. I have distributed all that you sent me and will continue to do so as fast as they come, for if a reformation was ever needed anywhere it is needed here.

Yours in haste, A. J. KIRBY.

ALUM ROCK, PA., Aug. 18, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: We have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about six months. The first three or four months I did not read it, merely glancing over the "Events of the Week," etc. Finally I commenced "The Darwins," became very much interested, and think it is one of the best stories I have ever read. Mrs. Slenker is a very able writer; not many, in my estimation, can excel her in portraying every-day life experiences. May she live a long and happy life is the wish of one of her many admirers. Not only the Radical Romance, but all other scraps from her pen express deep thought and a highly cultivated mind.

There are but few in this neighborhood that acknowledge themselves Liberals. There are some that stand half way, but have not courage to cross the abyss of religious bigotry and confess to the world what they at heart believe to be right. We have a petition in circulation for E. H. Heywood; have quite a number of signers now, and will do all that we can toward the progress of Freethought and human happiness. May you ever succeed in all your undertakings is the prayer of one of your most devoted readers at present,

MRS. J. H. H.

CARTHAGE, Mo., May 23, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: THE TRUTH SEEKER is giving good satisfaction, and I believe a fair club can be maintained here now. I will do what I can for it. I believe there was not one of your papers taken here before I sent the club week before last. The Rev. Hammond (evangelist) has "opened up" in the neighboring city of Joplin, this county. The Liberals have published a long list of names of prominent citizens for which they will offer the Rev. H. $250 each for every one he will convert to Christianity of the number. Ain't the Infidels getting independent though? Go on, Brother Bennett, and give the Comstock trinity thunder. Yours for truth, EBER BUDLONG.

GRANT CITY, IND., Aug. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In your issue of Aug. 3d, I see I am slightly criticised by an unknown friend, who signs his name H. Brooks. He seems to take great exceptions to one particular sentence in my brief communication of July 8th, and fervently solicits the cultured lady correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER to "wake up," and enlighten the world in regard to the matter of the great element of virtue being essential to make a woman a gem of loveliness and beauty. I infer he is greatly disappointed because some lady does not come to the rescue of her abused sex, taking for her text the misconstrued meaning of a few hastily written words.

In referring to the Newby girl, Dale's victim, my friend says, "I left her to perish under the heel of our exquisitely respectable society without one cheering word of hope." I know not under what circumstances Miss Newby yielded to the ardent embraces of this arrant humbug, and furthermore my letter was written for no other purpose than to expose the deceptive and treacherous acts in the life of a man who claims to be an expounder of the oracles of eternal truth. Again Friend B. says, "Women are driven to commit suicide—that the brothels in our cities teem with victims from just such encouragement as I gave that little girl." If it would give him any consolation, I might say poor little deluded girl, "go and sin no more." Words are decidedly cheap in this "gushing" age. We get soothing counsel from the Christian minister. We get kind words from the teacher of the Sabbath-school, but it's all very cheap stuff. We want practical examples, good men and women who will live out the ennobling principles of virtue and truth. Just what that girl needs, to make her a good, true, virtuous woman, is the association of those who are good, and true, and virtuous, those who will teach her by their own judicious walks the necessity of having a grand purpose in life. With good wishes for all the great family of man, I am, as ever, an advocate of the cause of truth,

W. H. BEARD.

AN OPEN LETTER TO LIBERALS AND THINKERS.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 18, 1878.

DEAR FRIENDS: I have long been wishing that every Liberal who is in good earnest in caring for the spread of Freethought, would go to work as a committee of one, and hunt up a pious correspondent. Take some good neighbor, friend, or personal acquaintance, or get into a controversy with a stranger—just as is most desirable to you, only be sure to have the contest with somebody. Ask them to say why they believe, and to give the proofs of the existence of their God as a real personal being, and of Christ Jesus as his only begotten son, and the Bible as his revealed will to man. There are thousands all over the land who believe simply because they have so been taught, but who, if called upon for the why and wherefore, would be at their wit's end to give a reason. These numerous debates all over the country would awaken a spirit of inquiry and research that would result in a vast army being added to our ranks, for to think and inquire is to lose faith in myths, and gradually adopt truths for its own sake.

I have never been without one or two controversial correspondents of this sort since I was fourteen years old. I generally prefer preachers if I can get them, as they are better posted, on one side at least. But there is no one who will not answer as a champion of the old theology, for it has so many shapes and sides there is always one that will be open for criticism. There are few ladies or gentlemen who would not really enjoy a good-natured, pleasant, spirited contest of this kind with an opponent of the opposite sex. It will be a great means of self-improvement too. In searching authorities, in putting our own thoughts in good shape, and telling what we know, we shall all the time be growing in knowledge, and learning the great art of the best way of expressing ourselves. If the first correspondent that is selected does not prove congenial or satisfactory, do not be discouraged, but "try, try, again." We all want our beloved cause to prosper, but so few are willing to put their shoulder to the wheel. Here is a field open to all, and one wherein the feeblest can labor to good purpose. These numerous contests will open a demand for Liberal tracts, papers, and books, and we shall find that much good will result from it. I have always found the plan in my case to be full of interest as well as instructive and beneficial, and also a sure means of grace to my opponents. I hope not only one or two, but hundreds all over the land will try and see what they can do towards sowing good seed in minds that are now swamped in ignorance and superstition, and only need the light of true knowledge to bring forth good fruit. Yours not in Christ, ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

SCHROON LAKE, N. Y., Aug. 16, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As I am a Liberal and wish to do what little I can to promote the cause, I would like to get some of your tracts to distribute at a Methodist camp-meeting that they are going to have soon in our vicinity. I inclose twenty-five cents for one hundred leaflets. Please select some good ones, and if you can afford to put in some extra ones to promote the cause, I will see that they are well distributed. Please send copy of your paper, and I will try and get some subscribers for it. I take the Boston Investigator, but never saw a copy of your paper. There is a good many Liberals in this vicinity, and I think some of them would like to take it. Yours respectfully,

A. A. BAILEY.

SALINA, KAN., Aug. 18, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKERS for which I have sent you some money, are received. Every Freethinker ought to propagate THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, if it continues, ought to become the principal organ of the social renovation. Please tell me what I must do with the petition. I get few signatures, about twenty, most part among Christian people. Those who call themselves Infidels want to see Mr. Heywood's book before signing, and see if it does not contain some obscenity, as if it makes any difference to the question. Some ask me if I know the man that I am so interested about! Persecution works in favor of the persecuted. The Rev. H. W. Beecher's sermon, the indignation meeting, the Watkins Convention, are the three great events of the age. Of these I wrote to the Belgian Press. I am now at work on a poem on Death. I am happy to see here in the middle of the New World signs of progress and things accomplished for which I have fought for thirty years. I am an old man, nearly blind, still I hope to live long enough to see the beginning of the end of this religious dynasty which has caused so much bloodshed and so many tears, and which has made a multitude of people beasts and monsters.

My best wishes for the success of the Watkins Convention. Don't forget the cause of the oppressed millions, the feeders, clothers, and shelterers of the human race.

Yours truly, JOSEPH HENRY.

[The petitions for the release of Mr. Heywood should be sent to Prof. A. L. Rawson, 34 Bond street, this city.—ED. T. S.]

Beecher's Dream.

Henry Ward Beecher has lately had a dream which will, probably, cause him to again revise his opinions in regard to hell. One night great and profound sleep had overcome the great Brooklyn clergyman, and he dreamed his last days had come. At last the moment came when the spirit stood outside the tenement of clay. There came up to him a very gentlemanly man, and said: "Mr. Beecher, I have been commissioned by his majesty to conduct you into the kingdom and the royal city, where a palace has already been prepared for you."

"Who are you?" said Beecher.

"I am Dives, of whom you have doubtless heard."

"But," said Beecher, "where are you going to take me?"

"To hell, of course."

"I had come to believe there was no hell, and so preached. It was a terrible mistake," said Beecher, somewhat frightened.

"Come," said his companion, as a magnificent carriage, drawn by four of the most splendid horses Brother Beecher had ever seen, was halted near to them; "this is to take us to the depot at the border of the kingdom. We will then proceed to the imperial city by rail. A special coach has been provided for you."

They got in, and if the outside of the carriage was attractive, the inside surpassed anything on earth for luxurious appointments.

The horses pranced over a road paved with ivory. The sky was clear, and the air was balmy. The ride was exhilarating, and Brother Beecher said:

"Well, friend Dives, you are surely deceiving me; this can't be hell."

"O, yes; this is hell."

"Well, if it's hell, it's good enough for me. It's ahead of earth."

After a few hours' drive over a road along which the scenery was of the most enchanting beauty, they arrived at a railway station constructed of the purest white marble, and which was a model of architectural beauty. At the rear of it was a lovely grove of tropical trees. There was sweet music in the air, and millions of birds of the most brilliant plumage were warbling their notes in the branches of the trees.

Dives took Beecher out into the grove, and a repast such as only kings can sit down to was spread upon a table before him. The ride had whetted his appetite and he ate heartily. After the repast the rarest of wines were set out before the Brooklyn preacher, and he drank freely.

"That wine," said Dives, "is of the vintage of the year after the flood, and was manufactured by old Father Noah."

"I don't blame the old fellow for getting a little set up on such wine as that. If this is hell, it's good enough for me," said Beecher.

The train was soon ready to start. Beecher was lifted upon a litter by four slaves and carried to a special coach provided for him. The train moved out through a country that was of unsurpassed loveliness. The mountains and hills were covered with verdure from base to summit. Lordly palaces reared their turrets, and castles their battlements, above the orange and palm groves. There were no large towns, but numerous costly residences, belonging to his majesty's creditors. Formerly the land was parceled out among the people, but the celestial power made war upon his majesty, and he was obliged to raise money to carry it on.

He was shown the palace set apart for him. It was more magnificent than the residence of earthly royalty. There was a cathedral close at hand for him to preach in whenever he should desire. There were troops of servants to do his bidding, gold and silver and precious stones in abundance, downy couches, ottomans, and divans—everything, in short, to captivate the senses.

"Well, well," said Beecher, "if this is hell, it is certainly good enough for me."

For several days he enjoyed himself far beyond his expectations, and thought that he would rather be in hell than on earth or in heaven. On the fourth day, during a very pleasant interview with his satanic majesty, Beecher observed that it was very singular to him that the women were not allowed to mingle in society, as he had seen none since his arrival.

"Sir," said his majesty, "women are not allowed in this kingdom. They have a kingdom by themselves. No man is allowed to go there, and no women to come here."

"This is hell," said Beecher, and he awoke.

Tired Mothers.

A little elbow leans upon your knee,
Your tired knee that has so much to bear;
A child's dear eyes are looking lovingly
From underneath a thatch of tangled hair.
Perhaps you do not heed the velvet touch
Of warm, moist fingers, folding yours so tight;
You do not prize this blessing overmuch.
You almost are too tired to pray to-night.

But it is blessedness! A year ago
I did not see it as I do to-day—
We are so dull and thankless; and too slow
To catch the sunshine till it slips away.
And now it seems surpassing strange to me
That while I wore the badge of motherhood,
I did not kiss more oft and tenderly
The little child that brought me only good.

And if, some night when you sit down to res
You miss this elbow from your tired knee;
This restless, curling head from off your breast,
This lisping tongue that chatters constantly;
If from your own the dimpled hands had slipped
And ne'er would nestle in your palm again;
If the white feet into their grave had tripped,
I could not blame you for your heart's sad ache.

I wonder so that mothers ever fret
At little children clinging to their gown.
Or that the footprints, when the days are wet,
Are ever black enough to make them frown.
If I could find a little muddy boot,
Or cap, or jacket, on my chamber floor;
If I could kiss a rosy, restless foot,
And hear its patter in my house once more;

If I could mend a broken cart to-day,
To-morrow mend a kite to reach the sky—
There is no woman in the world would say
She was more blissfully content than I.
But ah! the dainty pillow next my own
Is never rumpled by a shining head—
My singing birdling from its nest is flown;
The little one I used to kiss is dead.

Ride in Reason's Car.

BY F. D. LACY.

"The morning light is breaking,
The darkness disappears,
The sons of earth are waking"
To shun delusive fears.
"Each breeze that sweeps the ocean
Brings tidings from afar
Of nations in commotion"
To ride in Reason's Car.

The banner is unfurling
To wave above the foe,
And light of truth is hurling
Dark vagaries below.
Oh, note the radiant glory
Of Science, far above,
Reciting the grand story
Of virtue, truth, and love.

Brave Freedom high is soaring,
Far in the realms of light,
While ignorance is roaring
In dungeon of the night.
Wake to the matchless beauty
Of Wisdom's guiding star;
Be eager to your duty,
And ride in Reason's Car.

Join with us; we are going
To view the light of day;
We all full well are knowing
It never fades away.
Pray do not stay there sighing;
Let every heart be light;
For, even though we are dying,
We wake to glories bright.

Oh, why in darkness staying,
And plodding on so slow?
Or bent in sorrow praying
To something you don't know?
Come, cast away your sorrow,
And go with us afar;
Ride with us on the morrow
In Reason's golden Car.

Pray don't let fear detain you
Of fancied fires below;
And not a moment pain you
Old vagaries to let go.
We have no dreadful terrors
Or woful hells to dare.
But cast away your errors,
And ride in Reason's Car.

Pious Pugilists.

We do not know whether the pugilists who have lately been converted and are doing a good deal of athletic exhortation at Ocean Grove derived their conception of their privileges from the fact that Jacob wrestled with an angel in order to receive a blessing. However this may be, we do not much believe in the right of reformed prize-fighters to lecture unconverted people who never fought in the ring and are probably much better than themselves. A converted thief, a converted drunkard, a converted wife-beater, and a converted pugilist had much better lead a quietly pious life than be perpetually blazoning their misdeeds before the world; not, be it observed, that we place these four types upon a level. Their respective errors are all of different complexions, and though, for the sake of convenience, we mention them together, we do not necessarily classify them together. A wife-beater who is not a thief is more despicable than the lowest thief who is not a wife-beater, and both the drunkard and prize fighter may possess virtues which if developed might raise them a moral head and shoulders above the man who is higher than the average. But is there not an inherent indelicacy in a man who has spent his life, first in training for the ring, and next in mauling and being mauled for the sake of winning a certain amount of money—is there not, we ask, an inherent indelicacy in such a man's presuming to come before an audience of intelligent, decent, and respectable men and women, and complacently informing them what his fresh-found Savior has done for his soul? Let him rest awhile and see how long he can endure that Savior; how soon he grows tired of him; whether his new promises fulfill themselves; and whether his soul wearies until he returns to his wallowing in the mire. Rest assured that, as a rule, few but religious fanatics and the most ignorant of ignorant people wish to hear the words of salvation from the lips of an ex-drunkard, an ex-wife-beater, an ex pugilist, or an ex-thief.—Telegram.

B. F. Underwood's Reply to Clark Braden.

Editor of the Monitor: My friend Mr. Groom has sent me a copy of the Monitor of July 26th, containing a letter from Mr. Clark Braden which is full of misstatements and misrepresentations. I will thank you for space in which to reply.

Twice I have been to Meaford, and each time indicated my readiness to meet there in public oral debate any clergyman who should be put forward as a representative of the Christian faith, the time and conditions to be such as could be mutually agreed upon. Some months ago Mr. Braden visited the place, and seeing that the Liberals were few in numbers, and not well able to bear the expense of a long debate, and knowing too that there is a demand for lectures by me every evening I can speak, induced some of the citizens of Meaford to propose that I should engage in a discussion with him in that town, to last three weeks. To this proposition I declined to accede, and gave my reasons for so doing. I stated among other reasons, that it would be unjust to enter into an arrangement, subjecting the few Liberals in Meaford to the heavy expense of a three weeks' debate, that a debate there to last one week would tax them quite enough, that if they should feel unable to meet the expense for that time, I would make my services to them gratuitous. I also mentioned that Meaford was a small place without daily papers, and as the debate would consequently be limited to the comparatively few in attendance, a debate extending through a week, I thought under the circumstances long enough.

At the same time, I stated that when Mr. Braden should be prepared to meet me in some city, to have the debate published, he bearing one half the expense of hall, of reporting and printing, I would agree to a debate to last as long as he should wish to continue it. But I deem it proper to say, now that Mr. Braden of late has descended so low, and so maifestly forfeited all claim to be regarded as a gentleman or a man of ordinary truthfulness, I should hesitate to debate with him, with the understanding the debate was to be published. I should first want strong indorsement by his brethren as to his standing in his denomination.

Whether I am justified under the circumstances in declining to engage in a debate at Meaford, such as Braden and his friends ask for, I will leave for all fair-minded persons, without regard to their belief, to decide for themselves. To my mind it is utterly unreasonable for one side, even though it included the whole population of Meaford, to name conditions of a debate and demand the other side's compliance therewith. In all discussions, both parties have equal rights, to be regarded in making the arrangements and during the discussion. Mr. Braden and his friends could as consistently and justly require me to debate three months as three weeks. It looks pretty much as though they had fixed on conditions with the express view of preventing rather than encouraging a debate.

As to propositions for debate every disputant has a right to frame those which he is to affirm. The propositions submitted by me cover all the issues between Christianity and Scientific Materialism. If it can be shown they do not, I am ready to modify them.

I wish now to point out a few of Mr. Braden's misstatements, more to indicate the untruthfulness of the man, than for any other reason, since they refer to matters of but little if any interest to the people of Meaford. He mentions as places at which we have met in debate, Duquin, Time, Bushnell, Dubuque, Washington, Jacksonville, and Toledo, and says "I was selected to meet him (Underwood) before I knew a debate was contemplated in all these places, except Meaford." How he could have been selected to meet me "before a debate was contemplated" I do not understand, but in some of the places he was never selected to meet me at all. To mention but one place, he was not selected to meet me at Dubuque, and because he went there uninvited, his own denomination gave him no countenance or support. Elder Sweeney of the Christian Church of that city told me he had no confidence in him as a man. Although the debate was advertised for several evenings, Braden was so discouraged by the attitude of his brethren on the second evening he withdrew from the discussion, and came to me for money with which to get home. Mr. Braden says: "His (Underwood's) assertion that our long debates were failures is unfortunate." In disproof of this statement, he refers to Time, Florence, Toledo, and Washington, where he says, "we had crowded houses" while "Denver gave us our smallest hearing." Why did Mr. Braden omit to state that at Time the debate lasted less than a week, at Florence two (or three) evenings only, at Toledo, less than a week, at Washington, three days only, while at Denver it extended through two weeks. He should have stated also, that at Denver, in spite of exceedingly bad weather, and an admission fee (which was not charged at the other places named), the audiences the first week were quite large, but that the interest and attendance thereafter diminished until the debate closed.

In my wide experience as a debater, extending through ten years, I have not met more than one or two opponents who could not contribute to sustain the interest and to keep the audiences in a joint debate better than Clark Braden. I say this in no unkindness. It is the simple truth.

Mr. Braden says he has published no boasts of victories. No, but his style is to go to small places like Meaford, where lectures are not reported, and not only to boast of victories over his opponents, but, at least in my case, to make disparaging statements that have no foundation in fact. This I can prove. A word in regard to a personal matter to which he refers. He once, after a debate in which I gave him a deserved castigation, went to a distant town and slandered me. I will not stop to give particulars, but the evidence is abundant, and my authority for this charge is Mr. E. F. Binns, of Time, Ill., a prominent citizen, an officer of the town, a gentleman in whom the public has entire confidence, and a member and officer of the Disciple church at Time. I have Mr. Binn's statement, and can produce it, that Mr. Braden made statements in regard to me, which are outrageously untrue. To get out of the difficulty, he has since made several other false statements. The committee he refers to made no such decision as Mr. Braden represents; and further, the committee never had in its possession the evidence of his guilt, I mean the unquestionable evidence, for it could not then be obtained, owing to the fact that a certain gentleman, wishing to save Mr. Braden from disgrace, declined or deferred giving it. With this evidence in the hands of the committee, some members of which saw it afterwards, Braden, I am credibly informed, would have been pronounced a slanderer.

And this matter leads me to say that unfortunately for himself, Mr. Braden is a very quarrelsome man. He has difficulty with his brethren wherever he stops long enough for his "pure cussedness" to exhibit itself, as for instance at Perry and Abingdon, Ill., his last two places. When Abingdon College was run down and disgraced by the scandalous conduct of its officers, he obtained the presidency of that "one-hoss" institution; but he could not keep it. While his denomination is strong and has numerous churches in the West, he is unable, with all his professed ability, to get a position as a preacher, and so he wanders about the country announcing himself as an 'ex-president,' going to places frequently uninvited, taking five dollars, or even three dollars a night, or a collection when he can get no more; at the same time sending out his circulars, in which he appears as "ex-president" "author," and the great "debater," red-hot for a fight with Infidelity, and where he is unknown and can take advantage of an interest awakened by a Freethought lecturer, asking a handsome sum for his services. With nothing in particular to do, and avaricious in a small way, it is not strange he wants a three weeks' engagement at Meaford. It would give him quite a lift, but a three weeks' debate there he cannot have by my aid, even though in his usually felicitous style, he writes about my backing out and being afraid to meet him in debate. "Does anyone suppose," he says, "that if some other person than his intended opponent had been selected, Meaford would have been too small?' (!!) It requires a good deal of vanity and conceit for a man to refer to himself in that style. The truth is, Clark Braden, as an oral debater, is neither skillful nor impressive, and I have met several men in and outside of his denomination who are vastly his superiors as effective debaters. He has no originality whatever, and only repeats parrot-like what he gets from Prof. J. B. Walker, Dr. McCosh, Principal Dawson, and some other recognized leaders in the Christian world. I am familiar with all his sources of information, and once had a public discussion with one of his teachers and guides—the first gentleman named above. Mr. Braden knows perfectly well that I have always been ready to meet him in debate on fair and reasonable terms, and his brethren know it. During the Jacksonville debate leading men of the Christian denomination who were present told me that Braden had made himself ridiculous by representing that I was afraid to meet him, and I was asked to overlook his vanity and weakness by his own brother preachers. I can give names if necessary.

The course Mr. Braden has pursued the past four or five years would disgrace, beyond recovery, any Freethought advocate. I do not like to deal in personal matters, as I have in this letter, but Mr. Braden's disingenuousness and dishonorable conduct have compelled me to do this, or not to notice him at all. I make no reply to his outrageously untrue and slanderous statement respecting myself in the debate at Denver and the character of our audiences there. His reason for making that statement I know very well, but its falsity has already been shown by letters and articles published in your journal. This is simply a specimen of the misrepresentations of Mr. Braden concerning myself, which I have had to meet the past four or five years. Respectfully,

By HUDSON TUTTLE,

AUTHOR OF

"Arcana of Nature," "Antiquity of Man," "Career of the God-Idea in History," "Career of Religious Ideas," "Arcana of Spiritualism," etc., etc.

THE FOLLOWING LIST COMPRISES SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL SUBJECTS TREATED:

The Individual; the Genesis and Evolution of Spirit; The Laws of Moral Government; Analysis of Mind in reference to Ethics; The Appetite; The Propensities; Love; Wisdom; Consideration of Rights of the Individual, of Society; Consideration of Duties and Obligations; Duties of the Individual; To God; Of Self-Culture; Duties of Society; Marriage, its Foundation and Responsibility.

The "Ethics of Spiritualism," while running in the columns of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, was widely noticed and commended by the public and the press. From the various published notices we quote a few as follows:

"Contains matter of much interest to Liberal minds."—Pequabuck Valley Gazette.

"Hudson Tuttle's Ethics of Spiritualism, now being published in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, is alone worth the subscription price to that journal. When Hudson Tuttle writes he says something."—Spiritual Scientist.

. . "We congratulate our brother of Chicago on his securing these valuable contributions. No one is better qualified to treat the subject intuitively and philosophically." . . .—Banner of Light.

. . "Such a work has long been needed, and never more so than at this time. . . . To me the crowning glory of Spiritualism is its ethical system, its pure and perfect code of morals. . . . I am profoundly grateful to Mr. Tuttle that he has undertaken the work. . . . —Wm. E. Coleman.

. . "This subject should have been thoroughly treated before now by some of our ablest minds, but it may be for the best that it has been comparatively neglected, and the duty left to him of presenting it in his unequaled way. . . . —Eugene Crowell, M.D., author of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism.

"I have just read your announcement concerning the series of articles you will soon begin to publish from the ever-active and thoroughly honest pen of Brother Hudson Tuttle. He is a farmer, and knows how to plow and sow and reap; a grape-grower, and can discriminate between good and bad fruit. He writes from the fulness of the spirit, and therefore he constantly rises above the clouds of materialism. He is no sophist, no hair-splitting apologist for the loose practices of mankind, and so you may look for the highest and most philosophical statement of the morality from his faithful pen; and the comfort is great when one reflects and knows to a certainty that Hudson Tuttle is no hypocrite, and hence is always personally as good as his written word."—Andrew Jackson Davis.

. . "The questions he proposes to answer are important and concern us all, and no writer is better qualified to enlighten the world on these topics. I congratulate you on being able to secure the services of this inspired philosopher." . . . —Warren Sumner Barlow, author of The Voices.

The author has steadily aimed to bring his work within the smallest possible compass, and has most admirably succeeded. Though the subjects treated are of the highest importance, Mr. Tuttle has restrained every disposition to dilate upon them, and has thus condensed the book into one hundred and sixty pages. The book is well printed on heavy paper, and altogether is a work that every Spiritualist and Liberalist should own.

BY ANNIE BESANT.

A Scientific and Medical Work every way superior to any similar. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. Adapted to the wants of the married, and to the consideration of all mature persons, as it points out the only feasible escape from the evils of celibacy or overburdened parentage. This is the work for which the eloquent author is now suffering persecution in England. It is not the "Fruits of Philosophy," but is more modern and and every way better.

A GOOD PLAN.

The best and most popular plan for operating stocks is that of combining capital of various sums, or pooling the orders of thousands of customers and operating them as one mighty whole in which shares are issued, which has been made so successful by the firm of Messrs. LAWRENCE & CO., Bankers, 55 Exchange-place, N. Y., the profits of which are divided pro rata among the shareholders at the expiration of thirty days from date of certificate. By this excellent plan each investor is placed on an equal footing with the largest operator. For example, within a month you made $2,000 upon an investment of $100, upon $25 the profit would be $500. An investment of $10 would pay $50, making 5 per cent. during the month. An investment of $100 would pay $1,000 profit, making 10 per cent.; an investment of $500 would pay $2,500 profit, making 5 per cent.; and so on, according to the market. The firm's circular explains everything. The editor of the Brooklyn Journal says: "The very satisfactory results made in these combinations by friends led us to order 20 shares, and at the final result we made a clear profit of $101.25 after deducting all commissions and our original investment. The firm is in every respect worthy of the utmost confidence. Send for their explanatory circular." Mr. H. F. Giddings has kindly tendered the firm his experience over his signature, as in no event would they use any of their customers' names without such authority:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1878.

LAWRENCE & CO., 55 Exchange Place. Dear Sirs:—Your favor containing your check for $1,376.63 at hand for which I thank you, as it is in excess of what I expected. As to your request for an expression in writing from me, I can cheerfully say that the above result is very satisfactory, and I believe I can safely recommend your combined system to everybody. And further, more, I would say that I first saw your advertisement in a N. Y. paper, and sent for one of your circulars, on receipt of which, as you know, I remitted you $300 for 300 shares in Class C in one of your combinations, and by return mail received your certificate for the same, and during the month received five notices of purchases and sales of different stocks, in all amounting to 4¼ per cent., or $1,275 profit on my 300 shares, after deducting your commissions of $198.37, leaving me a net profit of $1,076.63 over and above my investment of $300. Yours truly,

H. F. GIDDINGS,
837 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

An article in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, under date of June 29, 1878, says: "The reports of fabulous profits realized to numerous parties by this plan led us to investigate the matter closely. The system is based on safe business principles, and is the only method by which large operators attain their greatest success. The pools in which their customers are interested are placed on an equality in every respect with the leaders of the street. As the firm's whole interest lies in their commissions, they naturally wish to make their operations aggregate as large as possible. We believe the method of Lawrence & Co. to be the most safe and successful of any that can be found. New combinations and pools are formed every day or two. The firm will send their comprehensive circular, giving full details, to any applicant. One of their old customers, who held a few shares in one of these combinations, after receiving check for his profits, writes: 'Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, N. Y.: Your remittance for my profits, $393.75 is received. I again most heartily thank you, &c. Numerous testimonials are contained in their circular." New York Illustrated Times says: "A safe method of dealing in stocks.—The great desideratum has always been to discover some method by which a party, operating on limited capital, can stand an equal chance with men like Gould, Vanderbilt or Keene. A plan has lately been adopted by the banking house of Messrs. Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, that seems to fill the bill completely. The reports of numerous parties who have made large sums of money by this plan, has led us to investigate the matter, and we find the rumors are based on facts. They are also large dealers in all kinds of bonds.

Their circular is truthful and instructive," send for it.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Gems of Thought.

STUDY all things of nature in your daily walk of life.—Anon.

A MAN displeased with the world is never satisfied with himself.

LET us search ourselves in the first place, and afterwards the world.

THE wise and prudent conquer difficulties by daring to attempt them.

BE severe to yourself, indulgent to others, and thus avoid resentment.

THE human heart is like heaven—the more angels the more room.—Frederika Bremer.

I AM a man, and nothing that concerns human beings is indifferent to me.—Terence.

YOU may gather a rich harvest by reading, but thought is the winnowing machine.—Anon.

BENEVOLENCE is the light and joy of a good mind; it is better to give than to receive.—Anon.

THERE is no higher duty than to work for the good of the whole world.—King Asoka, Buddhist.

WHEN we die we shall find we have not lost our dreams; we have only lost our sleep.—J. P. Richter.

SMALL service is true service while it lasts. Of friends, however humble, scorn not one.—Wordsworth.

DEFERENCE is the most complete, the most indirect, and the most elegant of all compliments.—Shenstone.

IF one strives to treat others as he would be treated by them, he will not fail to come near the perfect life.—Mencius.

LIFE is a casket, not precious in itself, but valuable in proportion to what fortune or industry or virtue has placed within.—Anon.

THE narrow-minded ask: "Is this one of our tribe, or is he a stranger?" But to those who are of a noble disposition the whole world is but one family.—Hitopadessa, Hindu.

THERE is nothing by which I have through life more profited than by the just observations, the good opinion, and the sincere and gentle encouragement of amiable and sensible women. Romily.

DOCTRINES revolting to the heart are not made to endure, however mixed up they may be with lessons the most divine. Their fruits contain the seeds of their dissolution. —Leigh Hunt.

NOT by lamentations and mournful chants ought we to celebrate the funeral of a good man, but by hymns; for in ceasing to be numbered with mortals he enters upon the heritage of a diviner life.—Plutarch.

THE love of glory, the fear of shame, the design of making a fortune, the desire of rendering life easy and agreeable, and the humor of pulling down other people are often the causes of that valor so celebrated among men.—Rochefoucauld.

THE soul may be compared to a field of battle, where the armies are ready at every moment to encounter. Not a single vice but has a more powerful opponent, and not one virtue but may be overborne by a combination of vices.—Goldsmith.

THE good man loves all men. He loves to speak of the good of others. All within the four seas are his brothers. Love of man is chief of all the virtues. The mean man sows that himself may reap; but the love of the perfect man is universal.—Confucius.

THE true end, scope, or office of knowledge I have set down to consist, not in any plausible, delectable, reverend, or admired discourse, or in any satisfactory argument, but in effecting and working, and in discovery of particulars not revealed before, for the better endowment and help of man's life.—Bacon.

OUR earliest teachings must be things and not words. The objects first presented to the tender mind must be such as address the senses, and such as they can grasp. Store it first abundantly with the material of thought, and the process of thinking will be spontaneous and easy.—F. A. P. Barnard.

DO NOT be discouraged under any circumstances. Go steadily forward; rather consult your own conscience than the opinions of men, though the last are not to be disregarded. Be industrious, be frugal, be honest; deal in perfect kindness with all who come in your way, exercising a neighborly and obliging spirit in your own intercourse.—Anon.

NOTHING makes a woman more esteemed by the opposite sex than chastity, whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing besides chastity, with its collateral attendants—truth, fidelity, and constancy—give the man a property in the person he loves, and consequently endears her to him above all things.—Addison.

THE farther we go back into the past the more difficult do we find it to separate the true from the false, or facts from fables and fictions, and this is why we Infidels prefer science to theology, and care so little for Bibles, gods, or sons of gods. Only as they form a portion of the world's history do they contain gems of interest for the thinker and philosopher. As stepping-stones along the pathway of man's growth and development, showing his growth and evolution, they are of worth to the literature of the day. The age of myths and deities, of miracles and marvels, has passed away never to return. A few sincere believers in them still remain scattered here and there, but the coming years will find them still more rare, till at last the day will come when not a single one will remain of all the aforetime credulous, innumerable horde. —E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

LOST at sea: the boy who doesn't know his alphabet past B.

A LADY chemistry student, hearing a sailor spoken of as an "old salt," afterward alluded to him as a "venerable sodium chloride."

THE printed invitations to a negro ball in Tennessee bore this advice: "Leave your razors at home for fear you may fall on them."

IT is reported around that the fall petticoat has very wide seams; but, land o' love! what does a man up in the fourth story know about such things?

A MODEL wife: She never wasted a solitary thing. Let a cat die around our house, and the first thing you knew Mary Jane 'd have a muff and a set of furs, and I'd begin to find mince pies on the dinner-table.—Max Adeler.

A NEW ORLEANS lawyer was the other day defending a case against a railroad company for running over and maiming a child. He gravely told the jury that if they awarded damages the people of New Orleans would eternally be sending their children in the streets to be run over.

A MAN who, having lost heavily in business, had become morose and ill-natured, one day said to his wife: "We must sell off some of our carriages; which shall it be?" "My dear," responded the wife, "you may do as you please, so long as you only get rid of the 'sulky' and retain the 'sociable.'"

PROF. KNOWLTON, of San Francisco, spells potato "Ghoughphtheighteeau," according to the following rule: "Gh stands for p, as you'll find from the last letters in hiccough; ough stands for o, as in dough; phth stands for t, as in phthisis; eigh stands for a, as in neighbor; te stands for t, as in gazette; and eau stands for o, as in beau."

AN IDYL—SOMEWHAT TENNYSONIANISH.

"Up in the morning when the skies are red,
I smell soap on the stairway;
There's a big tub of suds by the side of the bed,
And it sounds down stairs like a fair day.
There's somebody scrubbing in the up-stairs hall,
And I see a mop through the winder.
It smells and sounds like it did last fall;
There's nobody here that can hinder."

What to him was love or hope?
What to him was joy or care?
He stepped on a plug of Irish soap
The girl had left on the topmost stair,
And his feet flew out like wild, fierce things,
And he struck each stair with a sound like a drum;
And the girl below with the scrubbing-things
Laughed like a fiend to see him come.

For what is life when the heart is dead,
And a man is thumping adown the stair,
Now on his back and now on his head,
To land on the legs of an upturned chair?
To clutch with a fierce, unhelping grasp
At the slipping banisters flying by?
To drop, at the end, with a strangling splash,
In a washtub full of suds and lye?

Better, a thousand times and more,
That a man should sleep his whole life through,
And startle the day with a mighty snore,
And scorn the sparkle of morning dew!
Why should he rise from his deep-breathed sleep,
With his outstretched hands to feel and grope;
To flounder and flop and crawl and creep
Through the treacherous swirls of the slimy soap? —Burlington Hawkeye.

BIJA AND THE HEATHEN.—The old man was oiling the hinges of the stove door, and carelessly singing one of Beethoven's best, when a middle-aged woman entered the station and began:

"Mr. Joy are you a good man?"

"Wall, tolerable—tolerable," he replied, "I never dropped a bad nickel into the street-car box, and I don't go fishing on Sunday."

"Mr. Joy, I am canvassing for money to buy Bibles, and so forth, for the African heathen," she continued as she exhibited a pass-book.

"Are, eh! Does he seem to want a Bible?"

"He does. He sits on the sands of his native shore and looks longingly this way."

"Does eh! Sitting right there this morning I 'spose?"

"He is. How much will you subscribe, Mr. Joy?"

"Madam, I've got to lift a mortgage before noon to-day, and—"

"You will certainly give something," she interrupted.

"And I've got to meet fire and life insurance, pew rent, gas and—"

"Put down what your noble heart dictates," she said, as she handed him the book.

He reflected for a moment and then asked:

"Will five dollars convert a heathen—a great big two-fisted heathen with a stiff knee?"

"I—I think so."

He figured with a pencil on the bottom of a chair, and said:

"Five dollars into two hundred pounds of heathen is forty pounds for a dollar. That is, less see—um—ten pounds for twenty-five cents and none to carry. Divide the dividend by the divisor, cut off the cube root, carry nothing, and, madam you take this quarter and convert ten pounds of heathen for me. That's all I can spare—no use talking—ten pounds—here comes his honor."

She went away puzzled and amused at his figures, and Bija looked after her and mused:

"I ought to have taken a mortgage on my share of that heathen, but I'm just that careless in business affairs."—Detroit Free Press.

TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 36. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, September 7, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Memphis Appeal notes the fact that although Chinamen reside and do business as laundry-men in the infected districts, not a single one of them has yet taken the yellow fever.

THE pastor of the colored Presbyterian church at Jacksonville, Fla., held views concerning the trinity which were not of the right shade. So his brethren deposed him for heresy.

THE growth of the nails on the left hand requires eighty-two days more than those of the right, is more rapid in children than adults, and goes on faster in summer than in winter. It requires 132 days for the renewal of the nails in cold weather, and but 116 when the weather is warm.

THE three Fox sisters, who originated the rapping phase of Spiritualism twenty-nine years ago, are all alive. Margaret, the youngest, who was the wife of Dr. Kane, is giving exhibitions in England. Kate is living in France, having married a titled Frenchman. Leah is Mrs. Underhill, and a resident of this city.

THE Rev. Alvah Wiswall makes no better showing than the average of mortals in the Bankruptcy Court. His liabilities are $44,000, and his assets Nichts. The reverend gentleman appears to have been lending to the Lord other persons' money than his own. In bankruptcy, as well as in other instances, the difference between saints and sinners is not very marked.

THE dissatisfied members of Vosburgh's church evidently don't feel like imitating the Plymouth brethren, who seem rather to glory in the fact that their pastor is a monstrous curiosity, and draws crowds for that reason. Vosburgh is, however, in a better situation than Beecher, as far as his court record is concerned. Vosburgh was acquitted by a jury; Beecher was not.—N. Y. Sun.

A COUPLE of Pennsylvania ladies were recently holding converse as to the merits of their preacher. One of them said she objected to him on account of the many big words he used in his sermons. "Oh," said the other, "I don't think he uses very big words. What kind of words do you complain of?" "Why he uses such words as 'metaphysical' and such kind of hard words." "Why, I think metaphysical is a real nice word. I like it, and it is very proper. The Gospel is both meat and physic to me."

THE Church Missionary Society of England asks this year for $1,050,000, which is about $30,000 more than it has had in any previous year. Its work is on an immense scale, and constantly increasing. The expense of saving souls and bringing them to Jesus seems to be increasing notwithstanding the hard times. It is to be wondered at that as it is of such vital importance that souls are brought to a knowledge of the efficacy of his blood he does not devise a more economical process to bring about the grand result.

PASTOR VOSBURGH doesn't know what to do. Since he received that hint to resign, he has been in no ordinary quandary. Some of his parishioners threaten to organize a new church if he is ousted. The pastor himself is reported to have justifi d his remaining pastor, in that he drew a larger crowd than any one else in Bergen. "But," was the answer, "we want some one who will draw because he is a minister, and not because he has risen into notoriety on a charge of wife-poisoning. —Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

WIDOW VAN COTT, the revival preacher, was interviewed recently by a reporter for the Times, of Oakland, Cal. Speaking of the rewards of her labor, she said: "I visit a church by invitation of the minister and official board. When invited, they ask, 'What are your terms?' and my invariable reply is, 'A hearty co-operation of the church and the salvation of immortal souls.' After I have accomplished my work, on the last Saturday, without a word being said to me, the minister obtains, on his own responsibility, a testimonial for me. That testimonial will vary. If it is a large and wealthy church, it will average about $75 a week; but if it is a small and poor one, it will be from $100 to $125 a week." Widow Van Cott is more frank than some other revival preachers are in explaining how she receives her pay, and it must be admitted that from $75 to $125 a week is pretty fair wages. At that rate the eloquent widow ought to be able to lay up a snug sum against old age.—N. Y. Sun.

TWO "JERKED TO JESUS."—Two negroes, Ben Hadley and Diamond Powell, who murdered August Reinicke last December, were hanged at Longview, Texas, on Aug. 30th. Both professed religion on the scaffold. They were dressed in coarse straw hats, white shirts, and black pants. Their arms were pinioned, and they stood upon their coffins, each smoking a cigar, when their photographs were taken. Both of them calmly mounted the scaffold, and at 1:45 the drop fell. Hadley's neck was broken, and he died in eleven minutes. Powell died of strangulation in 12:05. One thousand persons were present.

THE preachers are back again—some from Europe, some from camp-meeting, some from more worldly watering places, and some from lonely, pine girt lakes and mountain brooks, where, listening to the music of the clicking reel, they have forgotten for a few delicious weeks that weary fishing for men, to be resumed with the first fall days. Most of them are browner than when they went away, walk up the pulpit steps with a more elastic step, and give out hymn and text in tones that are the best possible certificates to the quality of the air with which they have been filling their lungs during the vacation.

THERE are thousands of young men who are to cast their first vote this fall. They have been looking forward impatiently to the time. Now it has come. Why should these new citizens, any of them, make haste to thrust their necks into the collar of a party? Let them remember, as they go for the first time to the polls, that the ballot is not only a possession but a trust. As it is used or misused, the country will thrive or decay. There will always be enough to vote as the party bids them, with no more intelligent consideration and choice than the sheep displays when it jumps over the rail because it sees the sheep ahead of it jump. But we must hope better things of our young men.—Sun.

THAT the electricity of the atmosphere is as necessary to vegetation as sunlight, air, and water has been established by experiments made by M. Grandeau, Professor of the French Ecole Forestiere. In April, 1877, he took two tobacco plants, each weighing three and one-half grammes and having four leaves. They were both planted in boxes containing mold of identical quality, and placed side by side in a position favorable to their growth. But one of them had placed over it a cage, consisting of four rods one metre fifty centimetres high, joined at the top and covered with wire gauze, which permitted the free circulation of air, light, and water, but completely protected the plant from the action of atmospheric electricity. They were left uninterfered with until the middle of August, when the results obtained were as follows: The plant in the open air had attained a height of 3 feet 5 inches, while the other was only 2 feet 4 inches; the former weighed 273 grammes and the latter one hundred and forty grammes; when dried their respective weights were 30 grammes and 15½ grammes. Similar experiments made with maize and wheat gave analogous results.

HENRY WARD BEECHER DENOUNCED BY THE WORKINGMEN OF CALIFORNIA.—On Friday night the Central Committee of the Workingmen's party of Oakland and Alameda held a meeting, and by a unanimous vote decided to hold an "anti-Beecher meeting" in front of Dietz's Opera House that evening, the object being to denounce Beecher before the very hall in which he was lecturing. The crowd, which was very large, was addressed by Dr. C. C. O'Donnell, who assailed the preacher as a man of doubtful reputation, who had stolen the livery of God to serve the devil in, and who libelled humanity for $1,000 per night, Judas-like betraying his saintly office. He comes to this coast the emissary of capital; is one of the few pretended Christian ministers of America, who, by his acts, has cast reproach upon our sacred religion and made the pulpit a by-word. After describing Mr. Beecher as "a classical libertine," and continuing his remarks some time longer in the same strain, Dr. O'Donnell read the following resolutions, which were adopted: Resolved, That H. W. Beecher presents in his person and in his advent to California an illustration of the truth of the prophecy that Satan has his emissaries upon the earth. Resolved, That we, as working and suffering men, recognize the fact that in the peculiar parish where Beecher's ministrations have been so long uttered, squalor and misery abound, Mammon is God, and libertinism is rampant.—San Francisco Call.

FREETHOUGHT PAPERS.—Newspapers which are published in the interests of Freethought are much condemned by the orthodox and conventional. This is inevitably the case. Men who have held on to certain opinions for many years, and who are backed by generations that thought precisely as they do, are not to be induced to change their minds at a moment's notice. Yet the Freethought papers, with all the mistakes they make, and all the extravagances they father, do much good. They are like the angel that stirred the pool of Bethesda, in which invalids bathed and were healed. If the world is to progress the conservatives must be shaken up from time to time, and they are to be shaken up only by the ultras and the radicals. Half-way people are not energetic and demonstrative enough to lead reforms. These must be intrusted to the nervous pioneers, whose faith in themselves and their creed amounts to fanaticism. The conservatives are, of course, now and then shocked. Their natures are shaken to the core. They kick against the newcomers who thus tear their cherished convictions to atoms. They rebel again and again, but some of the seed dropped by the radicals falls in ground ready to receive it and brings forth infinitely forever.—Telegram.

YELLOW FEVER.—Messages describing yellow fever's terrible ravages continue to come streaming over the wires from the plague-stricken South. New cases by the hundred are reported from New Orleans, Memphis, and Vicksburg, and the death rate has increased alarmingly within the past few days. There are heart-touching tales of lack of help to minister to the living and to bury the dead. The almost deserted sick suffer even for cold water, and many must of necessity die because it is impossible to give them that unremitting care necessary to save life. It is unfortunate that the North cannot send nurses and physicians. Hundreds stand ready to go, but it is the uniform reply from the stricken cities that unacclimated persons journeying there are almost sure to be immediately prostrated, and that it is not advisable for such to go. Yet the North can contribute of her money, and is doing so. There is no longer any doubt that the present epidemic of yellow fever is the most severe ever experienced. It is also a very malignant type. In New Orleans it extends over a region twelve miles in length, from Carrollton to the United States Barracks, and strikes the quarters of the city inhabited by the rich, as well as the squalid settlements of negroes, among whom the mortality is sixty per cent.

DISCONTENT.

Two boats rocked on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree;
One was in love with the harbor;
One was in love with the sea.

The one that loved the harbor
The winds of fate outbore;
But held the other, longing,
Forever against the shore.

The one that rests on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree,
With wistful eyes looks ever
To the one far out at sea.

The one that rides the billow,
Though sailing fair and fleet,
Looks back to the peaceful river—
To the harbor safe and sweet.

One frets against the quiet
Of the moss-grown shaded shore;
One sighs that it may enter
That harbor nevermore.

One wearies of the dangers
Of the tempest's rage and wail;
One dreams, amid the lilies,
Of a far-off snowy sail.

Of all that life can teach us,
There's naught so true as this:
The winds of fate blow ever,
But ever blow amiss.

Thousands of dollars are being subscribed and forwarded to assist the sufferers, and physicians and nurses from Northern hospitals are volunteering their services.

CHAPTER XII.—CONTINUED.

All this and much more he wrote, but here is enough to show that the old man was a true believer in the doctrines he preached; that he was honest and sincere and really suffered all the horror and anguish he would have felt had he actually passed through earthly terrors such as his imagination pictured for his child's future. There are many true believers who make religion as much a reality to their minds as is their daily actual life. And to such it is awful to think of what will be the fate of those who reject and disbelieve.

If all the agony that has been endured by true believers, from the fear that they might not have done the will of their God, and may be doomed to an eternal, everlasting hell, could be realized by the world, it would look upon the Christian religion as a more horrid pestilence than the cholera or the black death.

We will not trouble our readers by repeating all the arguments that were brought up by Edith, and attempted to be refuted by her father. Suffice it to say the old ground that has so often been gone over by Christian and Infidel debates was all traversed and thoroughly discussed. As Mr. Martin's sister slowly passed day by day from life to death, and on the very evening she died, Mr. Martin received this last, final, closing letter from Jennie.

"DEAR, DEAR FATHER: There are many things in your last epistle that led me to hope you were becoming resigned to what is inevitable. If I have failed to convince you that all religions are myths, I have at least shown you conclusively that there is not, and cannot be, a literal burning hell, or a real place of torment. That horror removed from your mind, I feel as if we could find rest, peace, and happiness together, even if we do not believe alike. Now I am going to answer a few points in your last, and remember I talk not as a child to a parent, but as a debater to an opponent. I mean no personal disrespect, for I love and honor you more than I did when I believed just as you do, for I see now the great, vast, deep fountain of my father's love for his child, as I never realized it in the old days. But I wish to give you my reasons for what I think, and to show you how impossible it is that I can ever change back again.

In the first place you say, 'It will not do to be constantly objecting to everything if we would find truth. We should see both sides if acceptance or rejection be fraught with danger.'

"But father, it is only by 'objecting' to the unreasonable and improbable, and by ceasing to be credulous and gullable, that real truth is ever sifted out from romance, error, legend, fable, and myth. How did Protestants ever come out from Catholics but by 'objecting.' How does any science ever perfect itself but by 'objecting' to and eliminating from itself all that is erroneous and unscientific? How was paganism and the mythology of the Greeks and Romans supplanted by Christian mythology but by 'objecting' to their glaring mistakes and false historical accounts?

"How can you hold to your peculiar belief but by objecting to that of every other sect, as well as to the philosophy of Atheism itself? How can any one believe as he does but by objecting to all that conflicts with his own ideas? It is time this negation and objection business was thrown overboard. We Infidels do not 'object' or 'negate' one iota more than you do. I defy you to prove that I make one more 'objection' to your belief than you do to mine. And as to seeing 'both sides,' who is more ready to do this than Infidels? Who is it that objects to giving 'both sides' a hearing in pulpit and press? Who is it that makes laws to bind Infidels in bonds lest 'both sides' have a fair show? Who is it that compels Infidels to pay for the making of pious laws and the support of pious law-makers? Who confine, imprison, blackmail, and misuse, even to the death, noble, true, self-sacrificing men, such as those who have been the victims of Anthony the Sneak? Who is it that compels Infidels to pay taxes on millions of dollars' worth of church property where only 'one side' is heard and the other foully and often ignorantly misrepresented? Who is it that wants their God and Jesus in the Constitution, so as to kill, if possible, all sides but their own? We Infidels demand perfect freedom to discuss all questions—Atheistical, religious, social, political, and financial; anything that is fit to be is fit to be discussed in a proper and decent manner. But you Christians have always been enforcing gag laws on all who dared to look over your theological bars into the broad fields of reason, common sense, worldly pleasure, and earthly happiness.

"We Infidels ask for discussion; we give all inducements possible for theologians to come and talk to and with us. We ask you to show us all the flaws you can in our reasoning. If we are wrong, we ask to be put right. I assure you I have seen far more of 'both sides' than it is possible for you to have done; for I have lived on both sides. I have been all the way along from Methodism to Universalism and Deism, and then out into the glad, free expanse of enlightened, glorious, and happifying Atheism. Don't you remember, father, when I read those pious Methodist books that used to be in the library here, how like a little Methodist I became, and how that wore off in time and I grew up in your belief, and clung to it faithfully till the first real doubt came—that fateful afternoon when I heard you and Mr. Lusk debate the Cushites; then I commenced reading and evoluting slowly but surely, till at last I reached the ground whereon I now stand?

"You say, 'There is a God, for Christ reveals him.' I say, and say in all earnestness, that I wish you to prove it. I deny it entirely; so please prove that there ever was a God to have a son. Prove the Bible to be anything more than a book of fables, stories, songs, proverbs, exhortations, and unreliable history! As to your witnesses, I refuse to take them. I do not know what parts, if any, of all they are said to have written they really did write. I do not know what is forgery, interpolation, fixed up, or changed, and what is wholly spurious. I must have better proof than those five unreliable witnesses of the Bible. What court of justice is there in all this land that would take an unsigned, unwitnessed paper, and printed at that, as testimony to a miracle!

"You say, 'Epithets are not arguments.' No; nor is Bible-proof good 'testimony.' I want proof outside of divine revelation or Homer. I want plain common sense and reasonable facts. Give me only barely one proof that there is a God, and then I am prepared to go ahead on other points; just a single one is all I ask for—one proof not based upon Bible testimony, but upon scientific, demonstrated knowledge.

"You still refer me, again and again, to the New Testament for a definition of a 'true Christian.' Well I'll look at it a bit, and see what it says. 'If, thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out' (ear-mark No. 1); 'Swear not at all'—take no oaths in court (No. 2); 'Let your communication be yea and nay.' No 'Mr. Lord,' 'Excellency,' 'Sir,' nor anything but simple yes and no (No. 3); 'Resist not evil.' If knocked down, get up again and love your enemy. If thieves come, resist them not (No. 4); 'If any man [at law] take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.' Oh, how nice No. 5 is! 'If a man compel thee to go a mile, go twain;' 'From him that would borrow of thee, turn not thee away' (No. 6 and 7 say, Run wherever asked, and lend all you have. Good advice; but where is the follower?); 'Be ye perfect.' Can't do it (No. 8); 'Lay up not treasures on earth.' Try it, and see where progress and refinement and happiness will be (No. 9); 'Take no thought for the morrow.' Human life would soon be extinct were this to be done by all (No. 10); 'Every one that asketh receiveth.' Not so (No. 11); 'Let the dead bury the dead.' Try it (No. 12); Scold and blame the wind and sea, and make 'a great calm.' Impossible to follow him there (No. 13); Drive devils out of people into other men's swine and kill them. Another lovely feat is No. 14. 'Heal all manner of disease.' Can't do it (No. 15); Deliver up your brother or parent who does not believe, and cause them to be put to death. What believer does this, or could do it? (No. 16); Feed five thousand men, besides women and children, with five loaves and two fishes, and have lots left after the banquet (No. 17); Walk on the sea (No. 18); 'If I agree, . . . it shall be done.' 'Anything,' mind. Well, let two pious Christians agree to pray that a new, correct, reliable, historical Bible, right from kingdom come, may be given into their keeping. Would they get it? No. 19 is a failure worse than all that precedes it. Let them build a dam of one solid rock across our river here, through asking; then I'll say they are indeed 'true Christians.'

"A true Christian ought to do all these nineteen things, for they have the promise of being able to do 'greater things' than Christ ever did. They must be celibates, too, if they can by any possibility keep their natural passions under control. Hate your children, parents, and wife; curse fruit trees that do not bear out of season; denounce all who do not receive your doctrine (Matt. x, 15; xi, 24); do as you are done by, and not as you would be done by ('Whosoever shall deny me, him will I also deny'); make no end of false promises, as, 'This generation shall not pass away until all these things are fulfilled. . . . Whatsoever is asked for believing shall be received,' are only two of these numerous broken promises—or false ones, rather. Bless the poor and curse the rich indiscriminately, regardless of the goodness and virtue or vice and crime in them, but simply because they are financially as they are. Send all to hell who do not believe as you do. Have your enemies all killed before you—nice, isn't it! Teach that 'In Adam's fall we sinned all,' and that eating a bit of fruit 'brought death into the world and all our woe;' that otherwise all that were born would have lived on forever, happy and sinless, naked and ignorant! Believe in an endless burning hell. Touch not a sword, lest you die by a sword; and yet, if you have none, sell your garment and buy one. Can even a 'true Christian' do all these things?

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

There is yet another important circumstance to be mentioned here, which is likewise of great importance for a complete explanation of this varied geographical picture, and which throws light upon many very obscure facts, which, without its help, we should not be able to comprehend. I mean the gradual change of climate which has taken place during the long course of the organic history of the earth. As we saw in our last chapter, at the beginning of organic life on the earth a much higher and more equal temperature must have generally prevailed than at present. The differences of zones, which in our time are so very striking, did not exist at all in those times. It is probable that for many millions of years but one climate prevailed over the whole earth, which very closely resembled, or even surpassed, the hottest tropical climate of the present day. The highest north which man has yet reached was then covered with palms and other tropical plants, the fossil remains of which are still found there. The temperature of this climate at a later period gradually decreased; but still the poles remained so warm that the whole surface of the earth could be inhabited by organisms. It was only at a comparatively very recent period of the earth's history, namely, at the beginning of the tertiary period, that there occurred, as it seems, the first perceptible cooling of the earth's crust at the poles, and through this the first differentiation or separation of the different zones of temperature and climatic zones. But the slow and gradual decrease of temperature continued to extend more and more within the tertiary period, until at last, at both poles of the earth, the first permanent ice caps were formed.

I need scarcely point out in detail how very much this change of climate must have affected the geographical distribution of organisms, and the origin of numerous new species. The animal and vegetable species, which, down to the tertiary period, had found an agreeable tropical climate all over the earth, even as far as the poles, were now forced either to adapt themselves to the intruding cold, or to flee from it. Those species which adapted and accustomed themselves to the decreasing temperature became new species simply by this very acclimatization, under the influence of natural selection. The other species, which fled from the cold, had to emigrate and seek a milder climate in lower latitudes. The tracts of distribution which had hitherto existed must by this have been vastly changed.

However, during the last great period of the earth's history, during the quaternary period (or diluvial period) succeeding the tertiary one, the decrease of the heat of the earth from the poles did not by any means remain stationary. The temperature fell lower and lower, nay, even far below the present degree. Northern and Central Asia, Europe, and North America from the north pole, were covered to a great extent by a connected sheet of ice, which in our part of the earth seems to have reached the Alps. In a similar manner the cold also advancing from the south pole covered a large portion of the southern hemisphere, which is now free from it, with a rigid sheet of ice. Thus, between these vast lifeless ice continents there remained only a narrow zone to which the life of the organic world had to withdraw. This period, during which man, or at least the human ape, already existed, and which forms the first period of the so-called diluvial epoch, is now universally known as the ice or glacial period.

The ingenious Carl Schimper is the first naturalist who clearly conceived the idea of the ice period, and proved the great extent of the former glaciation of Central Europe by the help of the so-called boulders, or erratic blocks of stone, as also by the "glacier tables." Louis Agassiz, stimulated by him, and considerably supported by the independent investigations of the eminent geologist Charpentier, afterwards undertook the task of carrying out the theory of the ice period. In England, the geologist Forbes distinguished himself in this matter, and also was the first to apply it to the theory of migrations and the geographical distribution of species dependent upon migration. Agassiz, however, afterwards injured the theory by his one-sided exaggeration, inasmuch as, from his partiality to Cuvier's theory of cataclysms, he endeavored to attribute the destruction of the whole animate creation then existing to the sudden coming on of the cold of the ice period and the "revolution" connected with it.

It is unnecessary here to enter into detail as to the ice period itself, and into investigations about its limits, and I may omit this all the more reasonably since the whole of our recent geological literature is full of it. It will be found discussed is detail in the works of Cotta, Lyell, Vogt, Zittel, etc. Its great importance to us here is that it helps us to explain the most difficult chorological problems, as Darwin has correctly perceived.

For there can be no doubt that this glaciation of the present temperate zones must have exercised an exceedingly important influence on the graphical and topographical distribution of organisms, and that it must have entirely changed it. While the cold slowly advanced from the poles towards the equator, and covered land and sea with a connected sheet of ice, it must of course have driven the whole living world before it. Animals and plants had to migrate if they wished to escape being frozen. But as at that time the temperate and tropical zones were probably no less densely peopled with animals and plants than at present, there must have arisen a fearful struggle for life between the latter and the intruders coming from the poles. During this struggle, which certainly lasted many thousands of years, many species must have perished and many become modified and then transformed into new species. The hitherto existing tracts of distribution of species must have become completely changed, and the struggle have been continued, nay, indeed, must have broken out anew and been carried on in new forms, when the ice period had reached and gone beyond its furthest point, and when in the post-glacial period the temperature again increased, and organisms began to migrate back again towards the poles.

In any case this great change of climate, whether a greater or less importance be ascribed to it, is one of those occurrences in the history of the earth which have most powerfully influenced the distribution of organic forms. But more especially one important and difficult chorological circumstance is explained by it in the simplest manner, namely, the specific agreement of many of our Alpine inhabitants with some of those living in polar regions. There is a great number of remarkable animal and vegetable forms which are common to those two far distant parts of the earth, and which are found nowhere in the wide plains lying between them. Their migration from the polar lands to the Alpine heights, or vice versa, would be inconceivable under the present climatic circumstances, or could be assumed at least only in a few rare instances. But such a migration could take place, nay, was obliged to take place, during the gradual advance and retreat of the ice-sheet. As the glaciation encroached from northern Europe fowards our Alpine chains, the polar inhabitants retreating before it —gentian, saxifrage, polar foxes, and polar hares—must have peopled Germany, in fact all central Europe. When the temperature again increased, only a portion of these Arctic inhabitants returned with the retreating ice to the Arctic zones. Another portion of them climbed up the mountains of the Alpine chain instead, and there found the cold climate suited to them. The problem is thus solved in a most simple manner.

We have hitherto principally considered the theory of the migrations of organisms in so far as it explains the radiation of every animal and vegetable species from a single primæval home, from a "central point of creation," and the dispersion of these species over a greater or less portion of the earth's surface. But these migrations are also of great importance to the theory of development, because we can perceive in them a very important means for the origin of new species. When animals and plants migrate they meet in their new home, in the same way as do human emigrants, with conditions which are more or less different from those which they have inherited throughout generations, and to which they have been accustomed. The emigrants must either submit and adapt themselves to these new conditions of life or they perish. By adaptation their peculiar specific character becomes the more changed the greater the difference between the new and the old home. The new climate, the new food, but above all, new neighbors in the forms of other animals and plants, influence and tend to modify the inherited character of the immigrant species, and if it is not hardy enough to resist the influences, then sooner or later a new species must arise out of it. In most cases this transformation of an immigrant species takes place so quickly under the influence of the altered struggle for life, that even after a few generations a new species arises from it.

Migration has an especial influence in this way on all organisms with separate sexes. For in them the origin of new species by natural selection is always rendered difficult, or delayed, by the fact that the modified descendants occasionally again mix sexually with the unchanged original form, and thus by crossing return to the first form. But if such varieties have migrated, if great distances or barriers to migration—seas, mountains, etc.—have separated them from the old home, the danger of a mingling with the primary form is prevented, and the isolation of the emigrant form, which becomes a new species by adaptation, prevents its breeding with the old stock, and hence prevents its return in this way to the original form.

The importance of migration for the isolation of newly-originating species and the prevention of a speedy return to the primary form, has been especially pointed out by the philosophic traveler, Moritz Wagner, of Munich. In a special treatise on "Darwin's Theory and the Law of the Migration of Organisms," Wagner gives from his own rich experience a great number of striking examples which confirm the theory of migration set forth by Darwin in the eleventh and twelfth chapters of his book, where he especially discusses the effect of the complete isolation of emigrant organisms in the origin of new species. Wagner sets forth the simple causes which have "locally bounded the form and founded its typical difference," in the following three propositions: 1. The greater the total amount of change in the hitherto existing conditions of life which the emigrating individuals find on entering a new territory, the more intensely must the innate variability of every organism manifest itself. 2. The less this increased individual variability of organisms is disturbed in the peaceful process of reproduction by the mingling of numerous subsequent immigrants of the same species, the more frequent will nature succeed, by intensification and transmission of the new characteristics, in forming a new variety of race, that is, a commencing species. 3. The more advantageous the changes experienced by the individual organs are to the variety, the more readily will it be able to adapt itself to the surrounding conditions; and the longer the undisturbed breeding of a commencing variety of colonists in a new territory continues without its mingling with subsequent immigrants of the same species, the oftener a new species will arise out of the variety."

From the death of Marcus Aurelius the arts and sciences declined rapidly; philosophy became perverted, the Latin language corrupted, and the intellectual condition disheartening in the extreme. It was, we must here add, about this time that Christianity, although not yet established, began to be strongly felt in the Empire. However it may be explained, the fact is undeniable that the progress of this system of faith corresponded with decay of intellect, and its complete ascendency was succeeded by a night of mental and moral darkness; "From the death of Marcus Aurelius," says Lecky, "about which time Christianity assumed an important influence in the Roman world, the decadence of the Empire was rapid and almost uninterrupted" (Hist. Morals, vol. ii, p. 12).

It has been often said that Rome made herself rich by conquest and plunder. This is true; and the remark applies not only to all the great nations of antiquity, but to not a few of modern times, in which Christianity has been the popular faith. It would be unjust, however, not to admit that the policy of the pagan Empire toward the conquered provinces was generally characterized by wisdom and justice. Speaking of the reign of Hadrian and the two Antoines, Gibbon says: "By every honorable expedient they invited the friendship of the barbarians, and endeavored to convince mankind that the Roman power, raised above the temptation of conquest, was actuated only by the love of order and justice. During a long reign of forty-three years their various labors were crowned with success; and if we except a few slight hostilities that served to exercise the legions of the frontier, the reigns of Hadrian and Antonius Pius offer the fair prospect of universal peace. The Roman name was revered among the most remote nations of the earth. The fiercest barbarians submitted their differences to the arbitration of the emperor, and we are informed by a contemporary historian that he had seen embassadors who were refused the honor which they came to solicit, of being admitted into the rank of subject" (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. i, p. 22).

"If a man were called to fix the period," says the same author, "in the history of the world during which the condition of the human race was most happy and prosperous, he would without hesitation name that which elapsed from the death of Domittian . . . to the accession of Commodus" (Ibid, chap. ii, p. 73).

That there were many evils in the pagan Empire, and great wrongs and flagrant vices, does not admit of doubt, but that they have been greatly exaggerated; that in some instances vices and indulgencies, which were confined chiefly to certain classes, and which were abhorred and condemned by the better class, as they are by the same class to-day, have been represented as the general practices of the age; that isolated cases of barbarity and anomalous features of society have been fastened upon to illustrate the general character and conduct of the Romans, while the better and brighter side of life in the pagan Empire has been almost wholly concealed by Christian writers, no one, I think, will deny who has carefully studied the history of Rome and is familiar with theological literature.

What a picture of this age could be presented, if some writer, two thousand years hence, should adopt the same method in forming an estimate of the character of the people of the United States in the nineteenth century!

Having noticed the condition of the world when Christianity appeared, and during the time it was extending its peaceful conquests, and preparing to mount the throne of the Cæsars and grasp from paganism the sceptre of imperial power, it is time to inquire whether the ascendency of this religion was followed by a more brilliant genius, a purer morality and a higher civilization. If it were of divine origin, or if it were adapted to expand the mind and purify the heart, the Christians of the first few centuries had a right, looking forward, to expect and predict such grand and glorious results.

Although it had its origin in an obscure province of the Roman Empire, various causes, which it is no part of our present task to explain, contributed to the rapid progress of Christianity: "We are but of yesterday," exclaimed Tertullian, "and we fill all your cities, islands, forts, councils, even the camps themselves, the decuries, the palaces, the senate, and the forum." Its influence, as I have already remarked, in the latter part of the second century "was great and universally acknowledged." Early in the fourth century it was proclaimed the established religion of the Empire.

That the early devotees of the Christian religion were in some respects morally superior to the pagans around them, I am disposed to believe. It is not, however, necessary to suppose Christianity divine in its origin, or beneficent in its general tendency, to explain this fact. Attached to their faith with a devotion which new religions generally inspire in the hearts of their early converts, living apart, as far as possible, from the society of the pagans, believing that their forms and ceremonies, their customs, their pleasures, and even their learning were degrading in their tendency and displeasing in the sight of God, even if they lost much, they escaped many of the corrupting influences of the times; while such a life unquestionably involved a sacrifice of many of the advantages of culture and was certainly unfavorable to breadth and catholicity of thought, it drew the devotees more closely together, developed feelings of friendship and fraternity, and naturally made them watchful and careful of their conduct, lest an ungarded word or a thoughtless act should furnish the pagans with weapons against their faith. In the purity of the early Christians, although as Mosheim frankly admits, it has been greatly exaggerated—there is nothing remarkable. And they who judge Christianity simply from the moral purity of the men who first embraced it use an argument by which many a false and injurious system could be made to appear of beneficent tendency quite as plausibly as the Christian system. If we would judge inductively the worth of any system we must wait until it has been tested by being brought in contact with the corruptions and temptations of social life; for its true value consists in its power to instruct men in the right and to furnish motives to impel men to the love of truth and the practice of virtue.

As we have examined the condition of Rome under paganism, when paganism had, for hundreds of years, been the established faith, and when there had, consequently, been time for the development of all its powers and tendencies, it is but fair to glance at the Empire when it was under Christianity, when all other religions were obliged to succumb to its irresistible march, when for more than ten centuries every opportunity existed for it to demonstrate its power to improve and elevate the mind of man.

As we have seen, the gladiatorial games were the worst features of the old pagan society. Religious liberty was one of the very best. As Mr. Lecky has remarked, it was the nobler part which in the Christian Empire was first destroyed. Theodosius the Great, who suppressed all diversity of worship throughout the Empire, and who was very much under the influence of the clergy, compelled his his barbarian prisoners to fight as gladiators. These disgraceful exhibitions were kept up fully a century after the establishment of Christianity. Combats of men with wild beasts were continued till the end of the seventh century. Only when these amusements had become almost obsolete through the difficulty of obtaining wild animals, were they formally condemned by an ecclesiastical council. That the denunciation of the gladiatorial exhibitions by the Fathers assisted in creating a sentiment against them is not to be denied however.

The practice of the sale of children which was condemned and prohibited under the pagan Diocletian, although censured by the Fathers was encouraged and authorized under Constantine and continued long after the time of Theodosius, "nor does any Christian emperor appear to have enforced the humane enactment of Diocletian."

From the first, Christian writers condemned suicide, yet thousands were encouraged to undermine their constitutions and to shorten their lives by strange austerities, and we read that in the fourth century they challenged and insulted assemblies of pagans to provoke them to put Christians to death. According to St. Augustine, they assembled by thousands and destroyed themselves by leaping from overhanging cliffs upon the rocks below, believing that was a kind of martyrdom which would render certain the salvation of their souls. Notwithstanding the condemnation by the Fathers of the pagan view, that there were circumstances justifying suicide, the Church did not hesitate to canonize women who committed suicide to protect their virtue.

NATIONAL GREENBACK LABOR SONGSTER.—All who have the cause of greenbacks and honesty in politics at heart should have one of these songsters. Music is potent in arousing the dormant energies of people, and it often succeeds where other means fail. Those who would not be convinced even by the unanswerable logic of a Butler can be made by music to feel the necessity of doing something to better the condition of the workingman. We hope that thousands of them will be used in the coming campaign. Price ten cents.

WE can do more good by being good than in any other way. Let us remember this. It is not genius that we need nor intellectual mastership, nor profound learning. These we must not despise; but one indispensable need is—character.

VISIT OF COUSIN SILAS.

ZION HIL, Sept. 2, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Last week we had a vizit from my kuzzin Silas, hoo livs in the south part ov the State; he kum with hiz wife and 3 children and stade 6 days. It kept wife and I so bizzy all last week to do the viziting, riding out and gitting sumthing good to eet, that I didn't find time to write yu my regular weekly letter which I promised yu. I hope yu wil konsider the situashun and exkuse me for the omishun. I want to keep all my promises and fulfil al my kontrakts, but when so much viziting haz to be dun a du allowanse must be made.

We hav had a rite good vizit with kuzzin Silas and kuzzin Molly. We wer glad when we herd 10 days ago that tha wer kumming, but we kan sa now that when the time kum for them to go we wer not partikularly sorry. Tha ar 10 yeers yunger than wife and I, and thare children are not grone yet, and tha wer a littel the ruffest set I have seen in menny a da. It wood hav ben a good deel plezenter for us if tha had left thare children at home, but tha thawt so much about kumming to unkul Joel and ant Sally's that I suppoze that it wood neerly hav broke thare harts if tha kood not hav kum; besides kuzzin had nobody to leev the children with save hiz nabers, and he did not want to ask them to be trubbled with hiz wild boys. The yungest iz a gurl, and she tha wood hav brawt any wa; but the 2 boys did enjoy thare vizit here hujely; tha wer on the go from morning to nite, in evry room in the hous, from the garit to the seller, all over the barn, karrij-hous, the stabuls, the hen-roost, the smoke-hous, and evry place tha kood stik thare nozes into. Wun ov them slipt off the ha-mow wun da and it mite hav broke hiz nek had he not fel on a pile ov ote chaf that by good luk happened to be laying on the barn flore. He limpt around pretty bad for haf a da, but he waz soon over it, kliming, chasing, and kutting-up az bad az ever. Wun da tha went a fishing, and that waz kwite a releef for several ours, but when tha kum bak we lurnt that the oldest wun had kum neer drowning, and had not a man been neer by probably he wood never hav kum bak alive. Wife sez she wood rathur have 6 grone peepul around than thoze 2 boys. Suzan liked them and thawt tha ware kut out for smart men, but she sed tha ware to rude for anything in the wurld. She sez kuzzin Molly haz not a bit ov kontrole over thoze boys, and tha ar vary littel better than az tho tha had grone up with the injuns, and if tha wer panted with red led she thinks tha wood hav made furst-klas Modoks.

Kuzzin Silas iz a relijus man, that iz to sa, he belongs to the Presbyterian Church, and so duz hiz wife; but I hav my douts whether tha hav the relijun ov the hart, which iz the only kind suffishunt to save thare soles. It seems to be a matter ov form with them. If tha slide along smoothly throo life, and thare nabers and frends, pas muster with the church and all hoo no them, it iz about all tha kare for. Kuzzin Silas iz a good sort ov man, but I dout not he wood be just about az good if he did not belong to any church. In tauking with him about hiz relijus observansez, I found out he duz not follo saing grase before meels, nor iz hiz family prare eny thing that he attaches much importanse to. He sed when he had kumpany that were pius he askt a blessing at table and red a chapter in the Bible, morning and evening, and held family praers. He sed he and Molly did not think that praing amounted to very much eksept to keep up appearances before kompany. He sed, to, that "wun yeer we folloed praing very steddy from January to Desember, not letting a da pas without 1 or 2 prares; but that yeer we had more losses and trubbul than any other yeer since we wer marrid. I lost my best horse and the 3-year-old bul that took the first prize at our kounty fare, and a man who ode me 500 dollers for stock he had bawt ov me for 3 yeers took the bankrupt law, and I never got a sent. Yes, that yeer I prade the hardest and lost the most, and I just told Molly we wood drop the praing eksept on state okkasions and see what the effect wood be. Wel, the next yeer we had no bad luk at all. I had three nise horse kolts born to me that yeer, 4 kalvs, 21 lams, and 17 pigs, and not wun ov them dide. Evrything prospered with me, and I kollekted an old det ov fifty dollers that I had given up and ekspekted never to get. Altogether, that yeer that I didn't pra much we made 500 dollers ahed, while the yeer before, in which I prade so much, we went 1,000 dollers behind. Now, unkle Joel, I don't pretend to sa that it was praing or not praing that made all this differense, but theze ar the fakts; the yeer I didn't pra much of eny we did wel, and the yeer I prade evry da I kame neer loozing haf I waz wurth."

I must konfes, Mr. Editur, that kuzzin Silas' statement took me by surprize, and I didn't no hardly what to sa. 25 yeers I hav ben a vary strong beleever in prare. Konstantly asking the blessing at the tabel, I hav prade 5 times evry da besides our regular prare-meeting. Whenever trubbles hav borne me down, and I hav felt az tho the powers ov darkness were ganing the viktory over me, I hav gone to my God, and my Jezus, and opened my hart to them, and told them all about my trials and afflikt-shuns, and meny a time I thawt I felt the better fur it, and I thawt my kries had been hurd. It iz tru that meny times I kood not feel that I had made much impreshun on the throne of grase, and I wondered if God waz not attending to sum other urgent bizness, and waz not listning to what I had to sa. I thawt it possibul that he was awa and I kood not be expekted to hav attenshun til he returned. I hav had all sorts ov noshuns on the subjekt, and hav sumtimes douted if it really did do much good to ask God so often to do this and that for us, and to change hiz plan in this direkshun and that akkording to our rekwest.

It haz seemed kurius to me, when I hav thawt it over, how God kood be expekted to rule the wurld with eny degre ov konsistensy if he haz to lisen to all the rekwests and advise that ar kontinually being offered up to him and urged upon hiz attenshun. It haz seemed to me that he kood not hav a steddy mind nor pursu a uniform korse of kondukt if he iz under eny kind ov nesessity ov being influensed by what thouzands ov persons ar saing to him evry da, and almost evry our. But we ar enjoind by our ministers and by the Bible to pra without seasing, and I shal most likely keep it up til I am konvinsed that it iz ov no use. Tru, I kan't put my finger on a single instanse whare I remember that my prares, or eny other person's I am akkwanted with, hav prodused eny marked result, or hav chanjd the ordinary kourse ov things. Yet, altho it ma be an open kwestshun whether prare amounts to anything or not, I wil keep on praing about az I hav dun. I ges it iz safer to pra to much than to littel. If it duz God eny good to hav my opinyun ov matters and things in and about Zion Hil, he iz purfektly welkum to the same.

I must tel yu, Mr. Editur, about our vizit to the Methodist kamp meeting held within 15 miles ov my plase, in Goodrich's grove. Kuzzin Silas and wife and me and my wife took an erly start on Fridy morning for the kamp meeting, which had been in operashun a week. Suzan sed she wood sta at home and se to the 2 boys, and hav a late supper reddy for us upon our return; besides, she sed, she had no fathe in kamp meetings, enyhow. She had ben to 3, and she had seen wurse behavyur thare than eny other plase she ever vizited, and such hollering and yelling az tha indulged in wer friteful to listen to.

We started a little after dabrake, and my 5-yeer-old bays took us over in fine stile in 2 ours and a half. When we arrivd we found the camp in a state ov aktivity. The brekfast things wer being put awa. The hundreds ov tents wer all in a bussel; skores ov yung ladys wer deked out in thare best, and the yung men wer watching them with furtiv glanses, which wer returnd in the most jenyal manner by the gurls. The men had gathered together in littel nots, and wer tawking about enything else than the work ov Jezus. I herd sum konversing about how thare krops had kum in, and others az to the prospekts ov the Greenbak party. Kuzzin Silas and I made up our minds that thare waz not more than 1 in 10 ov thoze that attended that kamp meeting hoo went thare out ov pure luv ov relijun and to promote the kauze of Jezus. The grater porshun ov them kum out ov kuriosity—sum to se the gurls, sum to se the boys, sum to se how thare nabers akted and whot kind ov kondukt waz exhibited thare.

We estimated that thare wer from 3 to 5 thouzand humans on the ground. Tho thare waz a fare proporshun ov the blowers and strikers, the most ov the assemblage wer yungish peepul who wer not aktuated by the most pius insentives in the wurld. Kuzzin Silas and I, az wel az our wives, made up our minds that thare waz more kourting and sparking to the skware aker on that kamp ground than eny other plase in Nu Jerzy. Kuzzin Silas made the remark, with a sly wink ov hiz left i, that he had notised that, az a rule, about 9 munths after kamp meetings thare waz a sensibul inkrease ov the populashun, and that it waz more ezy to point out the muthers than the fathers. Rite here let me sa that from meny yeers' experiense I am led to sa that the Methodists ar grater on the populashun kwestshun than eny others ov the folloers ov Jezus. If it iz dezirabul to fil up a nu kuntry with a rizing jenerashun, it wood be the best wa to send in a plenty ov Methodists, and be shure and hold kamp meetings evry summer and a good long protrakted meeting or revival in the winter. The loud kind ov relijun whare the exsitement runs very hi seems very favorabul to the influx of babys.

At 9 o'klok the big kamp horn waz sounded, which let the boys and gurls and all hands no that meeting-time had kum. We wer informd that thare wer 15 preechers on the ground, and 1 ov them waz a preziding elder. 4 stands or platforms had been erekted, so yu se the gospel kood be dispensed at 4 different plases at wun and the same time. On the morning of our visit the preziding elder, Lumis, led off in the furst surmon and we thawt we wood listen to him awhile. He kommensed with a very vigorous prare, kalling upon God to kum down, to tuch the harts ov sinners, and prepare thare soles for the entranse ov Jezus. He beseeched God not to stand aloof or be indifferent when the eternal welfare ov the soles ov dying sinners waz at stake. After this most fervid prare, the elder pitched up this him:

"Alas! and did my Savyur bleed,
And did my Suvrin di,
Did he devote that preshus hed
For such a worm as I?"

All hands joined in, and the singing waz vary strong. I have not herd enything in our church ekwal to it. After that, another inspiring him waz sung in the same exalted strane, and then the elder went on with a loud surmon, kalling all sinners to repentanse, and a share in the blud of Jezus. He depikted the awful situation of soles that wood be without Jezus when the last da kum, and the sheep were to be separated from the gotes. At that august moment he sed an interest in Jezus waz ov more wurth than all the bonanzas, and all the gold mines, and all the petroleum wels, and all the bank stok, and ralerode shares in the world. "Yes," shouted the elder, "wun drop of the blud ov Jezus in that awful moment iz wurth more than a milyun wurlds with 10 milyuns ov nashunal banks added to the inventory." "O," sed he, "in that grate da the Vanderbilts, the Stuarts, the Astors, and the Tom Skots wil kry out for the roks and the mountins to fal on them and hide them from the rath of God. With all their riches they wood be poor indeed. O sinners kum to the blesed Jezus now; kum this vary our. Defer it not anuther moment; eskape the torments of hel, and seek refuge in the arms ov Jezus, and in the boozum of Abraham. My dying frends, hav yu the leest idea whot the torments of hel ar? Let me tel yu: it iz the intense fire ov God's eternal anger which burns in a super-heeted flame ten thousand times hotter than the hottest furnase you ever saw sinse yu wer born, and it surjes and rajes with ever inkreasing heat and fury throout the never-ending ajes ov eternity. The fires ov hel ar so intense that if wun drop ov its fire shood fall on a globe like this, with its vast roks and mountins, it wood melt it in a moment."

"We no how far it iz to the middul ov the erth; it iz just 4 thouzand miles; so if hel iz in the middul ov the erth, it iz 4 thouzand miles to the horribul prizen ov hel. Down in this plase iz a terrifik noize. Listen to the tremendus, the horribul uprore of milyuns and milyuns and milyuns ov tormented kretures, mad with the fury ov hel! O! the skreems ov feer, the gronings ov horror, the yels ov raje, the krys ov pane, the shouts ov agony, the shreeks ov despare, from milyuns on milyuns! Thare yu heer them roring like lions, hising like serpents, howling like dogs, and waling like dragons. Thare yu heer the nashing ov teeth, and the feerful blasfemys ov the devuls. Abuv all, yu heer the roring ov the thunders ov God's anger, which shakes hel to its foundashuns. But thare iz another sound. Thare iz in hel a sound like that ov meny waters. It iz az if all the rivers and oshuns ov the wurld wer poring themselves with a grate splash down on the floor ov hel. Iz it, then, really the sound ov waters? It iz. Ar the rivers and oshuns ov the erth poring themselves into hel? No. Whot iz it, then? It iz the sound ov oshuns ov teers running down from countless milyuns ov ize. Tha kry forever and ever. Tha kry bekause the sulfurus smoke torments their ize. Tha kry bekause tha ar in darkness. They kry bekause tha hav lost the butiful heven. Tha kry bekause the sharp fier burns them. The roof iz red-hot; the walls ar red-hot; the flore iz like a thik sheet ov red-hot iern. Se! on the middel ov that red-hot iern flore stands a gurl. She looks about 16 yeers ov aje. She haz neether shoos nor stokings on her feet. The dore ov this room haz never ben opend sinse she first set her feet on this red-hot flore. Now she sees the dore opening. She rushes forward. She haz gone down upon her nees upon the red-hot flore. Listen! she speeks. She sez: 'I hav ben standing with my bare feet on this red-hot floor for yeers. Da and nite my only standing plase has ben this red-hot flore. Sleep never kame on me for a moment, that I mite forget this horribul burning flore. Look at my burnt and bleeding feet. Let me go off this burning flore for wun moment—only for a short moment. O that in this endless eternity ov yeers I mite forget the pane only for wun singul moment!' The devil ansers her kwestshun. 'Do yu ask for a moment—for one moment to forget your pain? No; not for wun singul moment during the never-ending eternity ov yeers shal yu ever leev this red-hot flore.'"

After preeching in this strane for more than an our, he pitched up the folloing him which waz sung in the spirit of holy unction.

"O the agony ov hel's horrid panes!
Its clatter ov iron, and its klank ov chanes:
The klang ov lashing whips, shrill shreeks, and groans,
Loud ceesles howlings, kries, and peersing mones.
Meenwhile, az if but lite wer all thoze panes,
Lejons ov devils bound themselves in chanes;
Tormented and tormentors o'er them shake
Thongs and forkd iern in the burning lake,
Belching eternal flames, and reethed with spires
Ov kurling surpents rouze the brimstone fiers,
With whips ov fiery skorpions skurge thoze slaves,
And in thare fases dash the livid waves."

Yu shood hav seen how warm the elder waxed when he pikṭured the never-ending fires ov hel, and what an awful thing it waz to be kalled to di without having ben tuched with the finger ov Jezus and washed in hiz blud. Then the elder shouted at the top of hiz voise, "Kum to Jezus; kum this our; kum this minit; dela not; put not off the glorius opportunity ov sekuring in the blessed and butiful manshuns ov heven, a seet and a krown ov glory to posses thro the endless yeers ov eternity. Kum, my frends; Jezus iz reeching out hiz hands to reseeve yu; he kalls yu; he beseeches yu to kum to him and be krownd with life everlasting. O, if yu kood se the luv that beems in hiz i, and the wishful smile that plays around his sweet mouth, and witnes the affekshunate anxiety that illumins his kountenanse az he bekons yu to fle from the rode to deth and kum to hiz luving arms. He holds out the blessing ov immortal life to yu all. He urges yu to aksept the hevenly krown he haz prepared for yu, and wishes yu to take from hiz hands. O kum; O kum; kum now, kum this blessed moment; kum while the da ov mersy iz extended to yu; O Jezus luvs yu, and he wants to save yure soles from hel; he wil do it if yu wil only permit him to do so; kum, ye airs ov darkness and deth; kum to the fountin ov salvashun; wash and be klenzed from the stanes ov sin and wikedness; put off yure old garments ov filthy rags, and clothe yurselves in the robes of hevenly luv; throw awa yure poverty, and bekum the airs to the manshuns in the skys, where happiness and glory shal be yure eternal reward. O kum, sinners; why wil yu di? why wil yu be draged down to the rejuns ov never-ending darkness and deth? why wil yu stil refuze the welth ov God's eternal glory for the sake ov what the devil haz to offer yu which iz only endles suffering, torment, and pane?

"O, heer the luvly sun ov God kalling yu with teers streeming down hiz fase. He luvs yu more than tung kan tel. Hiz sole goze out to yu and he wants yu to be happy; he wants yu to eskape the hot sulfurus lake prepared by hiz father for the devil and hiz angels—wiked men and wimmen hoo will not beleev in the effikasy ov hiz blesed blud and aksept the eternal riches and glory which he iz reddy to shower down upon thoze hoo wil only reseev. He haz kum down from hiz hevenly abode ov blis on purpus to tender to yu the glorys ov hiz selestshul kingdum. He asks yu if yu will not allow him to lead yu to hiz happy manshuns and establish yu az kings and rulers in the empire ov hiz luv. O, do kum to him now; let him not plede with yu in vane. Kum, kum to the best frend yu hav in the wide universe, kum without another moment's dela! Yu no not how soon yu ma be kaled to go hense! Yu no not but the next moment ma be yure last and if yu hav not before that feerful event takes plase made yure peese with God and aksepted the luv ov hiz blessed sun yu wil be turned into hel with the devil, the snakes and the gotes, thare to rithe and mone and grate yure teeth in agony and horror for ever. O deer frends, for the luv ov Jezus, the lam ov God, be wize in time. Eskape the damnashun ov God and kum to the arms ov hiz sun.

"O kum, kum, kum. Just own hiz power and konfes hiz name and it iz all yu hav to do. Kum rite forward now to the seet ov mersy and yure eternal torment wil be avoided and yure everlasting happines sekured. Agane, I say kum, kum to Jezus."

Thus the elder went on for neer 2 hours and several ov the other preechers jined in and entreeted sinners to kum rite up to Jezus, hoo waz standing thare to reseev them. Evry wunse in a while tha wood sing a perswasiv song that waz kalkulated to arouz the feers and inspire the hopes ov thoze with not very strong minds. It waz kurius to watch the effekt it had upon the wimmen and the gurls. Az thare natshure waz appeeled to tha wood overflo with luv to thare deer Jezus and wood rush forward like frightened fawns and throw themselves into hiz imaginary arms. Sum 20 yung wimmen and old mades, were thus neeling and sobbing at the anxious seet at wun time and sum ov them found Jezus vary kwik. And then yu aut to se them bounce and jump and holler. Sum wood role on the ground. Sum wood bound like a rubber ball, and throw thare arms into the air; sum wood whurl and danse and sum wood shout and holler az tho tha had not a bit ov sense left. At wun time in the afternoon thare waz fully 20 akting in this ridikulus manner.

This waz much the way it went on at the other platforms. Eech had a mourner's seet and eech made all the efforts tha kood, and eech had one or more kandidates under konvikshun and reeching for the arms that wer stretched out to save them. When tha felt the dart ov eternal life penetrate thare soles tha wood jump and shout with exseeding grate joy, and thus the kamp rezembled an insane asylum. We saw but 2 men that seemed to hav any feers ov hel or eny speshal dezire to sekure a seet in paradise. It iz evidently eezier for the female perswashun to luv Jezus than for the more korse and stubburn part ov humanity. The preechers skart and perswaded neer fifty yung gurls and old gurls to go forward, and but 2 men waz all we saw go up, and one ov them waz sed to be a good deel belo par in a mental point ov view.

So it went on neerly all da. We stade till the shades ov evening began to approche, when I harnesed up my jolly bays and in 2 hours we wer home. Suzan had a splendid supper all redy for us, and she sed she fully beleeved she had spent her time much more sensibly than we had. And in view of the wildnes and krazy exsitement that ruled the kamp, I thawt she az uzual waz about rite. Kuzzin Silas sed he wood not wish to go to another kamp-meeting for 10 yeers. Molly sed she wood make it 15, and my Sally sed she wood make it for during life.

In klozing, let me whisper in yure left eer, Mr. Editur, that I think thare iz a more sensibul wa ov getting to Jezus than by a Methodist kamp-meeting. I wood just about az soon go to a Freethinker's konvenshun az yu did. I remane yure pius frend,

JOEL SKIDMORE,
1st Deeken ov Zion Hil Baptist Church.

Not only is the Sun the center around which the planets describe their orbits; it is also their center of life. Nothing can breathe or live without the beneficent influence of its rays. Lavoisier gave expression to this idea when he said, "Organism, feeling, spontaneous motion, and life, only exist upon the surface of the earth and in regions exposed to the light. One might fancy that the fable of Prometheus was the expression of a philosophic truth which had not escaped the notice of our forefathers. Without light, nature was lifeless, dead, and inanimate."

Speaking generally, it may be said that the life of every creature is more perfect in proportion to the amount of light which it can command, and it even seems that life is not possible without its influence, for we meet with nothing but inorganic bodies in the entrails of the earth, or in the deep caverns to which it cannot penetrate. In them is no breathing or sentient thing; at most they contain certain kinds of mosses or lichens, which form the first and most imperfect phase of vegetation, and on minuter examination it is seen that most of these plants (if indeed they are plants) only grow upon or close to rotten timber. And even upon the earth's surface, if a vegetable or animal substance is deprived of daylight, it will successively lose its color and vigor, then stop growing and become stunted, no matter how carefully it may be nurtured and tended.

Man himself, when deprived of light, becomes pale, enervated, decrepit, and eventually loses his energy, as is unhappily too clearly proved in the case of persons who have been confined for a long period in a dungeon, of miners, ships' stokers, workmen in badly-lighted factories, and the inhabitants of cellars or narrow streets. Heat, which, it may be, is only light in another form, is not less needful for life; it alone can develop the first germs of being. Heat begets life and life begets heat, an indissoluble bond connecting these two phenomena. It would, in fact, be difficult to say which of the two is cause and which effect; all we know is that wherever there is life, there also is, more or less, heat.

M. Radau, in an excellent work upon the subject, says that "the influence which the Sun exercises upon vegetation is greater than was formerly supposed to be the case. Not only does it supply the heat which hatches the germs deposited in the ground; it also fosters the respiration of the plants, and, in a certain degree, their growth. And as our alimentary and combustible substances proceed directly or by successive transformations from the vegetable kingdom, it may be said that they represent an amount of active power borrowed from the Sun in the shape of luminous vibrations, when the elements of which the plants are formed are in the act of grouping and combining together. The forces stored up by this gradual process of chemical affinities reappear, partially at least, in the mechanical efforts which the animal being is constantly making, and in the shape of which he expends a part of his own substance. They also reappear in the working of machines fed with coal. They are transformed into heat when wood is burned in a fireplace, or a nutritive substance burnt in the blood of a living thing which has the faculty of respiration, but not of motion. Thus it is that light, by making the plants to grow and flourish, prepares their nourishment for the inhabitants of the earth, and provides them with an inexhaustible source of mechanical power."

When winter has plunged nature into apparent death, the mild temperature of spring is sufficient to reawaken its deadened forces. Beneath its gentle influences the days lengthen, the Sun's rays strike us more vertically, and as their brilliancy increases the fields become bright with flowers, and the birds gladden the woods with their song. Gradually the Sun reaches its greatest elevation, and begins to decline throughout the autumn, until winter is once more upon us.

The nearer we approach the poles, the nearer do we seem to the empire of death, and there are regions where no plant or insect can live, and which are only inhabited by whales, bears, and other animals capable of engendering heat, and preserving a sufficient store of it to protect them against the rigors of the climate.

Mrs. Miller's Watkin's Letter.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In your editorial in this week's paper on "The Watkins Convention," you say: "Among the letters was one from Mrs. Miller, apologizing for having gone on the bail bond of Miss Tilton. She had since read the pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," and found she did not approve of it in tone and temper. On account of Mrs. Miller's regret for having gone bail," etc.

You have, Mr. Editor, doubtless unintentionally, done Mrs. Miller great injustice, as that lady made no "apology,' nor expressed any "regret for having gone bail." The object of Mrs. Miller's brief letter read in the Convention was to correct an erroneous impression that had gained currency among some of the citizens of Watkins (not among any who knew her personally), by explaining that her action was taken entirely independent of the opinions expressed and the doctrines taught in Mr. Heywood's pamphlet. She distinctly stated that she had not read it, and did not care to read it. As far as its opinions and doctrines were concerned, she said the impression she had received from the title and from those who had examined the work was that those doctrines and opinions were such as were distasteful to her. But her note contained no intimation that that impression had been formed, and her understanding of the pamphlet changed since signing the bond. Those who are acquainted with Mrs. Miller know her to be, like her illustrious father, an earnest and highly intelligent Radical, and an attentive reader of the Liberal press, and it is hardly to be supposed but that she was, long before the Watkins Convention ever met, aware of the general tone and temper of the Heywood pamphlet, and that her action in signing the bond arose from an allegiance to the sacred principles of free speech and free opinion, as well as from a womanly desire to assist her persecuted sister. So far from having any "regret," she concluded her letter with an expression of satisfaction that the laws had been so improved as to allow her to become security for Miss Tilton, and in a subsequent note to Miss Tilton, also read in the Convention, she distinctly disavowed any such regret, or any desire to be relieved.

Those who consider Mrs. Miller's letter uncalled for and cowardly should at least bear in mind that while most of the other members of the Convention were entire strangers in Watkins, she was near home and among friends and neighbors unversed in Liberalism and strange to the iconoclasm of advanced thought. To my mind the correction of popular misapprehension and the allaying of popular fear is never cowardly, but a most potent factor in the advancement of Liberalism.

While I regret that Mrs. Miller did not in her brief letter enlarge upon the subject and take ground that would have left no room for any one to have misapprehended her position, I presume it did not occur to her as at all necessary. Certainly the interpretation that she underwent a change of position on the question is an interpretation unwarranted by her letter, and her antecedents as a Radical are not such as entitle her letter to the most narrow and illiberal construction. Yours fraternally, CHAS. H. TRUE.

Pittsford, N. Y. Aug. 31 1878.

THE following emphatic remarks of G. L. Henderson are from The Positive Thinker of the 1st inst:

"The imprisonment of Heywood, and the arrest of D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Josephine S. Tilton, for selling books which the Jesuits of the modern Inquisition have condemned as obscene, is an outrage on free speech. Judge Hurd, of Watkins, told the Grand Jury that they must find a bill against them, because he had read 'Cupid's Yokes' and found it to be indecent, profane, and obscene; that if it was allowed to reach the people, the family would be destroyed and social anarchy ensue. We have heard many charges to a jury, but never before did we hear a judge decide upon the very facts which the jury alone has power to decide. Can it be true that E. H. Heywood has written a book the reading of which will be as destructive to marriage as Paine's 'Rights of Man' was to monarchy? Is it true that none but judges may read this wonderful book without suddenly losing all affection for home, wife, and children? Is Judge Hurd likely to become a dissolute, adulterous, indecent, profane, and obscene man because he has read 'Cupid's Yokes'? We have read the book, your Honor, and have not become one of the common herd, who are likely to beget children and abandon them to the tender mercy of a foundling hospital. Does your Honor know that we offered to read at the Freethinkers' Convention any portion of 'Cupid's Yokes' that might be selected?—if you or any other Christian gentleman would read aloud some portions of a book inspired by God and indorsed by King James II., Defender of the Faith. Is it due to the indecency, profanity, and obscenity of this book, the Bible, that we are indebted for the 70,000 fallen women of New York and the 280,000 prostitute men who seduced them, men who were educated and reared under Christian influences, and theological morality?

"The arrest was made with the evident intention of breaking up the Convention, but the result has been to bring into closer sympathy and union all Liberals both Christian and Infidel, so-called, as will appear by a careful reading of the subjoined resolutions."

MAY 30, 1878.

Before reaching Voltaire, it will be useful to say something of the French exiles who preceded him in his first places of refuge, Belgium and Holland.

In the seventeenth century we see in Belgium an illustrious refugee, Antoine Arnaud, the Hercules of Jansenism, the director of the nuns and pensionnaires of Port Royal.

Denounced by the Jesuits, accused of conspiracy and intrigue against the State, Arnaud crossed the frontier. It was natural for him to seek refuge in the country where Jansenius had been bishop and professor of Holy Scriptures. After having resided at Mons, Arnaud settled permanently at Brussels, for he died there in the course of the year 1694. He was interred under the flagstones of Catherine Church, and his heart was taken to Port Royal des Champs.

Bayle, the illustrious author of the "Dictionaire Historique et Critique," who, in his professor's chair at Sedan and in his writings, had courgeously fought the religious intolerance of Louis XIV, was also compelled to take the road of exile. Before reaching Amsterdam, there to edit his "Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres," he stopped in Brussels, but he left there no appreciable trace of his abode.

The famous comic poet, Regnard, also remained a short while in Brussels in the course of 1681, and there found time to grasp the subject of the best comedy in his repertory. Here are the facts:

At Rome, with the general of the Jesuits, suddenly died an old gentleman of Franche Comte, the lord d' Ancien.

That abrupt and unlucky decease had completely upset the plans of the good Jesuit fathers, who had lodged and fondled our Franche Comté gentleman thus well only to have him make his will in favor of their order and to inherit all his goods, according to their custom. But such a small affair did not perplex our Jesuits; they concealed the nobleman's death and sought a Losay who could make the will in his room and stead.

One of the members of the company had known in Franche Comté a farmer of M. d' Ancien, Denis Euvrard by name, who had the same looks and the same tone of voice as his lord. He was despatched to that tenant, and, through promises of money, succeeded in bringing him to Rome. There he was told that his former lord had just died ab intestat, but not, however, before having had time to declare to the Jesuits that he had bequeathed an important farm to Denis Euvrard, and the remainder of his property to the reverend fathers.

The general of the order urged Denis in the name of heaven to carry out the desire of his defunct master by playing the part of the lord of Ancien on his bed of agony, by bringing him to life again for a few hours.

And so there was Denis Euvrard, our pseudo dying man, stretched upon his bed, with a nightcap down over his eyes, dictating his will—the will of the lord of Ancien—before witnesses and attorneys; but Denis, like the roguish countryman he was, instead of simply allotting to himself a farm, as it had been agreed with the Jesuits, added thereto appurtenances—item a mill, item a meadow, item a woodpatch, item some cattle, item rents.

At every item of Denis' the Jesuits, seeing themselves fooled, grew pale and foamed with rage. They were caught like foxes in their own trap.

At last the mock dying lord deigned to leave a part of the heritage to the reverend fathers, who were furious at thus seeing themselves defrauded of the best portion of the cake, yet were obliged to hold their peace in order to save the rest.

On the day after that sacrilegious farce the true d' Ancien was buried, and Denis Euvrard returned to his hearth, rich, in good health, and delighted at having thus hoodwinked the reverend Jesuit fathers.

Years passed away, and the mimic of death, playing seriously this time the part of a dying man, acknowledged his fraud and revealed the source of his fortune to his confessor. This priest, who was gallican, divulged the will scene concocted by the Jesuits. The natural heirs of M. d' Ancien then attacked the testament. They gained their cause twice, at Besançon and Dole; but the Jesuits, having carried the suit to the Supreme Court of Brussels (Franche Comté, subdued by Spain, depended at that time upon the Flemish government), this tribunal maintained the Jesuits in their right of mortmain upon what property of d' Ancien was held by them.

This suit had not been ended very long before Regnard was in Brussels. It was yet talked and laughed about. Thus it was that the reverend fathers furnished Regnard the idea of his excellent comedy of the Légataire Universel. We see the Jesuits are yet of some use, since they have so happily inspired Moliere in Tartuffa, Beaumarchais in the Marriage de Figaro, and Regnard in the Légataire.

We are in the eighteenth century, so justly called the age of Voltaire. At last the dazzling dawn of Freethought has arrived. It arises, shedding a torrent of light upon its obscure blasphemers, according to the expression of Lefranc de Pompignan.

What an age! And how aptly has Hegel named it the age of intelligence. Such intellectual radiation; such philosophical magnetism; such buoyancy, and such salons! All the literary minds participate in the great work of the emancipation of the human mind. The most brilliant names of the aristocracy and of the rising bourgeois, of the nobility and the finance, actively coöperate in the work of renovation, for the eighteenth century was a new manner of viewing all things, an intellectual and moral revolution. Lastly, the most noble women and the women the most noble—Mesdames du Chatelet, du Deffant, d'Tencin, de L'Espinasse, d' Houdetst, Geoffrin, Helvetius, d'Epinay, de Choiseul, de Grammout, de Luxembourg—I forget many more—these duchesses, these marchionesses, these countesses, do not disdain to be the Amazons of Freethought. At their houses are held the philosophical assizes. Their parlors are opened to the encyclopedists, to the philosophers, discussing with them the great problems of human destiny, bringing, as their part of the collaboration, their graces and sparkling wit.

How precious that collaboration! and how much it is to be regretted that the bourgeois of the nineteenth century have not seen fit to follow the example of their noble predecessors!

In the midst of that brilliant pleiad of encyclopedists and philosophical great ladies, vindicating the rights of Freethought, appears, like a knight in full armor, Voltaire, who exercised a prodigious influence upon his time, upon his age, of which he was the leader, as well as the highest intellectual expression.

Voltaire represented the induction of the minds of his period; he stands for free conscience, the eloquent word of the ideas of that great eighteenth century, which Mr. Blaze de Bury has happily characterized as follows:

"In science, a spirit of free research; in literature, the free expansion of the true, of the human beautiful;" and we will add to that definition of M. Blaze. In the sphere of the philosophical, absolute reaction against Christianity, entire separation, antithesis of the Christian idea that makes human destiny to depend upon divine grace and intervention, whilst the philosophy of the eighteenth century—man is dependent only upon himself—upon the laws of his conscience and reason.

Christianity, as indeed do all religions, establishes the rights of God. The eighteenth century establishes the rights of man, so clearly formulated by the laws of the French Revolution, which was the product and the crowning of its philosophy. The eighteenth century is the legislator of the inevitable law of progress upon which we live to-day, and which vivifies us as our very blood.

Through the influence of Voltaire and of the encyclopedists, the period of Louis XV. was a complete revolution in thought, literature, and art.

On this point David Frederick Strauss has said, in one of his remarkable lectures upon Voltaire:

"The great work of the sixteenth century, the Reformation, is essentially the deed of the Germans; during the period of transition marked by the seventeenth century, whilst Germany was torn by civil struggle, Holland and England were establishing the foundations of modern politics and thoughts. In the eighteenth, Englishmen scattered in France, like Bolingbroke, Frenchmen visiting England, as Voltaire and Montesquieu, brought the spark of the new light which, thanks to the efforts of Voltaire, was to spring from France to beam upon the entire world, as the light of the age of vulgarization. If the French, and above all the Parisians, were the people elected to this intellectual priesthood, Voltaire was its high-priest; and we say with equal truth, In France alone the eighteenth century could find its literary representative; or in the eighteenth century alone could France produce the writer capable of reflecting within himself all her national prosperities.

Christian Sentiment.

BRO. BENNETT: Being desirous, as I think all Liberals should be, of hearing both sides of every question, I sometimes attend "divine" worship. At a prayer-meeting in Hartford, the other night, I heard the Christian side of the question set forth in a truly Christian light, and, that the many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may also hear it, I send it to you. In closing the meeting, the Rev. Mr. M—. said (I do not give it verbatim, but have condensed it somewhat):

There must be an awakening. The Church is going down; she has not the power she had thirty years ago. Thirty years ago I used to see men by the score fall dead in the congregation under powerful exhortations and sermons, but we do not see this to-day. The Church is too much divided. Outsiders look too coldly on. The churches must unite and go to work with earnestness and enthusiasm. If the churches would unite, and put forth the proper effort, we could soon see all the people in Hartford converted, and those who were too stubborn to be converted would either have to unite with us or leave the place (Selah). Those who will not be coaxed should be driven, and they can be if we only go to work in the right direction.

Hear, O Liberals! When these godlike rulers get started in the right direction, we can "march in" under the lash or leave. But where must we go? When Liberty is chained in America, where may we find her untrammeled? Put God in the Constitution; unite the Church, and build her a throne, on which a Comstock will sit and mete out Christian justice, and then boast of the freedom of Columbia and the loveliness of American institutions.

Liberals, awake! That "the Church has not the power she had thirty years ago" is encouraging. We have made a grand strike in favor of truth and light, and shall we falter in the very moment of victory? Shall we let fall the mighty banner which the toil of ages has reared in favor of mental liberty, and desecrate the names of a thousand martyrs who have fallen in its defense? No; we will work on; our cause is glorious and our reward will soon come. J. M. P.

If you Take Away my Religion, What will you Give me in its Stead?—Continued.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEWARK LIBERAL LEAGUE, JUNE 2, 1878, BY H. B. MARTIN, M.D.

13th. The Holy Catholic Church. (Pagan, Divinity.)

14th. The Communion of Saints. (Pagan same.)

15th. The forgiveness of sins. (Pagan same.)

16th. The resurrection of the body. (Pagan, Immortality of the soul.)

17th. And life everlasting. (Pagan same.)

Here we have the two creeds of the pagan and Christian religion placed side by side, and it requires no great effort of the mind to discern their similarity. Moshiem (vol. i, p. 116) in his Ecclesiastical History says this creed still bears the name of the Apostle's Creed.

From the fourth century downwards it was almost generally considered as a production of the apostles. All, however, who have the least knowledge of antiquity, look upon this opinion as entirely false and destitute of all foundation.

The probability is that it is really a pagan document, and of pagan origination; since, even after the trifling alteration and substitution of one name perhaps for another, to make it subserve its new application, it yet exhibits a closer resemblance to its pagan stock, than to the Christian stem on which it has been engrafted.

The exclusive character of superstition among the Jews, and the constant intermarriage with their own caste or sect, have to this day preserved to them in all countries a distinct character.

They resented the consciousness of their inferiority by an invincible hatred of the whole human race, and being without wit or invention to devise to themselves any original system of theology, adopted from time to time the various conceits of the nations by whom they had been held in subjugation. They plagiarized the religious legends of these nations, and pretended that the fugitive patchwork was a system of theology intended by heaven for their exclusive benefit. They give us the story of the sacrifice of Ipthegenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, as an original legend of a judge of Israel, who had immolated his daughter to Jao, without so much as respecting the wish to be deceived, not even being at the pains to vary the name of the heroine of the fable.

Before the Christian religion had made any perceptible advance among mankind, two grand and influential principles characterized all the moving intelligence that then existed in the world; and to these two principles Christianity owed its triumph over all the wisdom and honesty that feebly opposed its progress. These principles were the supposed necessity of deceiving the vulgar, and the imagined duty of cultivating and perpetuating ignorance. Euripides maintained that in the early state of society some wise men insisted on the necessity of darkening truth with falsehood, and of persuading men that there is an immortal deity who hears and sees and understands our actions, whatever we may think of that matter ourselves. Strabo shows, at great length, the general use and important effect of theological fables. "It is not possible for a philosopher to conduct by reasoning a multitude of women, and of the low vulgar, and thus invite them to piety, holiness, and faith; but the philosopher must also make use of superstition, and not omit the invention of fables and the performance of wonders. For the lightning, and the ægis, and the trident of the gods are but fables; and so is all ancient theology. But the founders adopted them as bugbears to frighten the weak-minded. Paul of Tarsus, whose fourteen epistles make up the greater part of the bulk of the New Testament, repeatedly inculcates and avows the principle of deceiving the common people, talks of his having been upbraided by his own converts with being crafty and catching them with guile (2 Cor. xii, 16), and of his known and willful lies abounding to the glory of God (Rom. iii, 7). Accessory to the avowed and consecrated principle of deceit was that of ignorance. St. Paul, in the most explicit language, taught and maintained the absolute necessity of extreme ignorance in order to attain celestial wisdom (1 Cor. i, 27); and St. Peter, or whoever was the author of the epistles ascribed to him, inculcates the necessity of a state of mind little removed from idiocy as necessary to the acquisition of divine knowledge; that even "as new-born babes they should desire the sincere milk of the word, that they might grow thereby" (1 Pet. ii, 2; 1 Thess. ii, 7).

Upon the sense of this doctrine the pious and orthodox Tertullian glories in the egregious ridiculousness of the Christian religion, and the debilitating effects which the sincere belief of it had produced on his own understanding; his main argument for it being: "I reverence it because it is contemptible; I adore it because it is absurd; I believe it because it is impossible."

To such an extent was this doctrine of ignorance and deceit carried that even as late as the tenth and eleventh centuries the Christian bishops and prelates —the "teachers, spiritual pastors, and masters" of the whole Christian community—supplied by the sign of the cross their inability to write their names. Even since my remembrance religious teachers have taught that the wisdom of this world is foolishness in the sight of God, and that our minds must be brought into a state of preparation compared to that of a little child—that is, a state in which we are unable to use our reason—else we can never understand and know the things of God. Says St. Augustine: "That which is now called the Christian religion really was known to the ancients, nor was wanting at any time from the beginning of the human race until the time when Christ came in the flesh, from whence the true religion, which had previously existed, began to be called Christian; but this Christian religion is the same as existed in former times, only in later times it has received this name."

M. Daillee, in his excellent treatise on Religion, says: "The papists took their idolatrous worship of images, as well as all other ceremonies, from the old heathen religion." And Ludovicus Vivus, a learned Catholic, confesses that there could be found no difference between paganish and popish worship before images, only that names and titles are changed. Epiphanius freely admits that all the forms of Christianity that differed from his own were derived from the heathen mythology. Bishop Burnet, in a treatise for the instruction of the clergy, entitled "De Statu Mort" (p. 104), not only justifies, but recommends, the practice of the most consummate hypocrisy, and that, too, on the most awful of all subjects, and would have his clergy preach and maintain the reality and eternity of hell torments, even though they should believe nothing of the sort themselves. Says Lardner: "All own that Christians of all sorts were guilty of fraudulent writings and teachings; indeed, we may say it was one great fault of the times." Says Dr. Henry More: "There is scarcely any church in Christendom at this day which does not obtrude, not only plain falsehoods, but such falsehoods as will appear, to any free spirit, pure contradictions and impossibilities, and that with the same gravity, authority, and importunity as they do the holy oracles of God." Daille, on "The Use of the Fathers" (book i, chap. iii), says: "We ought not to wonder that even those of the primitive times made use of these deceits, seeing for a good end they made no scruple to forge whole books." We might with much appropriateness ask, What good end was that which needed to be prosecuted by the forgery of whole books?

St. Paul says (Rom. iii, 7): "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" Even Christ himself is represented in the gospels as inculcating the necessity and setting the example of deceiving and imposing upon the common people, and purposely speaking unto them in parable and double entente, "that, seeing, they might see and not perceive; and, hearing, they might hear and not understand" (Mark iv, 12). And divine inspiration, so far from involving any guarantee that truth would be spoken under its immediate influence, is, in the Scripture itself, laid down as the criterion whereby we may know that nothing in the shape of truth is to be expected. "And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I, the Lord, hath deceived him" (Ezek. xiv, 9). When it was intended that King Ahab should be seduced to his inevitable destruction, God is represented as having employed his faith and piety as the means of his overthrow: "Now, therefore, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all thy prophets" (1 Kings xxii, 23). There were four hundred of them, all speaking under the influence of divine inspiration, all having received the spirit, all of them the servants of God, and engaged in obeying his godly commands, yet lying as fast as if the father of lies himself had commissioned them. Happy would it have been for Ahab had he been an Infidel!

In the New Testament, however, we may reasonably expect to find a better state of things; but, alas! orthodoxy itself is constrained to tremble and adore before that dreadful declaration, than which no religion that was ever in the world besides ever contained anything half so horrible: "For this cause, God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they might all be damned" (2 Thess. ii, 11, 12). Such was to be the effect of divine revelation. St. Paul either openly glories in the avowal, or but faintly repels, the charge of practicing a continued system of imposture and dissimulation. "For unto the Jews," says he, "I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to the weak, became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men" (1 Cor. ix, 22). And in a passage still more plain to our inquiry (2 Gal. ii) he distinguishes the gospel which he preached on ordinary occasions from "that gospel which he preached privately to them that were of reputation."

Says Mosheim, in his "Ecclesiastical History" (vol. i, p. 198): "In the fourth century it was an almost universally adopted maxim that it was an act of virtue to deceive and lie when by such means the interests of the Church might be promoted." And as regards the fifth century, he says (vol. ii, p. 11): "The simplicity and ignorance of the generality in those times furnished the most favorable occasion for the exercise of fraud; and the impudence of impostors in contriving false miracles was artfully proportioned to the credulity of the vulgar; while the sagacious and wise, who perceived these cheats, were overawed into silence by the dangers that threatened their lives and fortunes if they should expose the artifice."

I Don't Know the Man.

D. M. BENETT, Dear Sir: I have great sympathy for any man who is so unfortunate as to fall a victim to the merciless Comstock, the great right arm of the S. F. S. V., Y. M. C. A., and God Almighty. Therefore, prompted by the most humane motives, I followed the directions contained in THE TRUTH SEEKER some weeks since, by cutting out the petition to R. B. Hayes for the release of the martyr, E. H. Heywood, and pasting it on some foolscap paper, I commenced soliciting subscriptions. Such work you never saw. The people really seemed to fear that petition as they would a thunderbolt from their prospective heaven. But few could be induced to give their signatures. All manner of excuses were offered, the greatest of which seemed to be that they had never had the pleasure of an introduction to the aforesaid martyr; for when I asked them for their name they replied in a meek and lowly manner that they did not "know the man." Great God! (if there is any) what a miraculous revelation! I stood back aghast, tongue protruding less than a mile, every hair pointing to an imaginary heaven, my 5-foot 11 frame trembling and shaking as only such information or an earthquake could cause it to. However, I soon partially recovered (by help of the devil, I presume), and fled from their presence with the speed of—well, say lightning. After putting a reasonable distance between us I sat me down and gave myself up to meditation, which resulted in the following conclusions:

1. These men must have been "truly inspired;" for certainly nobody but an inspired person — a lunatic, a fool, a maniac, or a d——d bigoted, superstitious, and intolerant Christian—could by any possible means be in possession of such astonishing information.

2. They doubtless knew that I was an Infidel—that is to say, an embassador and emissary of the devil—and therefore my presence and my voice must of necessity contaminate their godly morals.

3. Perhaps they were led to make the aforesaid astonishing revelation because I had informed them that a certain thing, named Anthony Comstock, had been instrumental in making Mr. Heywood a victim of the American Inquisition, and they, believing him (Anthony) to be an incarnate God, or, in other words, God manifest in the flesh, feared his tender mercies, and therefore availed themselves of the miraculous powers of falsehood, hypocrisy, and deception with which every Christian is so thoroughly imbued. Whether these conclusions are correct I leave you to decide. One thing, however, is certain: "I don't know the man" simply means, "I'll be d——d if I'll sign the petition;" that he is a a dangerous man, a skeptic; yes, an "unregenerate Infidel," and as such he (Heywood) has no right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." And yet, strange to say, these same demoniacal hyenas in human form claim to love their fellows as themselves, and, above all, they claim to be consistent—and I, for one, think they are; but the great trouble is to make us Infidels understand what consistency means; but I have got it "by heart," and I'll give it for your benefit. It is simply a total denial of that which really is, and an unconditional acceptance of that which never existed; that is to say, they do not know E. H. Heywood, but they do know a certain miraculously-begotten bastard born about nineteen hundred years ago; you must believe what you can't believe, you must pray for the removal of the curse of rum and then go to the polls and vote for it. You must preach one thing and practice another "world without end."

If any of your readers ever want to know what the Christian version of consistency is, give them the foregoing definition, for that's right. I scarcely dare hope the petition will be a success, and that Mr. Heywood will be released. Let every man with a human heart do his best, and as there is said to be luck in odd numbers, I trust every Infidel will make an effort to have Anthony added to the list of powers that be, so that it will read God the Father, God the Son, God the Devil, and last, but not least, God the incarnate fiend, Anthony Comstock. Let all Christendom shout hallelujah! Amen, three times. Yours in hope,

REV. G. H. WARREN.

BY W. S. BELL.

This world of new discoveries, inventions, and improvements is accompanied by a world of new thought. Never did any era in the world's history break away so suddenly from its predecessor as this age is parting from the past. Never in the history of man were there so many inquiring, exploring, and inventive minds at work. Never were there as now, so many improvements in industrial affairs. Never was there so much brain power at work stimulating and quickening a higher order of brain. We have only to reflect a moment upon the number of papers, magazines, and books which stream from the presses, lying upon the tables of every house and store, making small libraries at home, and large ones for the town, city, or school. These all imply a quickening of the public mind. Besides, the intellectual character of the age is exhibited in the prevalence of educational institutions, as schools, academies, colleges, and universities. And perhaps the most significant of these is the public school system, which constitutes the bulwark of this republic. The increased mental activity of the age is shown also by the demand and supply of fresh teachers who come before the public on the lecture platform to discuss the latest achievements of science or the pressing need of reform in some direction. It is therefore neither an empty boast nor a mere rhetorical flourish to say that our age is an Age of Brain.

In reaching its present commanding position, the brain has had to contend against the conservative tendencies of society. The institutions comprised under Church and State make no provision for progress and change. Hence it has always been since man was man that a new idea has been regarded as heresy, treason, or some other sort of crime. Human conduct has been governed by customs and traditions, while common sense considerations have been totally disregarded. A tame servility to existing usages, and an idolatrous reverence of the past, prevented the ancients from attaining the spirit of progress.

"Of all the various ways," says Mr. Buckle, "in which the imagination has distorted the truth, there is none that has worked so much harm as an exaggerated respect for the past ages." It became necessary, therefore, before any great progress could be made, that the human mind should shake off its blind veneration of antiquity. But this could be done only by degrees. In every fibre of the body, and in every element of the mind, were inherited tendencies which inclined the child to think and act as its parents thought and acted. In every custom of society were influences leading the unconscious child to full confidence in the traditions of the Fathers. Under such training the highest of human duties was conformity to customs. In other words, daily life was reduced to imitation. If we were to sum up the difference between the spirit of former times and the spirit of this age, we should say that limitation was the genius of the past, while the genius of the present is originality. We are reminded of a story, as Lincoln would say: A certain Figi chief was one day going over a mountain path followed by a long string of his people, when he happened to stumble and fall; all the rest of the people immediately did the same thing except one man, whereupon the others set upon him to know whether he considered himself better than the chief? and why he did not fall down as they had when they saw the chief had stumbled and fallen?

In looking over the history of the world we find religion has been the great imitator. Its ruling traits are servility and imitation. In reading ecclesiastical history, we see one age closely copying another. The Church literature is an endless series of quotations from the Fathers. Everywhere in patriotic literature the writers do little more than quote the early Fathers as authority upon all questions of truth and duty. Progressive notions were classed under the title, "Destructive Innovations, Skepticism, Atheism." The first mark of originality, the first touch of genius was looked upon by pious souls as diabolical. Hence the Reformers have been persecuted and martyred. Have not the discoveries, inventions, and improvements been called the work of the devil? Why was this, except that the spirit of the times would not admit of improvement and progress?

This spirit of servile imitation would have continued in full force to the present hour had it not been for the increase and diffusion of knowledge. The revival of learning which began in the twelfth century, has been constantly widening and deepening its current. The Reformation was the general epoch when humanity fought and won the great battle for human rights.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 7, 1878.

Our Indictment.

On Monday, Aug. 26, the Grand Jury of Schuyler county convened to examine and inquire into the crimes, felonies, and misdemeanors that had been committed within the bounds of their jurisdiction. After being instructed by Judge Oliver P. Hurd, with unusual severity, to find that the pamphlet which we and our fellow prisoners were charged with having sold was obscene, and that the selling of it was a felony, they went out to commence their canvass. They had a lot of house-breakers, burglars, thieves, receivers of stolen goods, committers of assault and battery, etc., etc., to take cognizance of before our cases. On Tuesday they reached our case and examined the awful pamphlet. "Cupid's Yokes" was read by them, or a part of them. It was given out by certain members of their body that nothing was found in the book sufficient to hold us, and on Wednesday one of them told a gentleman of the place that no bill would be found against us.

The intelligence seemed to create a commotion among the pious complainants and prosecutors. We saw the Rev. Mr. Waldo, of the Presbyterian church, talking earnestly with District Attorney Davis, and his countenance beamed with bigotry and hate, much as his great leader, John Calvin's, may be supposed to have done when he was giving orders for the burning of poor Servetus, or when he caused the death on the scaffold of the unfortunate Gruet for a crime of about the same magnitude as the selling of "Cupid's Yoke's," to wit, fastening a placard on Calvin's pulpit on which were written some remarks not altogether complimentary to that cruel tyrant. Calvin followed him like a bloodhound, and did not let up on him for a moment until his death was secured. The lovely Christian character of Mr. Waldo's great leader, Calvin, may be seen in the letter he wrote to the Marquis de Pauet, in which he said, "Do not hesitate to rid the country of those fanatical fellows (faquins), who, in their conversation, seek to excite the people, who blacken our conduct and would fain make our belief pass as a revery. Such monsters ought to be strangled, AS I DID IN THE EXECUTION OF MICHAEL SERVETUS" (Audin vol. ii, p. 171).

Suffice it to say that influences were brought to bear upon the Grand Jury sufficient to produce a reopening of the case and to reach a result different from the one that had been announced by certain communicative members of that body. On Thursday, at 10 o'clock A. M., we put in an appearance at the Court House to hear who had been indicted, but as the papers were not ready, or for some other cause, an adjournment was made until 2 P. M. At that hour we again met, and the venerable Grand Jury handed in the names of those against whom bills of indictment had been found. Some fifteen persons were arraigned for housebreaking, burglary, larceny, receiving stolen goods, assault and battery, fighting, and, we believe, one attempt at rape. These were followed by the indictments of W. S. Bell, Josephine S. Tilton, George Mosher, and D. M. Bennett, for the crime of selling "Cupid's Yokes." We were called forward within the bar in company with the other prisoners, and as their cases were severally called up, and the statements made by their attorneys as to whether they were ready for trial this term, the Judge fixed the amount of bail in each case. In some cases bail was given, and in others the prisoners were remanded to jail. As we sat there with such a class of criminals, including black and white, male and female, it was somewhat amusing to take in the situation in which we were placed, and to study the countenances and manners of the prisoners as they replied to the interrogatories put to them. One old man, arraigned on a charge of receiving stolen goods, asserted his entire innocence and declared that he had never wronged any man to the amount of two cents, and he looked as though he was telling the truth. His wife, we think it was, created some amusement when questions were put to her. To the Judge's inquiry, "Do you plead guilty or not guilty?" the woman blurted out:

"I don't know what you mean!"

"Did you steal the goods [a set of knives and forks, or something of the kind], or did you receive them after they were stolen?"

"I hain't stole nothing. I received the knives and forks, but I didn't know they had been stole."

"Are you ready for trial?"

"I don't know whether I am or not. I s'pose I am."

"Have you counsel employed?"

"I don't know what you mean. I don't know nothing about counsel."

"Have you a lawyer engaged?"

"No; I ain't got any lawyer."

"Have you money to employ one?"

"No; I ain't got any money."

"Do you wish the Court to appoint counsel for you?"

"I don't know. I s'pose so."

At this juncture the attorney, who had been appointed by the Court to attend to the case of the husband, said he would attend to her case also, and then the next case was taken up.

At length our case was reached, and the indictment partially read to us by the District Attorney. The following is a copy of the same, as subsequently furnished us by the clerk of the Court:

Bennett did then and there deliver the said obscene pamphlet, for a valuable consideration, to the said Warren Hurd, and to divers other persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of the people of the State of New York, their laws and dignity; and the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that the said D. M. Bennett, being of the age of twenty-one years and over, and unlawfully, wickedly, and feloniously devising, contriving, and intending to vitiate and corrupt the morals of the people of the State of New York, as aforesaid, on the 23d day of August, 1878, at the Town of Dix, County of Schuyler, and State aforesaid, did unlawfully, wickedly, and feloniously exhibit and offer for sale to Warren Hurd, and to divers other persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown, the aforesaid obscene pamphlet, entitled "Cupid's Yokes; or, the Binding Forces of Conjugal Life," and did then and there have in his possession, for the purpose of exhibiting, offering for sale, and selling, the aforesaid obscene pamphlet, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of the people of the State of New York, their laws and dignity. C. W. DAVIS, District Attorney.

This is truly a formidable accusation, and we must confess that we had not previously been aware that we were so wicked and depraved, and that we had been trying so industriously to vitiate, deprave, and debauch the minds of the people of the State of New York; but if that Grand Jury, upon their oath, found it was so, perhaps their statement should be taken for all it is worth. It seemed singular, while recounting our vileness and unlawful conduct, that the old formula—"and instigated by the devil"—had not also been inserted, then it could have been made clear how we came to be so wicked.

The indictments of Miss Tilton, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Mosher were of the same tenor as ours. Mr. Bell gave bail to appear at the Court of Oyer and Terminer, which meets December 9th next. Miss Tilton refused to give bail. She felt that she had done no wrong, and if the people of Schuyler County were determined to oppress her and punish her for making an effort to obtain an honest livelihood by selling her brother-in-law's publications, she would ask no person to go bail for her, and Schuyler County might board her until the day of trial. She marched off to jail with as much dignity and as much conscious innocence as Judge Hurd walked to his own pleasant home. If the great and proud State of New York imprisons that brave little woman in the county jail for three months, and then consigns her to State Prison for a term of years, and all for selling the harmless pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," it will be one of the most striking instances of legal oppression and tyranny that has occurred since the days of the Spanish Inquisition, and it will be a foul blot upon the escutcheon of the great "Empire State," and a lasting disgrace to the Christian Church of the nineteenth century.

In our case, our attorney, John J. Van Allen, made a motion to quash the indictment on the ground that our Christian name had not been given, but simply an initial letter. He produced several authorities, as Barbour's "Criminal Practice," and Archibald's "Criminal Code," showing conclusively that the Christian name should be used. Though it would seem that the authorities were conclusive, at the instance of the District-Attorney and his assistant the judge did not entertain the motion to quash.

Pending the discussion, the hour for adjournment arrived, and we were under the necessity of putting in an appearance on Friday morning. Mr. Bell, in the meantime having given bail, took cars for home. Miss Tilton having gone to jail we felt that we were almost left alone. Two hours of Friday morning were occupied in disposing of our case and in giving the amount of bail required for our appearance at the December term of Oyer and Terminer. As soon as this was accomplished and we had partaken of dinner, we left for Rochester, seven miles from which city, on the shore of Lake Ontario, at the mouth of Irondequoit Bay, reside our aged mother and only sister. They had heard of our arrest and were in great trouble as to the result. Our parent's joy at beholding us again was most demonstrative. After a brief visit with our near friends we returned to our duty here in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, feeling improved by the trip.

During the time we were awaiting the action of the Grand Jury in Watkins, we spent a portion of the time in visiting the numerous Glens in the vicinity, especially Havana Glen, four miles south of Watkins, in which are several beautiful views, the Council Chamber, which is a large oblong room with walls so square as to present the appearance of masonry. Curtain Cascade and the Bridal Veil are two beautiful waterfalls, and are not surpassed by any cascade in the Watkins Glen.

Glen Eldridge is three miles down the Lake, north from Watkins, and though not so much visited as formerly, it presents many beautiful views. There are several other glens in the vicinity more or less visited by tourists. We also took a steamboat ride on the charming Seneca Lake, and viewed with pleasure the beautiful farm lands, fruit orchards, vineyards, and pretty villages that skirt its shores on either side. The visit to Watkins was such an outlet as we needed from our arduous duties, and had it not been for the bigotry and detestable intolerance exhibited by the Christian people of the place, we would have had a very pleasant ten days' diversion.

The Fourth Person arrested at Watkins

For selling "Cupid's Yokes" was George Mosher, who lives in that village. After the arrests that took place on Saturday afternoon he thought he would venture to offer them for sale at the meeting in the grove on Sunday afternoon. He took lots of fifty or thereabouts on his arm and went among the crowd and sold them freely. He offered one to C. W. Davis, the District Attoney, among others, while so engaged. The officer marched him off to jail without a warrant or any legal process. At the time we sent in the account of our arrest we did not know upon what charge Mr. Mosher was arrested, but it turned out to be the heinous one of selling "Cupid's Yokes." He lay in prison till the next morning, when he obtained bail and was released. A bill was also found against him by the Grand Jury, and he was held for the December term of Oyer and Terminer. Mr. Mosher is a worthy and respected man, though not one of the wealthy or aristocratic class. The worst thing that was urged against him was that he is a Freethinker. Perhaps that little fact had something to do with his arrest. The Watkins people are excessively pious, and they hate Freethinkers with an intense hatred. Several of them made the humane remark that we ought all to be hung. As we walked their streets we more than once heard uncomplimentary and uncalled-for remarks made about us as we passed.

Prejudging the Case.

In charging the Grand Jury at Watkins, it is to be regretted that Judge Oliver P. Hurd should have deemed it his duty to decide for the jury the character of the work upon which it was their duty to deliberate. A perfectly fair-minded and impartial judge would leave it with the jury to decide upon the character of the evidence placed before them. If the dicta of the judge is to be the governing factor in the case the Grand Jury could be dispensed with, thereby saving the county about one hundred dollars per day.

After disposing of the cases that preceded ours, he read the statute of 1873, relating to the sale of obscene books and other objects, and made comments on the law and its value to society. He then informed the jury that several arrests had been made for selling a book called "Cupid's Yokes;" and he said, "I have read the book, and, in my opinion, it is an obscene work and contraband of the statute. The author of it is now in prison on account of it, and it has been condemned by competent authority in the courts of the United States. In my opinion, the book is obscene and contraband of the statute, because it is full of indecency, profanity, and obscenity, and calculated to do a great amount of mischief to society. You are to indict any one found selling this work within the bounds of your county, and within five hundred yards of the line dividing your county from another. You are to indict any one found looking on, advising, or consenting to the sale of this book, if any such are presented to you as having so violated the law. You are also to indict citizens, as well as strangers, who may be found violating the statute.

"I believe in free speech and a free press, but not in either when they are carried beyond the rules of propriety and are guilty of stepping across the line.

"You are to examine the books sold at the Freethinkers' Convention, lately held in this town, and if you find any contraband of this statute you are to indict any persons who have sold such books, or have offered them for sale, or have advised others where they could be found, or who have given away or lent them to any persons within your jurisdiction."

He then commented on the serious import and stigma of an indictment, and counseled the jury to act with deliberation, etc.

The judge doubtless means to be fair and honorable in his decisions, but we learned that the opinion is somewhat general in Watkins that he panders to the religious prejudices of the bigoted community in which he resides. We heard as able an attorney as practices in that court remark somewhat emphatically, in reference to a decision of Judge Hurd, and in the presence of the Judge, but not in his hearing, "It is a d——d outrage that a judge has not independence enough to decide according to justice, and not pander to the prejudices of the public which surrounds him."

It would to most persons seem pretty clear that Judge Hurd would have shown himself more of a fair, impartial judge, fit to preside over the cases when they come to trial, had he left it with the intelligent jury to decide as to the character of the book complained of, rather than to decide for them that it is obscene, dangerous, and revolutionary. Upon the same principle he could denounce any political dissertation that did not coincide with one or both of the old parties, or an anti-theological essay that did not agree with the orthodox sects.

The tabooed pamphlet is simply a presentation of Mr. Heywood's convictions upon the subjects of marriage, divorce, and the propagation of our species. These are questions which are bound to be prominent in our social life, and which every American citizen has an inherent right to discuss without being sent to prison.

Can it be that in this last quarter of this nineteenth century, in this so-called free land of Columbia, free-born American citizens are to be arrested, imprisoned, and despoiled of their property because, forsooth, they have the temerity to exercise freedom of speech and freedom of the press and utter their honest convictions in fitting language on any subject? If freedom of speech and freedom of the press are to be taken from us, what have we left to show that we are truly a free people? What have we at present that one class of men who accept the popular creed are empowered to deprive another class of their liberties because they dare to differ from the prescribed line marked out by the dominant class? If our Bill of Rights and our National and State Constitutions are worth the paper they are printed upon, Ezra H. Heywood has the same right to express his sentiments upon the marriage relation or divorce as any other citizen has to give his views upon any question under heaven, and it is a bigot and a tyrant who would deprive him of it.

It is greatly to be regretted that Judge Oliver P. Hurd is not a man of broader and more liberal views. A judge, to be fit for the office, should be able to take a comprehensive view of the great questions that are agitating the public mind and are bound to come up continually before the American people, and not pander to the opulent, fashionable, or self-righteous classes.

The Very Moral Men who Caused Our Arrest.

The three very pious men who were foremost in causing our arrest should perhaps have some slight attention. They may be well-meaning men, but before they undertake to extract the motes from the eyes of others, it might be well to pluck the beams from their own. It is thought that two or three preachers of Watkins showed special animosity towards our Convention, even before the time arrived for it to come off. The Rev. Mr. Mann of the Episcopal church—who, by the by, is not much of a man anyway—on the Sunday before the Convention denounced the coming meeting of Freethinkers, and forbade any whom he had baptized to attend our meetings. The Rev. Mr. Waldo, of the Presbyterian church, evinced much of the spirit of bigotry and intolerance which has distinguished the Christian Church, and which has caused the death of from fifty to seventy-five millions of innocent human beings. He was once or twice upon the grounds, but his spirit of holy hatred was so great that he could scarcely restrain himself. To him is to be largely credited the pitiful and miserable course that was pursued towards us and others.

The leading man in making the complaint against us was Frederick Davis, the head and front of the Episcopal church in Watkins. He is by no means a paragon of virtue and sobriety. He conducts a malt house, and changes the grain, adapted to the healthful food of men and animals, to a condition suited to the preparation of an alcholic beverage that deprives his fellow-men of their reason and self-control. On occasions of picnics and parties he has been in the habit of getting grossly intoxicated and making a fool of himself generally. He has, we are informed, a reputation of being quite a ladies' man. He had two or three upon the string at the time his late wife died, and conversation was held in her presence in reference to him the day before she died, which annoyed her exceedingly and embittered the hours of her death. One of these ladies he subsequently took for his wife. It is thought by those who know him that he has enough to do to attend to his own morals without troubling himself about the morals of others.

Mr. J. B. Morris, merchant, another of the complainants, and also one of the Grand Jury, is said to be a very pious and a very moral man. He is a zealous member of the Rev. Mr. Waldo's church; but as zealous as he is in attending to the morals of others, he tried to screen his son from due punishment when he exhibited himself in a state of utter nudity in the streets of Watkins, and on account of the high standing of the father in the church and in the community the son was allowed to go unpunished. But if a young lady or strangers presume to sell copies of "Cupid's Yokes" within the town, his holy ire is aroused to the utmost, and he favors the direst punishment being meted out to them. Of such is supposed to be the kingdom of heaven.

Dr. Thompson the third of the complainants is represented as an honorable man and it was thought he was unduly persuaded to take the course he did towards the strangers who had the temerity to visit his town and give his influence to commit them to prison and to subject them to heavy expense and great inconvenience for an act no more a crime than it is for him to drink a glass of soda water. It is to be hoped these men will all live long enough to be heartily ashamed of the contemptible and ignoble course they have pursued towards those who never did them an unkind act, and that they will learn to practice the good golden rule taught by Confucius and Jesus, to do by others as they would be done by.

Small Provocations.

We have now been arrested twice on criminal charges, with the view of immuring us in prison, depriving us of liberty, the dearest boon to man, and to take from us our little hard-earned property. The first arrest was made about ten months ago, by that miscreant of the Young Men's Christian Association, Anthony Comstock, because we had presumed to direct a letter, communication, or prayer to the individual, real or imaginary, called Jesus Christ, and for publishing an able and scientific but brief essay in natural history as to how opossums and kangaroos propagate. It was the undoubted intent of this zealous agent of the Young Men's Christian Association, who on other occasions we have styled the Matthew Hopkins of the nineteenth century, not only to send us to prison at hard labor for a term of years, but to take our property and to crush our business. But though an indictment was found against us, and everything looked favorable for our conviction and incarceration, a still, small voice came up from Washington, instructing the United States District Attorney in this city not to prosecute our case. At this Comstock was chagrined, and swore future vengeance against us. Whether he was the instigator of this Watkins movement or not we cannot say. It was reported to us that he had directed the movements and had given instructions that we be arrested. We cannot say that this was so, but these are the facts in the case: There is a Young Men's Christian Association in Watkins. Anthony is in direct communication with all organizations of the kind in the country, and it would be very easy for him, and in perfect keeping with his high Christian character, to give such instructions as would lead to our arrest. If it was not caused by him, it was by persons about his equal in meanness in persecuting and annoying. Watkins has shown that she has citizens within her bosom mean enough and vile enough to do almost any foul act.

What is the great offense of which we have been guilty? Did we murder, rob, or steal? Nothing of the kind. Did we interfere with the rights and prerogatives of any person? Not at all. We are charged with having sold one or more copies of "Cupid's Yokes." We may have done so, but we have no recollection of it if we did. But this we can state in truth. We had not a copy of it in Watkins of our own, nor did we have a copy on our table or among our books, nor did we make a cent of profit on any copies of the work sold by anybody. If we sold a copy at all, it was in this wise: Miss Tilton had some dozen kinds of pamphlets and three or four kinds of photographs on her table for sale, and among them was "Cupid's Yokes." When she was away, and we were near, if any person asked the price of any article on her table, or wished us to hand them a specimen, we, of course, complied, as almost any person would do. If they purchased, and handed us the money, we accepted it and handed it to the person who was keeping her money. We did not put a cent of it in our pocket. We may have made sales for Miss Tilton on three or four occasions, but not more. If we sold a copy of "Cupid's Yokes," we have no recollection of the circumstance. Now, is that a crime sufficient to arrest a man three hundred miles away from home, compel him to find bail, and to defend himself at a heavy expense and great personal inconvenience? When the fact is understood that thousands of as intelligent and moral persons as are to be found in this country will testify that there is not an obscene word in the pamphlet, and that it is not immoral or indecent, it will be seen that our crime was not very heinous, that we hardly deserve to be hung or otherwise executed, or even sent for many years to prison.

We have endeavored during the sixty years of life we have passed to commit no overt act, nor to do aught to injure any person, and we have aimed to be a law abiding citizen in the different localities where we have lived, and it does seem a little hard now in our old age to be sent to a felon's prison for handing to Warren Hurd, in place of a young lady who was temporarily absent, so harmless a pamphlet as "Cupid's Yokes." Really, are not the Christian people of Watkins in a terrible state for victims to persecute to thus seize upon our hapless head, and are not the taxpayers of Schuyler County very flush with money to pay it out freely for prosecuting such cases as these of "Cupid's Yokes?" If there is anything in the slightest degree improper in the work do they not know they took the very means to advertise it and bring it into demand? Where one hundred copies were sold before, a thousand will be demanded now. The demand shall be supplied.

MRS. AMY POST, OF ROCHESTER, N. Y.—We especially desire to express our gratitude to this lady for giving bail for W. S. Bell and ourselves. She remained nearly five days in Watkins for the purpose of going on our bond if necessary. She is seventy-five years of age, but is still brilliant and active. Our readers should have seen her climbing the rocks in the glens and passing over dangerous places where activity and strength are essential. We shall remember, to our dying day, the earnest remark she made: "I am proud to stand bail for the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER." We shall never cease to be grateful to her.

Which Is the Greater Criminal?

Mr. Warren Hurd, brother of Judge Oliver P. Hurd, swore before the Grand Jury of Schuyler county that we sold him a copy of "Cupid's Yokes." Possibly we did so; but we have no recollection of selling any person a copy of it on the 23d of August. If we did so, it was with the conviction that we had a perfect, legitimate right to do so, and that there was nothing in the pamphlet unfit for any person to buy or sell. We sold it honestly; but he bought it dishonestly, believing it to be a bad book, and for the purpose of getting a fellow-being into trouble. We sold it simply as a matter of accommodation to himself and Miss Tilton, and without making the hundredth part of a cent by the transaction. In this view of the case we ask again, Which is the greater criminal, Warren Hurd or D. M. Bennett?

The language of the indictment charges us with exhibiting and offering for sale to Warren Hurd (brother of the Judge) the awful pamphlet alluded to, and with devising, contriving, and intending to vitiate and corrupt the morals of the people of the State of New York. If he swore to anything of the kind he swore to a falsehood. We neither tried to vitiate or corrupt anybody's morals, nor did we exhibit or offer for sale "Cupid's Yokes." If we sold him a copy, he asked for it, and we handed it to him at his request, and not a cent of the money went into our pocket. Are we, then, guilty, and Warren Hurd (brother of Judge Hurd) perfectly innocent?

Cupid's Yokes.

We have hitherto sold but a very limited number of this now celebrated pamphlet. It does not present our views upon the subjects upon which it treats, but recognizing the right of every American citizen to express his views upon marriage and divorce as upon all other subjects and that every man has the right to buy or sell or read the same, we propose hereafter to sell the pamphlet to every person who wishes a copy of it. We will hand them to the purchaser or send them by mail or express as desired, Anthony Comstock, Frederick Davis, Warren Hurd, Oliver P. Hurd and all the citizens of Watkins and Schuyler County to the contrary notwithstanding. We do this by virtue of the rights of an American citizen. If we go to prison for it, to prison it is. For every one that falls for selling "Cupid's Yokes" ten will rise in his place to sell more. When all the prisons of the country are filled with persons who dare to sell "Cupid's Yokes" more can be built. We propose, for one, to fight the battle out on this line. Let those who wish copies of "Cupid's Yokes" send in the sum of fifteen cents and they shall be supplied.

Josephine S. Tilton.

We wish to pay a merited tribute to this worthy young lady who was endeavoring to make an honest livelihood for herself and her sister and children whose husband and father is serving out a term in a Massachusetts prison for sending a copy of his "Cupid's Yokes" through the mail. She is a young lady of excellent moral character who would not engage in any pursuit which she believes not right. She felt that as an American, a citizen of the freest nation in the world she had the right to offer for sale the pamphlets which her imprisoned brother had written in perfect honesty and sincerity. When an indictment for a criminal offense was found against her by twenty-four men who ought to have had more sense than to treat a worthy young lady in that manner, she felt that she had been greatly wronged. She was deeply conscious that she had a perfect right to sell the works and when arrested for it she made a matter of principle of it and resolved she would accept bail from no person, but that she would lie in prison till the day of her trial came.

She is of the very stuff of which martyrs are composed. She walked off to jail like one conscious of her integrity and injured rights. The last time we saw her she was inside the grates of Schuyler County Jail, but was cheerful and self-possessed. She barely weighs a hundred pounds, but she has a heart big enough for a man weighing three hundred pounds. We felt proud of such a compatriot in the toils of Christian persecution. We hope she may be duly honored for her bravery, and that the true Liberals of the country will not forget her in her lonely imprisonment. Letters and notes from friends will be acceptable to her and she will have ample time to reply. All honor to Josephine S. Tilton.

AS OUR enemies try to bring us into trouble, we hope our friends will continue to help us out. When Comstock arrested us ten months ago, we doubled the size of our paper, and now that we have again been arrested, we would be glad to double its circulation. Let all remember that we send it to new subscribers three months for fifty cents. A mistake was made two weeks ago—that the price for three months was twenty-five cents; it should have been fifty. Let every friend of the paper send in as many subscriptions as possible. Owing to our trial, and all connected with it, the next three months will be specially interesting. Those who purchase books of us will aid materially in helping us bear our burdens.

WE are acting as agents for the Holy Bible, abridged, containing not a word but what is in the Bible, but quite sufficient to show that it is an indecent book. 164 pages, 12 mo. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents. Orders promptly filled. It is a curiosity.

COMMITTEES of Liberal societies may address T. B. Taylor, M. D., for the present at Wilkesbarre, Pa., in reference to speaking before Liberal and Spiritualistic societies.

Selections.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

The argument drawn from the lilies and the birds is as unwise as it is pretentious. "Birds do not sow or reap or gather into barns." True; and therefore they perish in a hard winter. Civilized man lays up stores of food, and thereby generally escapes the worst horrors of famine. Rude men live by hunting and fishing, use up the fruits, roots, and game which they find ready to their hand, but make no effort to bring food into existence, whereby forethought is taken for time to come. Does Jesus recommend us to go back into savage unconcern for the future, and to trust that God will care for us, when we become imitators of lilies and birds? On birds the Creator has not bestowed our faculties of mind. Justly then he might feed them and leave us to starve, however much "better" he has made us; but, as we know, he constantly leaves them to starve. What can be more delusive than such argument? In fact, with the vast mass of mankind the danger is not in avarice. The danger is recklessness of the future; neglect to provide, while provision is possible; recklessness in spending and wasting while things are abundant. Before the general mass of any nation can be elevated morally, it must be delivered from depressing and debasing pauperism. This cannot be without men's own foresight and forethought. The precept to imitate thoughtless birds may cause a bad conscience to many worthy men. It is hard to see any good that it can do; for it cannot promote the real virtue—wise forethought and self-denial in aid of a discriminating generosity. A man without fortune who does not lay up for the morrow, lives on the edge of destitution and immeasurably increases the difficulty of maintaining manly conscientiousness; and unless shoveling away one's surplus money, day by day, to get rid of it, be called generosity, he seldom can be generous. Modern economists have so fully exploded the false virtue of systematic almsgiving, that it is high time to remonstrate against setting religion to support the error. To help men to help themselves is one thing; to help them to acquiesce in beggary is another. Arguments from lilies and birds, with a view to ascertain the duties of mankind, belong to the huge mass of sophism which an acute metaphysical theologian (my friend Dr. James Martineau) has wisely denounced as fatally tending to Atheism. "Never can you learn the qualities of the higher by studying the lower (is the substance of his apothegm); while this logic prevails, the Titans will vanquish the Gods." Plato (writing seriously) instructively displays its absurdity by making Socrates argue from our treatment of male and female hounds to the right mode of treating young men and women. Surely the whole doctrine concerning wealth and alms and prohibition to look forward and lay up, comes not from a divine teacher, but from an uneducated man of very narrow vision, prepossessed with the doctrines of the respectable Essene rustics.

Equally delusive, though in another way, is the precept, elaborately wrought out, "Ask and it shall be given you," etc. It is as unlimited as that other: "Give to him that asketh of you." To teach that God will give us whatever we ask, if we do but importune him enough, is doctrine eminently false; yet it is so reiterated in these books that simple innocent minds, which trustingly receive precepts, are apt to be deceived; more harm would be done were not most of us wiser herein than the teacher. That Jesus, with his noble disciple James, believed that prayer would bring or avert rain, can scarcely be doubted; hence prayers on such matters have been traditional in the Christian Churches. Elsewhere (Matt. xviii, 14--21) after Jesus has performed a miracle in which his disciples had failed, he attributes their failure to unbelief; and adds, that if they believe, they may say to a mountain, "Remove hence to yonder place," and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible to them. Mark (xi, 23) defines what is meant in this connection by faith: Whosoever shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed and be thou cast into the sea, and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith. Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them. This doctrine is represented as applicable and applied to the case of working physical miracles; hence if Jesus really spoke under wild metaphor only of conquests over inward passion and temptation, the narrative is a deceptive and very vile garbling. "John" consistently represents him as making a wholly unlimited promise: "Verily, Verily, I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he shall give it you." Surely any moderately wise teacher would see how pernicious it is to unite a highly dogmatic and sacred tone with hyperbolic, unmeasured, unconditional precepts and promises; which, unless severely pruned and chastised by cold criticism, are unsound and foolish.

The failure of the apostles to heal a sick child leads to the remark from Jesus (Matt. xvii. 21; so also in Mark), "Howbeit this kind (of demon) goeth not out save by prayer and fasting?" So fasting forsooth, is to help us to the miraculous cure of disease! What modern physician will doubt that the poor child who was a "lunatic and fell ofttimes into the fire, or into the water," was simply liable to fits? Epilepsy, catalepsy, mania, indeed all mental and nervous disorders, nay, and even dumbness or a humped back, were by the physical ignorance then prevalent, attributed to demons or to Satan, and were thought therefore to need a religious cure. We cannot blame such mistakes in inferior Jews, any more than in modern Abyssinians, but surely it is deplorable and highly reprehensible in the light of modern physical science to read out to a devout assembly as divine wisdom doctrine notoriously false and a fertile germ of folly.

Against the gratuitous and pernicious assumption that these books are inspired by divine wisdom, I insist that the preaching in the three gospels is prevalently an appeal to our prudence and our desire of external reward. This is not high, but low morality. We are to sham humility in order to get public promotion. We are to fear God, because he can cast us into hell. A stewart who cleverly defrauds his master is held up for our imitation by a parallel not edifying: namely, as he iniquitously used his master's money to buy for himself friends after his dismissal, so we are to use that which is essentially iniquitous, wealth—("the unrighteous mammon")—to buy for ourselves after our dismissal, heavenly "friends who will receive us into everlasting habitations." Wealth, though in itself evil, may be advantageously used to buy heavenly mansions and eternal life! (Luke xvi, 9; Matt. xix, 16, 21). To believe in Jesus and to follow him with sacrifice of estates, is a prudent investment for the other world. Whosoever will lose his life* for the sake of Jesus shall find it. What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own life? and what shall a man give in exchange for his life? Make no feast to your rich friends, lest they repay you: make a feast for the poor, who cannot repay you; and you will be repaid more amply in the other world than you could be by your rich friends here. The perpetual obtrusion of reward vitiates precepts otherwise good. Surely no further illustration is needed to what mean motives appeal is constantly made.

To return to Dives and Lazarus. No opinion is here expressed whether Jesus is the real author of that parable; though it is in harmony with his declaration that admission into "the kingdom of heaven" is all but impossible to a rich man—possible only by the exercise of God's omnipotence (Matt. xix, 26). But the doctrine of the parable is here impugned, whoever originated it. Never shall I believe that its author was a thoughtful moralist, large-minded, tender-hearted, or just. A rich man is described as dwelling in hell-fire for the crime of dressing handsomely and eating luxurious dinners. "He was clothed in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously every day." A poor man is carried to Abraham's bosom, because he was poor and miserable; no other merit is ascribed to him. The rich man, being tormented in flame, begs father Abraham to send Lazarus to dip his finger in water and cool the sufferer's tongue. To this piteous entreaty Abraham makes a heartless reply: "Son, remember that thou in thy life receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted and thou art tormented." Surely this is immoral, heart-hardening doctrine, which teaches the poor to think themselves virtuous for their poverty, and to think the rich wicked for having a wealthy exterior: thus it tends to that deadly social disease, exasperation of the poor against the richer. Abraham does not charge the rich man with getting his wealth by fraud or violence; indeed, he lays stress barely on the fact that he had his good things in this life, and matters ought to be balanced in the other. A completely selfish use of wealth is, no doubt, a grave vice, very despicable, very reprehensible, but many rich men, like princes, are so reared from the beginning, that, without any conscious selfishness, they live selfishly through mere routine, nay, and with tender hearts towards any misery which meets their eye. But, put the wickedness of wealthy selfishness as high as you choose, what an enormity to imagine an eminent saint looking down with comfortable satisfaction on a man tormented in flames, and talking with him not for his benefit, but so as to fill him with despair! Baxter has been severely censured for recounting in his "Saints' Rest" the sight of the damned as a stern enjoyment to the blessed. May he not have borrowed his doctrine from this execrable coolness of Abraham?

It is not asserted in this parable that the torture is everlasting; but a great impassable gulf is said to be fixed between the damned and the blessed; actual flames are described, and total unconcern of the saints implied. Chiefly, almost solely, from the mouth of Jesus these horrors of hell torment are reported; and they make the three gospels an education of heartlessness in spite of all that is elsewhere tender and true. The Pharisees did not believe in hell, but taught that death expiated sin. Neither the low morality and overstrained precepts prevalent in these gospels, nor the cruel imagery of hell-fire prison, can be charged on Paul's epistles. He breathed a higher, more generous and juster atmosphere, "largior æther." His morality is not sweeping and stern, but discriminating and tender. He believes in the violent destruction of wickedness, but he has no images of torture, nor a word to suggest it. After a stern proclamation of the severity of God against wickedness, he proceeds to announce what appears to be universal salvation alike to sinful Jews and to sinful Gentiles, teaching that the fall of the Jews was permitted and overruled for salvation to the Gentiles. "As ye [Gentiles] in times past have not believed God, but have now obtained mercy through their [Jewish] unbelief; even so have these not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out. For who hath known the mind of the Lord [Jehovah, Isaiah xl, 13] or who hath been his counselor? Or who hath first given to him, so as to receive recompense? For of him, and through him, and to him are all things" (Rom. xi, 30).

General Sherman and his Family.

The number of families that have been set at enmity by the spies of the Jesuits working upon some member would be impossible to estimate, but it is immense. The latest case of prominence in this country is that of General Sherman and his family. We may not agree with the General in everything, but no one but a Jesuit can fail to sympathize with him in his bereavement through the dastardly machinations of the Catholic priesthood. The following is from the correspondence of the Chicago Inter-Ocean:

WASHINGTON, Aug. 14, 1878.

Gen. Sherman has not gone out into New Mexico, with the border troubles on his mind, but has sought novelty and the excitement of traveling as a distraction. Within the last six months Gen. Sherman has grown old very fast. The attempt to reduce the army wore upon him more than one would suppose it would, but the crushing weight was the departure of his favorite son for a European monastery. Most people do not know that the General is as much a foe to Catholicism as his wife is a friend, and the reason that he lives apart from his family—he in Washington and they in St. Louis—is that he will not tolerate the presence of a priest under the same roof with him.

Mrs. Sherman is the most ardent and active lay worker that the pope has in America; she stands high in the counsels of the Church, both at home and abroad; and her name is as familiar in Rome as the name of St. Agatha, although she was never there in her life. She is the trustee in this country of "Peter's pence"—the offerings of devout Catholics to the pope's private treasury—and shortly before he died, on the occasion of the anniversary of his pontificate, the late Pius IX. sent her a rosary of solid gold, with a fragment of "the true cross," set in the crucifix as a gem. Her house in St. Louis is the home and headquarters of all the migatory priests of America. She is admitted to all the confidences of the Church, and bishops and archbishops go to her for advice.

On the contrary, Gen. Sherman hates a priest with a profound hatred; he despises their methods, and curses their class as the destroyers of his home; but Mrs. Sherman way a Catholic before he married her—the Ewings are all Cath. olics—and while his married life has always been a happe one, he has never been able to abide with a priest, and Mrs. Sherman has never been able to abide without one.

Thomas Ewing Sherman, the oldest son, was intended by the General for the Bar, and he was educated at Georgetown College, a Catholic institution, chosen by Mrs. Sherman, and afterwards at the Yale Law School, an institution chosen by his father. After he graduated at Yale he went to his mother's house in St. Louis, and entered the law office of Hon. Samuel Reber. The second son Gen. Sherman wants to make a soldier of, and the boy, now at the age of fourteen years, is well read in the whole library of military history, and can describe in detail all the military operations of the war. There are but two sons, and Mrs. Sherman had fixed her mother's heart on having one of them for the Church. To any suggestion of this he would not listen, and she knew him well enough to realize that an argument on the subject would do no good. But while the eldest son has had his eyes on his law-books his mother has been inspiring in him an ambition to distinguish himself in the priesthood, and not until his conviction was formed and his plans decided upon did his father have the slightest suspicion of a change of intentions. When the decision was announced to him, Gen. Sherman is said to have groaned with sorrow, and he has not since seen his wife or son.

Before leaving for the monastery in Europe, young Sherman wrote a letter to his law preceptor, in which he said:

"My father, as you know, is not a Catholic, and therefore the step I am taking seems as startling and as strange to him as I have no doubt it does to you, my dear sir. I go without his approval, sanction, or consent; in fact, in direct opposition to his best wishes in my behalf. In conclusion, my dear sir, I have one request to make, and I make it not only to you but to all our friends and relations to whom you may see fit to show this letter or communicate its contents; it is this: Feeling painfully aware that I have grieved my father, I beg my friends and his, one and all, of whatever religion they may be, to spare him inquiries or comments of any sort, for I cannot help feeling that anything of the kind would be ill-timed and inappropriate."

I have seen in the newspapers a story that young Sherman's determination to go into a monastery was because of the marriage of his cousin, Miss Lizzie, to Senator Cameron. All the family pronounce this absurd, and say that the cousins had almost been strangers to each other. This would be very romantic, and the Washington gossips have accepted it as true, because perhaps they have a precedent in the case of a daughter of Gen. Scott who became a nun, and, it is said, is now an inmate of a convent in Washington, because her father prevented her marriage with a worthless but titled foreigner, who chewed his whiskers around one of the legations here. Young Sherman's choice was made under his mother's influence, after she had taught him to share her infatuation for the Catholic Church.

Money! Money!

"Now where is your deep water, Mr. Jones," triumphantly exclaims S. Marshall. Don't holler before you get out of the woods. With such diversity of opinions and practice on the subject for the last thousand years or two, I should say "deep water" is plentiful. Too much floundering for the stream to be shallow. We may all cross at Marshall's ford, but he must demonstrate that there are no snags, whirlpools, quicksands, or deep holes.

I will give my objections to Mr. Marshall's system of finance.

1. He has nothing to tell what a dollar is. His dollar has neither depth, height, length, or thickness. It cannot be measured by the square, scales, time, or liquid measure. In fact, it is nothing. But an imaginary value will be given it by custom. Its value will depend upon the volume of currency. Mr. Truesdell would have so many ounces of gold or silver to represent it. But that is open to the same objections. The value of the dollar will fluctuate in proportion to the amount of gold and silver in circulation. I mean its purchasing power will fluctuate. Now it seems to me a dollar represented by so many hours' labor, would not be open to this objection. Its purchasing power would vary, it is true, not on account of volume of currency, but demand and supply of produce alone. Labor is the only true measure of value. Labor tells us the cost of products; labor determines their exchangeable values, and labor should represent the representative of property—the dollar. I agree with Mr. M. when he says money should be made of cheap material and exchangeable for its face value in any kind of labor or property.

Aside from inconvenience, there would be just as much sense, justice, and stability in stamping a bushel of wheat (quality considered) and calling it a dollar as so many ounces of silver or gold.

2. He would have money based on government, and pay off government bonds with it direct from government.

He makes no provision for the masses. Only says for government to issue it. So the bondholder and those drawing pay from government would be the only ones benefited by his money direct. Money based on government, makes the money-holder (whose influence is most potent) interested in strongly supporting his government, though it be as despotic as Russia or as corrupt as Spain or Mexico. Money based on individual security, government only furnishing a universal stamp, regulating the issue and making it a legal tender, gives strong probabilities that with the destruction of government, money would be good when a new government went into operation. All the government would have to do to get money would be to tax the people. And that is the only way government should ever get money.

I would have the volume of currency limited only by demand, and good security. Then it would always command some interest and the people would be willing to exchange produce for it. With government to issue money ad libitum, there is such temptation to corruption and extravagance that there is danger of too much redundancy of currency, and although it may be a legal tender for all debts, the people will quit crediting and receiving it for produce and return to barter, or every body will be buyers and there will be few producers; consequently produce will rise in price in proportion to lack of production. And lack of production would be in proportion to over issue.

I would have the currency redeemable, at least, to the government. This to provide against waste of security. No one should be allowed to keep money in circulation when its security is in danger or has depreciated below value of currency issued upon it.

If the Southern Confederacy, "so called," had issued this kind of money and paid as she went, it would have greatly prolonged the war, if not secured her independence.

If the North had done so, it would have economized expenses, and the burden of the expense being felt by the people as the war progressed (instead of now and years to come); she might have halted in her mad career to crush out self-government.

I will give my objections to Mr. Truesdell's currency (gold and silver).

1. It costs government too much to get it.
2. It stimulates an increase of non-producers of the essentials of life.
3. It gives the gold digger a premium over the potato digger—the most useful of the two.
4. It is too scarce.
5. It is inconvenient to handle.
6. It wears out, becomes below full weight, and is hard to replace.
7. It is easily counterfeited (I mean the stamp), which compels the government to keep the price of bullion sufficiently near the value of coined money to avoid that.
8. It is the relic of a barbarous age kept up in a professed enlightened one.

Of course if the Southern Confederacy had issued gold and silver in like weight to the rest of the world, it would have been as good as the rest of the world's now. And had her "graybacks" been an individual affair, similar to a mortgage, they would have been equal to "greenbacks" now.

Mr. Truesdell's "greenbacks" are now on a par with your money and not based on it either. "How is that for high?"

If I wanted to borrow money or buy goods, they would cost twenty-five per cent, with ever so good security here. Now if I could issue my own "greenbacks," and buy for cash, would I not be nearly twenty-five per cent better off? I write this to elicit discussion. I by no means think I have mastered the financial problem. I give my present views. Who endorses me? "What is Money?"

Mr. Truesdell, is not the object of money to facilitate exchange of products—to avoid barter? Was not that necessity the origin of money? A, B, and C have produce to spare; each wants something the rest have. But in attempting to exchange, A's wagon exceeds his wants of what the others have to spare. Now, if A sells his wagon and gets what he wants, he must either take a great deal that he don't need, a "promise to pay" in something he does or will need, or keep his wagon and do without what B and C have that he needs. He declines the "promise to pay," without the power to enforce its fulfillment. Now in a barbarous age when there was no stability in governments, no printing presses, the people naturally adopted the plan of using property as a kind of money—property that is easily handled, easily kept, and most consistent in value.

Gold and silver was found to be the best suited for the purpose. So A (in the illustration) tells B or C that he wants none of their promises to pay in "his'n," but intimates that he would take some flour and bacon, and the balance in so many pounds of silver. B agrees to the trade and goes around amongst his neighbors and barters for the silver. A gets it and feels happy. He resolves to lay it up for a rainy day, and barter his perishable stuff to satisfy his needs.

In a few years A needs a wagon himself (the reader must draw on his imagination as to the quality of the "wagons" in those days), but when he prices one he finds his money and the other produce he got for his will not buy a similar wagon by ten bushels of wheat. To account for it he is told by some, produce is cheaper, by others, wagons have "riz," but A knows better.

Wagons and produce are more plentiful but worth more in silver. "The fact is," says A, "that blasted silver has done the business." The new silver mines had made silver cheap. A resolves to lay up no more silver. But in a few years the government "fixed" the value of gold and silver, saying so many ounces make a "dollar." Just what a "dollar" was no feller could find out, only it was so many ounces of gold and silver. The exchangeable value of the dollar was determined by the market value of bullion. Now, A thought he would have a good thing of it. He could afford to lay up gold and silver as its value was "fixed" by the government. So he accumulated all he could and laid it up. After a while he wanted a new wagon. He found a man that gave him nearly as much silver for his old one as he had to give for it. He rejoiced in his good luck. He had made one good trade he thought. He went over to a wagon shop and priced a new wagon. By calculating the amount of bullion and other produce the price of the wagon in dollars would buy, A found that something had "fell or riz." He was non plussed; wagons and the other products were more plentiful than ever, and as for silver the price of that was "fixed" and couldn't change. He shut one eye and thought awhile. At last it flashed upon him that the size or weight of the gold or silver dollar could be fixed, but its value never.

Now, Mr. T., is not A's experience the history of gold and silver currency? Have they both not been demonetized on account of sudden increase? Why intrinsic value? Does the traveler demand or expect a check for his baggage of equal intrinsic value to his baggage? Are not government and real estate security better than any railroad corporation?

As the object of money is to facilitate exchange of produce, why will not some cheap devise, secured by real estate and government answer. Does not such security give it all the intrinsic value necessary. But money without something to measure a dollar by would be a ship without a rudder, chart, pilot or compass. To measure it by property subjects it to fluctuations in purchasing power independent of supply of the thing purchased.

Now, it seems to me the only just way of defining it, is by letting so many hours labor represent a dollar. Labor is the basis of all property; the measure of all exchange value. Why not let it measure the exchange value of the "almighty dollar." Is it not the natural basis of money. Would it not demonetize gold and silver and give stability to currency. No paper money will ever prosper until gold and silver are demonetized. It will partake of their defects. The world will worship the golden calf until the gold dollar is demonetized and the labor dollar replaces it.

Who are in favor of the labor dollar and people's currency.

O. Jones.

Mineral Springs, Ark.

A cable dispatch from Rome gives the particulars of a conflict near Leghorn of a fanatical sect, led by one called "David the Saint," with the civil authorities, resulting in the death of David, who represented himself as Christ come again. He had chosen twelve apostles, and drawn some 2,000 or 3,000 people together, who were well armed. On the morning of the 18th he started out, followed by his adherents, with what intention is not known. When met by the police and ordered to disperse, "David the Saint" commanded his followers to strike. After a second warning, the police opened fire, killing the leader instantly, when the rest dispersed.

The Money Quesion Again.

As several readers of The Truth Seeker have requested a fuller elucidation of some points touched upon in my previous article on the financial problem, and others desire a further exposition of my views upon the question, I have concluded to pen another brief article upon this all-important subject. A correspondent wants to know how it is that the banks could not if they would, and would not if they could, furnish a sufficient amount of money to carry on all the business of the country with life and vigor. This matter is easily explained. It is well known that the National Bank law restricts the banks in their issue of currency to ninety per cent of their bonds, and the amount of bonds held by the banks has never much exceeded $600,000,000. Ninety per cent of this sum would be $540,000,000—all they could issue on their $600,000,000 of bond, and this is not more than one-fourth of the currency now required to revive the business of the nation. But at the present time they only hold about one-half of this amount of bonds, something over $300,000,000. This reduces the currency of the country which they control to $270,000,000, which is about one-seventh of the amount in circulation.

Twelve years ago, when we enjoyed the highest prosperity ever realized in the history of this country, and not less than this sum is now needed to arrest us in our downfall course to financial ruin. It is evident, therefore, from these facts that the banks could not if they would furnish one-fourth of the money or currency necessary to revive the business of the country and supply all the channels of trade.

On the other hand, they would not if they could put the amount of money in circulation necessary to run all kinds of business with life and vigor. Because the experience of the past proves that if the banks were to place such a large amount of money in the hands of the people, it would destroy the profits of their own business. The people would then have money of their own, and consequently would not be compelled to go to the banks to borrow and pay their high rates of interest. It would also reduce the rates of interest to low figures. The financial operations of the nation during the war fully corroborate and demonstrate the truth of these statements, as I am able to prove by the highest authority. Hugh McCullough, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of the greatest inflation of the currency, when about two billions were in circulation, declared that it placed plenty of money in the hands of the people, which enabled nearly everybody to get out of debt, and that it checked the business of loaning by the banks and capitalists and reduced the rate of interest from ten to three per cent.

Such are the beneficial results to the community at large of "inflating the currency," and such practical benefits have always been the legitimate fruits of the expansion of the currency in all countries where it has been tried. I have found no case in the history of any nation where the "inflation of the currency" operated to the injury of the people, though it is generally a detriment to the grasping cupidity of money-loaners, as it should be, and this is the only class of intelligent people who oppose it, if we include those who have been deceived and misled by their false arguments. The money-lenders and avaricious monopolists have invented many false theories to hoodwink and blind the people, such as "over-production," or "inflation," being the cause of our present financial embarrassment, gold being "a standard for values," the necessity for "a metallic basis for our paper currency," and the necessity of having "a redeemable paper currency," and also the necessity of money possessing "an intrinsic value," and the assumption that "gold is the money of the world," etc.

All these theories and assumptions are false and untenable. They will none of them bear a moment's investigation in the light of history. O. Jones asks, "How would we know the value of a "fiat" dollar if it was not for the known value of the gold and silver dollar?" Will friend Jones please tell us what the known value of the gold and silver dollar is? or will he point to any two nations in the world where they are of the same value? or will he please name any commodity ever offered in the market that is more changeable in value than gold and silver, and more especially the former? Gold is not used as money in India or China, and cannot be passed as money in either of those countries, and many nations have used neither gold nor silver for money. Lycurgus, the Spartan law-giver, used iron for money instead of gold and silver; and if it were necessary to have a standard for regulating the value of other kinds of money, iron would answer a much better purpose than either gold or silver, as it is not so fluctuating in value. Gold has been known to vary in value 1000 per cent in seven years, and 100 per cent in twenty-four hours. In Philadelphia during the war it rose 50 per cent one day and fell 40 the next. What would be thought of a clock as a standard time piece should it be fifty minutes too fast one day and forty minutes too slow the next? A down-east chap was asked, "What is a thermometer?" He replied: "A thermometer is a machine for regulating the weather." Gold and silver regulates values exactly as the thermometer regulates the weather. All are up one day and down the next. It would be as easy to regulate the weather as to regulate the value of gold and silver money while gold and silver are in demand for other purposes. "The known value of the gold and silver dollar" varies in every nation, and varies every day in our own nation. They change so often in value that no other kind of money and no commodity in the market can keep up with their changes. They cannot constitute a standard for anything.

In my previous article the type-setter changed one or two of my words so as to obscure the sense (doubtless owing to my imperfect chirography). He makes me say, "An unusual demand for hard money will draw the gold and silver out of the hands of the veteran." It should be "artesan" [artisan?] instead of "veteran." Other mistakes are observable, which I will not correct.

LETTERS OF REGRET ADDRESSED TO THE SECRETARY OF THE CONVENTION.

34 Dey St., N. Y., Aug. 23, 1878.

H. L. Green, Esq., Dear Sir: It is with great regret that I give up my plan of going to greet you and the host of Freethought veterans you have called to that delightful spot, Watkins. My chief clerk prolonged his vacation unexpectedly, and makes it imperative that I stay here. I may congratulate you and the meeting that I am not needed at Watkins in any capacity save as a spectator, and doubtless you have enough of them also. It is a great privation that I cannot be there to listen to the entertaining and instructive words of eloquence as they fall from the lips of such staunch old soldiers as Seaver, Mendum, Bennett, Henderson, Colby, and others. I am nothing if not critical you know, and I may say here that I have been reading very recently a copy of the proceedings at the great Faneuil Hall meeting, which met to consider Heywood's case, containing one remarkable speech and one remarkable letter, the former that of Thaddeus B. Wakeman, and the latter by Theron C. Leland.

I have also recently read the noble address of the former before the last meeting of the Free Religious Association, and as I read those speeches and letters I said to myself as I now say to you, that here, if never before, the Freethought party have leaders worthy of them, with the sagacity and the strength of character to combine the forces of Freethought in one grand power and throw it into the scale in favor of justice, freedom, and universal progress. I congratulate your meeting that these men are with you. I trust that you will not part without some practical outcome to all your deliberations and some arrangement for another camp-meeting another year, when I may meet and take by the hand hundreds and thousands of those who are with you to-day. In great haste, yours fraternally,

Asa K. Butts.

Buffalo, N. Y., Aug. 21, 1878.

H. L. Green, Esq.: I hear the Liberal convention will be opened to-morrow, and I cannot be present. I then wish to receive the printed speeches, for I see in The Truth Seeker that they will be given in print. I make so free as to call on your honor to be so kind and send me one copy and also one to Mr. L. Kingma, corner Clinton and Cedar streets, Buffalo. Please send postal card before to tell me what the price will be, and then we will send the cash for it.

Yours respectfully, Geo. Smith.

8 Portland St., Boston, Mass., Aug. 19, 1878.

Mr. H. L. Green, Dear Sir: I told you once that if I could do anything to add to the attractiveness and success of your convention, you had only to command me and I should be with you and at your service. But your enthusiasm has infected so many, and so many silver tongues withal, has drawn such a splendid host of thinkers and speakers together that I am sure I could but occupy time and space that could be better filled by others, and hence I think I can serve you best by remaining at home. But my soul gives three cheers for the success of your convention. You have my sincere wishes for its completeness in every good thing. Out of the feast of reason before you I trust that hungry humanity shall be enabled to obtain one good square meal of common sense, and that the old sawdust pudding of theology may be thrown to the dogs for physic.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully yours,

Charles Ellis.

Vincennes, Ind., August 20, 1878.

H. L. Green, Esq., Dear Sir: We have observed the card of W. E. Copeland, as published in the T. S., and presuming that after the expiration of his proposed two months' stay in the East, he will probably return to Lincoln, Neb., and that this point would not be out of his way; we desire to know when and at what price he can favor us with a lecture. We wish to be economical, and therefore seek to take advantage of the travels of speakers.

Very respectfully yours, O. F. Baker,
Secretary Vincennes Liberal League.

On board Steamship Great Republic, Off Astoria, Oregon, August 10, 1878.

H. L. Green, Dear Sir: I regret very much that business engagements will prevent me from being present at the Watkins Glen meeting. I intended being present but was called to the Pacific coast on business. I am now on my way east, but will probably be detained on the way so that I cannot be with you. Although absent in body I am present in spirit, and if "spiritual" comfort can do you any good you have my hearty co-operation. I know I shall miss a "feast of reason and flow of soul," for the Watkins meeting will be composed of a phalanx of the grandest spirits that tread this planet. I hope however, to be present at the next meeting of the National Liberal League in October, wherever it may be held. I provided myself with a good supply of extra copies of The Index, Truth Seekers, tracts, etc., when I left home, and distributed them freely in the cars, hotels, ticket offices, etc., etc.

I find a great many Liberals in the West, but they do not seem to appreciate the necessity of organization. When I explain the aims and objects of the National Reform Association, they generally reply, "They shall never do that," but at the same time do not seem to appreciate the necessity of preventing them from "doing that."

Had not the nature of my business prevented, I should have stopped at several cities, lectured, and attempted to establish Leagues, but as my time was not my own, I could not do so. (I went to Oregon to arrest a criminal, and having done so I am now on my return trip.) If official business does not prevent, I may still be at Watkins but if not, greet the brethren in my name.

Go on, brother Green, you are doing a noble work. May leagues increase, light be diffused, knowledge spread, ignorance be dispelled, prejudice uprooted, bigotry disarmed, and universal love and fraternity rule supreme throughout the land. Yours for the true, beautiful, and good,

Harry Hoover.

Boston, July 12, 1878.

H. L. Green, Esq., Cor. Sec'y: Your cordial request that I join in attendance at the forthcoming Convention of Freethinkers, to be held at Watkins, N. Y., next August, is before me, and I highly appreciate the feeling that prompted it, which is evidently none other than that spirit of harmonious unity so necessary at all times for the success of any effort toward the advancement or defense of the national right to freedom of thought, liberty of speech, and the possession of an untrammeled press.

Business engagements will prevent my attending the Convention of which you speak, but I return my sincere thanks to you and to the body you represent, for the invitation to make one of your number, so kindly extended; and in default of my bodily presence, permit me to forward you the inclosed sum as an earnest of my warm interest in the objects for the discussion of the best means of promoting which the Convention is to assemble.

Fraternally yours, Luther Colby.

Milwaukee, Wis., Aug. 20, 1878.

Mr. H. L. Green, Dear Sir: Referring to your address directed to the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, convened at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 29, 1877, we wish again to turn the attention of the Liberals who assemble in Watkins, N. Y., to the principles and demands of the "North American Union of Radicals," believing them to be of the greatest importance for the development of Freethought and liberty. We request you to be so kind as to distribute the pamphlets (copies of our platform and of a paper read by Mr. Doerflinger) which we send you with this letter, to the partakers in the Watkins Convention and to bring the questions treated of in these pamphlets to public discussion.

Being of the opinion that developments growing out of our partially undemocratic institutions are threatening our republic with dangers as great and as imminent as those arising from the bigotry of zealots, we hope that the National Liberal League will continue the work of expansion commenced at the Rochester Convention, by taking into the scope of its noble work the removal of all the barriers still obstructing the road to true equality and the true self-government of a self-acting people, who are now sovereign only at the moment of casting the ballot and at all other times the powerless servants of their so-called representatives.

We greet your convention as an important means for the progress of general liberty and as a meeting of fellow thinkers with whom we are joined by the feeling of the most friendly sympathies.

Wishing the Convention good success and much glory, we are the Executive Committee of the N. A. Union of Radicals.

C. H. Boppe, Secretary.

Poplar, Ohio, Aug. 22, 1878.

Brother Green, Dear Sir: This pleasant Thursday morning I am at home sitting under my own grape vine with my old woman, and all the priests, pagans, cannibals, hypocrites, devils, hells, and godly Comstocks in this Christian land have not the power to make me afraid. Though I cannot be with you in person at your Convention, yet in spirit and mentally I am one among you, and nothing but funds—in want thereof—keeps me at home, and a greater cross I never suffered. I am in good health, all except my lower limbs. I can travel on the railroads in comfort, and am and have been engaged for a few weeks in getting Bennett's books and scattering the gospel of genuine salvation among the blind, ignorant, superstitious and "reverend" pagans of this mental wilderness.

On a steamboat on Lake Erie last week I was threatened with arrest by the Captain of the boat for selling Paine's "Age of Reason." But the ignorant hooting owl did not frighten me. My God! what godliness there is yet in the land!

There will be a man in the Convention from Wyandotte county, Ohio—ten miles from me—by the name of Dr. E. Moyer, whom I hope you will get acquainted with. He is a brave soldier in our army, and he and Bro. Bennett are, I think, acquainted. I know you are full of business, and will not trouble you with a lengthy epistle, but want to make a suggestion:

Almost every society, league, and convention in the land have, possess, and wear some badge or emblem as a sign of their order, by which they are known to strangers, friends, and brothers. Even the editors and publishers of newspapers in Ohio wear each a badge, and thus strangers can meet in their travels, in hotels, steamboats, and on trains, social and friendly. Now, thinks I to myself, I am sure no greater field is open in the land for an increase of fraternal feeling than that every free-thinking Liberal, every man and woman in the country who is not content to eat "skim milk on earth for the sake of getting butter in the skies," would put on a delicate little signal of their liberty and freedom and wear it always when among strangers. I am acquainted with Dr. Monroe by reputation, but we might travel on a train a thousand miles and remain strangers. Now, my dear sir, I wish a committee could be appointed to select some modest little sign by which all Liberals may become known to each other in traveling on the highways of our free Zion. Narrow tricolored silk ribbon, in the form of a rose, with a pearl button in the center, worn by all the friends of progress and humanity, would not only be an ornament and jewel, but would also be a magnet of glory all over our wide-extended land of agitated humanity. Only a suggestion. What do you think of it? If I have any friends in the Convention, I love them, but I hate my enemies. Fraternally thine, D. Tuttle.

Albany, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1878.

H. L. Green, Esq., Dear Sir: Mr. Jos. McDonough, the bearer of this note, is the President of our Association. He has been appointed as our representative at the Watkins Convention, and I am proud to have the pleasure of introducing him to you.

I am really sorry for not being able to attend the Convention, particularly as I am so anxious to see you. However, I trust I shall have that pleasure yet.

Mr. McDonough will give you every information in relation to our struggles, etc., in the cause, and also why it is that I am unable to attend. Yours most truly,

Thomas Dugan.

Chester Co., Pa., Aug. 19, 1878.

H. L. Green, Dear Sir: If it were possible, I would be gratified to throw my weight, physically, into the Watkins Convention. But as that is not possible, permit a Liberal and Spiritualist to record his testimony in favor of free thought, free speech and a free Constitution, or such a construction of our good old Constitution as will not allow any sect, party, or denomination any preferences above others. Of all the questions that can agitate your august assembly, I feel that the "God in the Constitution" is paramount to any other. Have not the Evangelical Alliances and the Y. M. C. A.'s declared that they will not leave a stone unturned until this Government is placed on a Christian basis? That is, recognize the Bible as the supreme law of the land, and Jesus Christ the ruler of the nation. Jesus having failed to rule a nation while living, now that he is dead the priesthood would incur the possibility of deluging the country with innocent blood to give him a kingdom on earth. But the clergy is the recognized mouthpiece of the Christian God; hence it is the clearest presumption that all efforts to Christianize the Constitution will result whether intended or not in placing the American clergy at the head of the Government. Under such conditions, no Liberal could possibly live without sacrificing his dignity and manhood. It would be a plunge into the dark days of the 15th and 16th centuries, when Europe, under priestly monarchies, labored to stamp out the Liberals and the promoters of science by the free use of the fagot, rack, and the dungeon.

Respectfully, W. I. Harvey.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

MONEY REQUIRED TO PAY THE EXPENSES.

The expenses of the Watkins Convention were four hundred and fifty dollars, of which two hundred and forty-two dollars and fifty-one cents have been paid, leaving unpaid the sum of two hundred and seven dollars and forty-nine cents.

I urgently request every Liberal who reads this announcement to at once forward me any amount he or she may choose to assist me in paying the unpaid expenses above mentioned. If more than $207.49 shall be paid in I will put the balance into the hands of the Treasurer of the New York Freethinkers' Association.

Every contributor will please name the Liberal paper he or she may desire to have their contribution acknowledged in. H. L. Green.

Salamanca, N. Y., Aug 29, 1878. Cor. Sec. N. Y. F. A.

P. S.—As a Committee of Arrangements has been appointed for the next annual convention I hope the arrangements will be much better than I was able to make them this year.

[In behalf of Mr. Green we would say he worked arduously and faithfully to get up and arrange for the Watkins Convention and is deserving of much credit. The same may also be said of Mr. Gardner C. Hebberd of Watkins, who worked faithfully in aiding Mr. Green. These gentlemen contracted more indebtedness than the money received could possibly meet. Generous hearted Liberals will act a noble part in assisting in removing the indebtedness. We hope prompt action will be taken.—Ed. T. S.]

NEW YORK STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION.

WORK TO BE DONE.

At the Watkins Convention the Freethinkers' Association of Central and Western New York was extended over the whole State, and the name changed to "The New York State Freethinkers' Association." The Convention authorized me to appoint Vice-Presidents for the counties where none have already been appointed, and to fill vacancies where there are resignations. I therefore desire the friends in the counties where no Vice-President has been appointed to send me the name of the most earnest, active Liberal to be found, and I will appoint him. Then I request each Vice-President already appointed, who for any reason is not prepared to go to work at once for our cause, to send in his resignation, that I may appoint a working man in his place.

By our articles of association it is the duty of each Vice-President to appoint two other Liberals of his county to act with him, the three to constitute a Freethought County Committee; and I desire that to be done immediately, where it has not already been done.

I am resolved that during the next year there shall be some good work done for our cause in the State of New York—more than has ever been done before in any State of the Union.

Friends of Freethought of the State of New York, is it too much to ask of you that during the year we shall have one large meeting in every county of the State? That must be done, and I hope in many counties many more than one meeting.

But the very first thing to do is to get an active, energetic county committee appointed, as above stated; and the first work of that committee should be to increase the circulation of the Liberal papers. You will find that few Liberals will do much for our cause who are not inspired by reading the Liberal papers.

As to membership, we now have but two hundred and nineteen members. We should increase that number to one thousand before the expiration of sixty days. The membership fee is but twenty-five cents, and any one can become a member by paying that amount, and sending me his or her name, wherever he or she may reside.

I have just written to Dr. Bennett to prepare some pretty certificates of membership, large enough to be framed, one of which I will send to each of the present members, so soon as they are printed, and to new members so soon as I receive their names. So you will get a fine certificate of membership of the New York Freethinkers' Association for the small sum of twenty-five cents, and put your name where it will tell in behalf of our principles, and the small membership fee will help on the cause. Reader, send in your name and get all your Liberal friends to send in theirs.

And I request Freethinkers everywhere to write me the state of our cause in their vicinity and give me such advice as shall suggest itself to them. Let us all now go to work in good earnest for the next year and bring into our ranks all schools of Freethinkers, and make the Freethinkers Association of the "Empire State" the "empire" Freethought Association of the world. H. L. Green, Corresponding Sec'y.

P. S.—Liberal papers are requested to copy this communication from The Truth Seeker, and save me the trouble of sending a copy to each. And I desire also to request friends writing to me to inclose a postage stamp if they desire a reply. H. L. G.

Not Papias, nor Pappius, but John Pappus.

The following statement, from "The World's Sages," needs correction:

"Papias, the Christian Father, informs us as to the manner of that selection [of the sacred books] at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, in the following words: 'This was done by placing all the books under a communion table, and upon the prayers of the Council the inspired books jumped upon the table, while the false ones remained under.'"

This is borrowed from the "Inquirer's Text-Book," where the name is not Papias (who died at least 150 years before the Council of Nice), but Pappius. But the Author of the "Text-Book" borrowed his statement from Taylor's "Diegesis" (p. 432), where the name is not Pappius, but Pappus. Now Pappus is the right name, but he made no such statement about the Council of Nice. John Pappus was a German theologian, born 1549, died 1610, who found an anonymous Greek manuscript of the 9th century, from which he extracted the following:

"The Council made manifest the canonical and the apocryphal books in the following manner: Laying them down by the side of the divine table in the house of God, they prayed, beseeching the Lord that the divinely-inspired books might be found on the table and the spurious underneath, and this took place" (Fabricius Bib. Gr. vol. ix, p. 198). W. H. B.

Letters from Friends.

233 Second St., Memphis, Tenn., Aug. 27, 1878.

Mr. D. M. Bennett: Yellow fever is here with all the tale of horror that word can express. Every Christian organization is making appeals to the North for relief—all societies, secret or otherwise. Can you not ask, through your paper, for the Liberals throughout the country to do the same? There are many Liberal families here in a suffering condition, with their sick and dead, who are unable to assist themselves in any way. Any contributions sent to me, I will see that it is given where it most is needed to relieve destitution. Cordially yours,

Mary J. Holmes.

[This is a very sensible and timely suggestion. We hope all Liberals who feel able will send funds to this good sister for the relief of our suffering friends in the South. We guarantee that every dollar consigned to Mrs. Holmes will be judiciously and honestly used.—Ed. T. S.]

West Hanover, Mass., Aug. 25, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I believe you are doing a great work. I hope you will succeed in having the Comstock law repealed or modified, but I believe in repeal. It is not safe to put power in the hands of such men we find everywhere. My next-door neighbor says I ought to be shut up for wearing the reform dress; another says I ought to be shut up for advocating some kind of social reform, so you see it is dangerous to reformers to put power in the hands of men.

Yours for truth and progress, Mary A. Peterson.

Providence, R. I., August 30, 1878.

Mr. Bennett, Dear Sir: We are very sorry to hear of your arrest. I hope you will come out as victorious as before. We enjoy the perusal of your paper exceedingly. Your blows at Comstock, and your strokes against old theology are extremely interesting. We hope that prison walls cannot hold you, and would be glad to add to your defense fund, but fortune has used us mercilessly, and all we can get must go to pay our creditors. Once we had quite a little property but we have been defrauded until it is gone. Yours for the truth, E. W. Kenyon.

Oakville, Pa., Aug. 30, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I pledge my name for $5 to the Defense Fund for yourself, Mr. Bell, and Miss Tilton.

Yours in sympathy, Israel Betz.

Spring Dale, Iowa, Aug. 25, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Having never seen anything in your paper from this place, I venture to write.

We Liberals are greatly in the minority here. Methodists and Quakers are thick, so you see that we are sneered at and misused by those "meek and lowly followers of the Lamb," in the good old orthodox way.

Mr. O. A. Phelps, from Pekin, Illinois, delivered three lectures here about two weeks ago. The first one was listened to very respectfully. On commencing the second, an attempt was made to break up the meeting—which was held on the street—by yelling, hissing, and calling Mr. P. a d——d liar and other Christian epithets. He was ordered off the porch on which he was speaking, and immediately took position, as he said, on God Almighty's footstool. Quiet was restored by the constable asserting that he would put the first man that disturbed the speaker again under arrest. The next night he was not molested.

Mr. Phelps is now in Cedar Rapids. He is a new lecturer in the Liberal ranks, but has had a long experience as a public speaker, having been educated for the law.

His discourses are logical and right to the point; as an orator he has few equals. He is very anxious to work in the cause of Liberalism. I sincerely hope that he may meet with the success his ability so richly deserves.

Yours truly. J. W. Todd.

Cedar Falls, Iowa, Aug. 23, 1878.

Editor Truth Seeker: When I commenced circulating the petition I was in favor of modifying the Comstock laws, but now I am for repealing them wholly and totally. I go further than O. Jones, of Mineral Springs, Ark., in The Truth Seeker of Aug. 17th. I would not have abortion prevented or punished by law, for that is no more a crime in a woman than prevention is in a man (see Gen. xxxviii, 9, 10). Onan, in that case, in my opinion, did nothing wrong in destroying the line of life; neither does a woman do wrong by producing abortion, except by injuring her own health. I cannot help smiling at Messrs. Abbot's, Ingersoll's, and Underwood's ideas of suppressing obscenity. Do these gentlemen know that the Christians call their speeches and writings too obscene to be tolerated by Christians, and that nothing would give the Christians greater pleasure than to see all three of them in prison? Bro. Bennett, send out your petitions for repeal, and let Abbot send his for modifying, the Comstock laws.

Please send The Truth Seeker to the Public Reading Room at Cedar Falls, and I will pay for it until I order it stopped. Yours, etc., M. W. St. John.

Columbia, Pa., Aug. 21, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find three dollars, for which credit me on account of Truth Seeker. This should have been met sooner, as I was frequently reminded of it, but the times, scarcity of money, and having so much pressing have been the causes of delay. I had entertained the hope until within a few days that I would be able to meet you at Watkins, but had, for the same reason, to give up that much-coveted pleasure; nevertheless I wish those of you who can go the pleasure resulting from meeting kindred spirits; that harmony may prevail, and that our great expectations may be more than realized from this meeting. So, in view of my disappointment, you may put me down for a copy of the proceedings, as I see you have decided to publish the speeches, etc., of the meeting, There is much that I would like to order—"The Champions" for one—but must forego until money gets easier with me. Fraternally yours, J. Z. Hoffer.

Omro, Wis., Aug. 21, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Please send me something that would be appropriate for burial service—a form for burial, appropriate lecture, etc.; you know what I want best. I had occasion on Sunday to officiate at the funeral of a lady of Liberal views whose friends did not want a minister to send her to hell; so they called on me, and I did the best I could under the circumstances. I never heard of anything that created more of an excitement, for a small thing, than that has. It is an awful thing to bury the dead without the aid of the clergy! We are making it warm for them here, and, I think, are selling just as many drugs as ever, by close attention to business. Respectfully,

M. D. Morris.

Stockton, Cal., Aug. 19, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Please find money order for five dollars. Very busy times just now in the midst of a great harvest; no time, myself or friends, to give to books; but doubtless after harvest book-harvest will begin. I have, however, perused "The Champions" enough to be able to say that the title of the book is well taken, and that the subject matter does the title full justice; and if every Liberal should purchase it, they would all be amply rewarded by its possession and perusal, and at the same time be instrumental in rewarding you for your labor and expense in its publication; for the laborer is worthy of his hire, and "The Champions of the Church" is worth, as a publication, aside from its value as a Liberal compilation of facts in a manner and of a class never before so ably (if at all) or so cheaply published, double the price you ask for it. I have received two copies. Are you going to issue in book form the articles published in The Truth Seeker on Astronomy? I should like them very much.

Truly yours, W. F. Freeman.

Girard, Kan., Aug. 27, 1878.

Bro. Bennett: Inclosed find post-office order for $2, please pass to my credit. I have been rather slow. Please pardon. I intend to do better in the future. The Truth Seeker comes to hand regularly every week loaded down with rich lore. Your stand in reference to Tony, Abbot & Co. agrees with us all out here. Mr. Frothingham's letter, explaining the position of F. E. Abbot, is not satisfactory. Success to you, Bro. Bennett.

Respectfully, A. M. Sidwell.

East Saginaw, Mich., Aug. 27, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find post-office order for $3. My subscription ran out last May. Accept my thanks for not discontinuing it at that time, and in the future I will try and be more prompt. The Truth Seeker I would not like to be without. The bold, outspoken truth contained in its numbers do good battle for social and religious liberty, and cannot but wield a mighty influence for the advancement of humanity and a terror to Comstockism, bigotry, and fanaticism. Hoping the time may soon come when modern inquisitions and Comstockism, with all their would-be terrors and persecutions on account of religious belief, may give place to a more benign feeling, and that you and others who have labored in the cause of truth may be crowned with the glory due for having labored earnestly and faithfully, even though persecuted grievously,

I am yours fraternally, H. W. Booth, M.D.

Dansville, Mich., August 23, 1878.

Friend Bennett: It is an old saying that fortune favors the brave, but be that as it may, I have succeeded in obtaining another fifty cents for you to apply on The Truth Seeker and am in hopes that I shall be able to keep you paid as long as I remain on terra firma, for the reason that I don't know how to do without it. You will please find inclosed post-office order for one dollar. Give me credit for fifty cents, and send The Truth Seeker to R. Holt, this office, for three months. The speech of T. B. Wakeman in the city of Boston was a noble effort for the Liberal cause; and the legal portion of his speech was grand, and should operate as an eye-opener to the members of the Supreme Court. Any other view of the unconstitutionality of the so-called Comstock laws as construed by Mr. Wakeman would be, it seems to me, very erroneous. But religious bias has got to have more or less to do or say in all the legal opinions now-a-days, and thus the necessity of renewed effort on the part of Liberals in order to keep their necks out of the noose of the orthodox power. Yours for the entire repeal of the Comstock laws, E. J. Smith.

Louisiana, Missouri, August 25, 1878.

Editor of The Truth Seeker: As I am a truth seeker too, I am inclined to subscribe to your truth seeking weekly journal, if you would be kindly towards me, and permit me to write once in a while for your paper. It does me good to throw my sarcasm, my irony, and my raillery on those mendacious biblio-sympathizers and venders of holy water, who claim to know more about heaven than the best astronomer in the world.

For myself, as I am a disciple of Baron d'Holbach, that is, a pantheist, I do not pretend that I shall ramble eternally in heaven, or roast in the bottomless pit; for after the last vibration of my heart's pendulum, I know positively that my individual self shall be forever annihilated and confounded into millions of atoms who will serve to build up new generations, ad infinitum, without end. If you accede to my proposition, send The Truth Seeker to me, and shortly after, I'll send you the amount of its price. Your adherent and applauder, sincerely and earnestly,

P. A. Boudinier.

Florence, Iowa, Aug. 27, 1878.

Bro. Bennett: It strikes me that your correspondents, Mr. Charles Lyman and Mr. A. P. Bradt, entirely misunderstand the position of Seward Mitchell and H. C. Wright, whom they quote.

I take it that Mr. Wright and Mr. Mitchell mean only this: Neither the individual nor the State can rightly prescribe what shall be the belief or practice of the individual in regard to himself, or of the individuals in all matters touching themselves alone. Do your correspondents suppose that Henry C. Wright held the belief that neither the individual nor the State had any right to prevent a direct crime—no right to prevent the practice of murder, for instance? Certainly no one supposes that the State would be guilty of a "flagrant wrong" should it prevent two individuals from "agreeing together" to commit the crime of murder or arson, or in restraining them after the commission of such crime; but it certainly is guilty of such "flagrant wrong" when it interferes to prevent the practice of anything agreed upon by those two individuals as touching themselves alone. Mr. Lyman says: "Does mental freedom lead to such a position as that, together with a free circulation of obscene matter, free rum, and the same freedom to do wrong as to do right?" "Mental freedom" does not lead to such a conclusion, as we have said above. As to the circulation of obscene literature, there can be but one consideration of sufficient importance to puzzle the individualist for a moment. Did obscene matter reach none but adults there would be but one answer to the above question, and that an emphatic affirmative. But children are the wards of the State, and the State is bound to provide for them, physically, mentally, and morally, when their parents fail to do so: physically, when parents fail to give their children sufficient food, clothing, and shelter; mentally, when they do not give them the opportunity to partake of the blessings of the common school, freely provided by the State for all; and morally, when the parents are training those under their care to lead vicious lives, as many parents do, especially in the great cities, where children are educated to become thieves, pickpockets, etc.

But all this can be accomplished without any infringement on personal liberty. But any surveillance over the mails is such an infringement, and no specious sophism or skillful juggling with words can make it anything else. As to "free rum," that is another question; but it can be settled upon the same principles. "The same freedom to do right as to do wrong"—what fault have you to find with that? How can there be freedom to do right if there is no freedom to do wrong? What is there that is immoral in that? What is the counterpart of this? The freedom to suffer the consequences of our acts, right or wrong.

Certainly, Mr. Bradt, the State is bound to protect you in the peaceful occupation of your own dwelling, the fruits of your own labor, and so also is she bound to protect your neighbor, Mr. Smith, should he wish to purchase a glass of rum of your other neighbor, Mr. Brown, and to protect Mr. Brown in that sale. Should Mr. Brown and Mr. Smith conspire to compel you to swallow that rum, then they have forfeited their right to protection by the State in the sale of that glass, and you can rightfully appeal to the government for succor. I write this as a total-abstinence man; and if there is any flaw in the argument, or in these premises, I shall be thankful to whoever will point it out.

E. C. Walker.

Osage, Kan., Aug. 27, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Inclosed find postal order for $1, payment for The Truth Seeker as far as it goes. My time expired Aug. 17th, and have received one number since. Am ashamed not to send a year's subscription, but if I have the paper at all it must be paid for in driblets. This crushing load, poverty, weighs me down, and it is no consolation to know that millions bear me company.

Of all the Liberal papers my preference is The Truth Seeker, though I would like them all. I hope the seeds of dissention are about all sown, and hope the right kind of drought will follow to prevent germination. I also desire that Bro. Frothingham should not "put his foot in it."

The superstition that theological dogmas has fastened upon our fellows, though immensely weakened, is fearful in its effects upon human character and happiness; and the most hopeful sign of the times, to me, is the uprising of the masses politically—a complete breaking away from party, and manifesting a conviction that the sciences of finance and government have been stationary while everything else has made grand strides forward.

And when once the masses have thrown off old political dogmas that belong to other generations in the past, and begin to reap the advantages of legislation in character and keeping with the present age it will become easier to surmount their religious prejudices, bigotry, and superstition. Such legislation will never be had until lawyers are a meager minority in all legislative bodies. It is a question if the priesthood were ever a greater danger to human progress than is the legal fraternity to-day. Many lawyers as well as priests are good men, but no legislation will ever be obtained from them that does not leave the people in a state of utter dependence, of abject slavery, and the lawyers will direct their serfs with the money power. When the people shall have secured such legislation as will make the legal profession dispensable, the labor of placing the priesthood in the same category will be a short and easy one.

The State that leads in repealing all laws for the collection of debts will contain the most honest people, even if it were Rhode Island. This is only designed to show you how radical some Liberals are in Kansas.

Yours in all things, H. S. R. J.

Brecon, Wales, G. B., Aug. 18, 1878.

Mr. Bennett: Owing to the selfishness and superstition of the military authorities here, I am prohibited from receiving my valued Truth Seeker, but I cannot afford to say "stop it," even though my pay is but eight cents per diem; for while I can scrape together the cheap price of such a glorious paper, I shall, in justice to myself and the coming generations. For the noble cause of Liberalism and Freethought challenges the admiration, love, and union of the brave, not cowards. It is the only safe and direct road to social equality and happiness. I wish I could infuse all poor men with an idea of the sterling worth of this most ennobling and dear cause that I so zealously love and defend myself; and I firmly believe if they would consult their better mental self, reason, and resolve to quit the abuse of drink and tobacco, they would see the all-important need of mutually improved education and a natural love to read and study, not fiction, but living, needful facts, as are composed by the numerous literary and scientific minds and writers weekly in The Truth Seeker. But that admirable person, or seer, Mrs. E. D. Slenker, says, "Man proposes, but fate and circumstances dispose." Indeed, my heart bleeds daily to the core as I so distressingly witness in my general surrounding fellow-creatures the utter disregard and ignorant hatred of their own reason. Their actions, antics, and manners are so purely original (Darwinianish) that they never once appeal to or respect their reason.

Although superstition and illiterate ignorance is so deplorably universal in England and Wales, yet I am pleased to say, in the face of the military discipline tyrannically exercised over me, I accidentally (though extremely rare among the working classes) dropped across a young Welshman, who could barely read, perusing an Atheistic pamphlet—"The Young Emancipator"—which he loaned me on promise of secrecy, and which I found to be a good Freethought work very similar to The Truth Seeker. In return I loaned him my copies of The Truth Seeker, and hope to induce him to become a brother subscriber. I have also discovered others of confessed Liberal sentiments, but they lack the moral stamina, and are rather too selfish to consider properly the duties of reasonable men.

Respectfully and sincerely, Edw'd C. Swan.

The New Song of the Shirt.

BY D. M. HERSEY.

Work, work, work,
From early morn 'till night;
Oh, this life is a fearful struggle
Of wrong against the right.

Work, work, work,
And live on the poorest fare;
For the drone must be fed on the very best,
And lounge in the easy chair.

Work, work, work,
'Till the tired fingers ache,
And the eyes grow dim o'er the heavy task,
And the weary muscles shake.

Toil, toil, toil,
In hunger, and rags, and cold;
For the drones must live in houses fine,
And hoard up the bonds and gold.

Work, work, work,
From morning 'till into the night;
Oh, this life is a fearful struggle,
And wrong gets the better of right.

Wait, wait, wait,
For at last the right shall be done,
And the hells of injustice perish
Forever, one by one.

Strike, strike, strike,
Steady, and sure as you go;
For who would be free and stand like a man
Himself must aim the blow.

Vote, vote, vote,
Make every ballot a gun
Full-shotted with death to cruel laws,
And justice will be done.

Vineland, N. J.

The Greenback labor boys, both with s peeches and with song,
The Greenback labor boys now are marching right along;
The Greenback labor boys mean to put down fraud and wrong.

Chorus. Let all the people sing, glory, glory, hallelujah,
Glory, glory, ha jah, glory, glory, hallelujah,
Down with the Money King.

Though the bankers rule th press with their subsidy of gold,
Though the bankers rule the press, it is time that they were told,
Though the bankers rule the press Greenback voters can't be sold.

Chorus. Let all, &c.

Soon the old party fraud, please remember what we say,
Soon the old party frauds, sure as next election day,
Soon the old party frauds we are bound to wipe away.

Chorus. Let all, &c.

The men who pay the taxes have got tired of the drones;
The men who pay the taxes hear too much about coupons;
The men who pay the taxes soon will smash the banks and bonds.

Chorus. Let all, &c.

The business men are learning that contraction is a curse;
The business men are learning that resumption is still worse;
The business men are learning they want Greenbacks in their purse;

Chorus. Let all, &c.

The workingmen's party know full well that they are right;
The workingmen's party have resolved they will unite;
The workingmen's party by their votes will show their might.

Chorus. Let all, &c.

The ladies they are with us: in our platform they can trust;
The ladies they are with us, for we own their claims are just;
The ladies they are with us, we will conquer boys, we must!

Prayer.

BY INGERSOLL LOCKWOOD.

As Satan passed through Heaven from
A walk on earth one day,
The Lord looked up and questioned him:
"Didst hear my creatures pray?"
"Ay, Lord: I heard their prayers resound.
But, my soul, not one of them
Prayed for his brother's good."

Then looked Jehovah fire and flame,
And spoke this fierce decree:
"Who makes a selfish prayer is thine;
The others come to me!"
Then all that night on heaven's walls
The Lord and Satan stood,
To see how many sons of men
Would pray for brother's good.

Alas! they watched there many an hour,
And yet there came no sounds:
The poor they prayed for pennies, and
The rich they prayed for pounds;
The ugly prayed for beauty, and
The awkward prayed for grace;
The old ones prayed for youthful looks
To hide a wrinkled face.

The limping prayed for healthy joints,
The red-haired prayed for brown;
The short ones prayed for longer legs,
The long to be cut down.
The brown eyes prayed for blue ones, and
The cross-eyed prayed for straight;
The fat ones prayed for melting down,
The lean ones prayed for weight.

The doctor prayed for sickness, and
The undertaker death;
The captive prayed for sunshine, and
The phthisicky for breath;
The maiden prayed for lover's vows;
The soldier prayed for war;
The beggar prayed for horse to ride;
The drunkard prayed for "more."

The sick man prayed for break of day,
The thief for longer night;
The miser prayed for more of gold,
The blind man prayed for sight.
At last there came a tearful voice
Up to the star-lit sky:
"Oh, may my uncle's soul this night Rest with the Lord on high!"

"There's one for me!" Jehovah cried;
"Not so!" the Devil said;
"He's heir to all his uncle's wealth,
Hence wants the old man dead."
Just then there came another voice,
In supplicating tones:
"Oh, may the grave be late to close O'er neighbor David's bones!"

"There's surely one for me at last!"
But Satan cried: "Not yet!
He merely wants the man to live
Until he pays a debt."
And so they waited till the stars
Went out at break of day;
Then Satan seized his bag of souls
And sped his homeward way.

Upon high Heaven's glittering wall
Long had they listening stood,
But not a mortal, all that night,
Prayed for his brother's good.

Col. Jamieson vs. "A Week with the Ghosts."

MOTT A "FRAUD" PROVED BY SUSPICION.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number of your paper (Aug. 10), W. F. Jamieson takes me to task for what I had to say in "A Week with the Ghosts." It is refreshing to turn from such a specimen as "Anti-Fraud," to review a man of brains, intellect, and culture, like Jamieson, although I am sorry he does not always come up to our expectations.

But perhaps we often expect too much, and there are men who sometimes appear to rise above themselves, but still oftener perhaps, appear to sink below. I respect Mr. Jamieson as "a strong man armed," and hope he may never be found fighting for a bad cause.

Col. Jamieson ridicules the idea of my supposing that Mott sits in the cabinet entranced. He broadly intimates that Mr. Mott must be doing something in the darkness. But what is he doing, Colonel? If my simplicity is "childlike" as Col. J. says, he will also remember that "children and fools always tell the truth." Not so with noted pugnacious disputants, or men who found their published opinions of other men's characters upon suspicion.

But perhaps Mott is doing something in his cabinet. Well, let me try to please friend Jamieson by taking what I suppose to be his side, and say I suppose Mott is at his tricks there. He is, perhaps, busy all his leisure time there in preparing masks out of airy nothing to fit the dead friends of members of the evening circle, and the mysterious light which surrounds them in that darkness "like a cellar at midnight."

Again, there are perhaps ten members in the circle, and he must ascertain, perhaps, where thirty or forty of their friends died, when they died, what they said and did before they died, why they died, and the circumstances attending and following their sickness and disease, which will keep him busy, as the travel necessary to perform the above may require many thousands of miles traveling, even should he be able to ride witch-like through the air on a broom-stick, or like the Almighty, upon "the wings of the wind" on a calm evening. No wonder he would be compelled to get out of his chair to find out all this; then be able to relate special conversations, and minute circumstances connected with his present visitors' own homes and surroundings, give the name of parties and events which occurred perchance before he was born, etc., then learn so as to converse intelligently and fluently in other languages for the time, and we think even Col. J. may as well own up that Mott has enough to keep any ordinarily educated "fraud" busy for an hour or two.

If this does not appear probable, let our suspicious brother try it. Besides all this, he must be present also almost every minute in the cabinet, conversing in the similitude of dead friends of members of the circle, and I think he has work enough.

If Mr. Jamieson will take his place and do all that I have seen done there in the presence of the same parties, I will agree to be satisfied with that amount of labor in that enclosure these hot evenings, without inquiring what he has done even if he is not in a trance.

All this knowledge, which is somehow obtained and imparted, Mr. J. calls "puerile" or childish, but puerile as it is, I venture the assertion that Mr. Jamieson, with all his manhood, his learning, and experience, cannot do these things.

"Are we," he inquires, "to believe under such circumstances the manifestations are evidences of Spiritualism?" Perhaps not; perhaps they are not satisfactory; will Mr. Jamieson favor us with better?

"Abolish the Dark Circle," says Mr. J. Why? Simply because it is dark. Let us abolish the Aurora Borealis because it appears only by night, and very suspicious of fraud is photography because the photographer develops his pictures in dark rooms. If the pictures are good for anything, and genuine, let them be developed in "broad daylight," as Mr. J. says.

All this suggests the main question, whether we should do as the spirits (which Mr. J. believes to exist) direct, or they do as we direct; and whether if Spiritualism be true it had better be disbelieved, and men live and die in ignorance of that truth, or that they should be made happy by thousands by being convinced in dark circles?

It is a little strange that that knight-errant of modern literature, who holds Spiritualism up with one hand, while he slaps it in the face with the other; that ambulating and perambulating gladiator who goes like Satan of old to and fro in the earth, and walks up and down in it, should attempt to dictate or even "suggest" to the inhabitants of a higher world just how they may appear to the august inhabitants of this. Very strange, truly that a man should condemn a process which is converting hundreds to his own belief; and side with the clergy (that "source of danger") who are extremely desirous also of abolishing dark circles.

Yes, the man who virtually tells the happy believer in his own faith, who, with streaming eyes and overflowing heart, has been brought to a happy knowledge of his spirit friends, and at the glorious home which awaits himself, of which he had heretofore no certain knowledge, by dark circles: "All wrong, gentlemen, all wrong. I assure you this is all true enough, to be sure, but you never should have permitted yourselves to be convinced that way; better even to have remained in your ignorance until a glorious cross appeared among the constellations in the brightness of noon, like that of Constantine, or a light at noonday blind you because 'above the brightness of the sun,' like Paul's, or in a circle spirits appear luminous in a light as bright as themselves. Had I the power I'd abolish such means of conversion, and make you wait until you get converted in such a manner as to merit my approval."

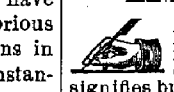
I admire Jamieson. He is a glorious example of the truth that God made man after his own image, which image, since lost, has many imitations; but it requires a grand man to dictate to the inhabitants of two worlds how they may hold intercourse, and attempt to put an embargo upon their commerce.

The spirits, Mr. J. intimates, may come to us in the storm, the whirlwind, and thunder, but not in the "still, small voice," under the mantle of night.

But permit the inquiry whether it be just, manly, and honorable, in opposing anything or anybody to deal in innuendoes, intimations, suppositions, and insinuations; all founded on suspicion, without facts to sustain them, and thus endeavor to injure the reputation of another; and how is the accuser to justify himself in such mean assaults, or the accused to defend himself against them? Is it not a compliment to Mr. Mott that his bitterest and strongest enemies can only bring charges based on suspicions, richly colored sometimes with aniline?

In opposing others, men bring the strongest power they have to bear, and if this is all that can be brought against Mott's mediumship, it is safe enough, even if the Christian clergy and their co-worker, Jamieson, do their utmost.

Mr. Jamieson is noted for challenges, but we challenge him, under the same conditions, to produce the same revelations as Mott; or let a new cabinet be constructed, and let both perform alternately, and if Mr. J. can produce the same or equal developments—making due allowance for less practice—as are seen at Mott's by the same parties, then we will acknowledge that—well, that Jamieson can be as great a fraud as Mott. Will Jamieson accept?



Now, Mr. Editor, when any one hereafter criticises another—which is just and proper—let him sign his own name, especially if it bears either directly or indirectly upon their character and conduct; and if matters of fact are subjected to investigation, let truth sustain every charge and never oppose any thing or person, especially in the public press, without a better foundation than suspicion. Yours, D. JENKINS.

A GRAND PAPER.—All lovers of right, truth, justice, all who believe in Liberalism and that some people will be "saved" as well as others, in fact, all lovers of common sense who do not measure a man by the particular church he attends; all who hate Anthony Comstock and his crimes, cruelties, and, in fact, all his outrageous proceedings, should send six cents for a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a large weekly devoted to science and sense, published at $3 a year by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York. Send six cents for specimen, and say you read this notice in the Star Spangled Banner.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK: His Career of Cruelty and Crime. In a neat paper bound volume, being the last portion of the "Champions of the Church," we have a history of the villain whose name is given above. Comstock has done good, has suppressed much bad literature, but for every real criminal, he has persecuted two who never intended wrong. He has made a practice of inducing persons to violate his law that he might pounce upon them. He is a heartless, bigoted, perjured, unfeeling wretch—a fit "champion of the Church," a second Torquemada who, so far as he can, attains his hellish ends and gloats over the victims of his persecutions. Every man who would know what crimes are committed in the name of the law, all who would know just what this professed guardian of the morals of the country really is, should not fail to send for this work. It contains over 100 pages, and will show up the greatest scoundrel that ever polluted the "land of the free" in his true character. Price, only 25 cents. D. M. Bennett, publisher, 141 Eighth street, New York, or it may be ordered from this office.—Star Spangled Banner.

THE ETHICS OF SPIRITUALISM;

A SYSTEM OF

MORAL PHILOSOPHY,

Founded on Evolution and Continuity of Man's Existence beyond the Grave.

By HUDSON TUTTLE,

AUTHOR OF

"Arcana of Nature," "Antiquity of Man," "Career of the God-Idea in History," "Career of Religious Ideas," "Arcana of Spiritualism," etc., etc.

THE FOLLOWING LIST COMPRISES SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL SUBJECTS TREATED:

The Individual; the Genesis and Evolution of Spirit; The Laws of Moral Government; Analysis of Mind in reference to Ethics; The Appetite; The Propensities; Love; Wisdom; Consideration of Rights of the Individual, of Society; Consideration of Duties and Obligations; Duties of the Individual; To God; Of Self-Culture; Duties of Society; Marriage, its Foundation and Responsibility.

The "Ethics of Spiritualism," while running in the columns of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, was widely noticed and commended by the public and the press. From the various published notices we quote a few as follows:

"Contains matter of much interest to Liberal minds."—Pequabuck Valley Gazette.

"Hudson Tuttle's Ethics of Spiritualism, now being published in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, is alone worth the subscription price to that journal. When Hudson Tuttle writes he says something."—Spiritual Scientist.

. . "We congratulate our brother of Chicago on his securing these valuable contributions. No one is better qualified to treat the subject intuitively and philosophically." . . .—Banner of Light.

. . "Such a work has long been needed, and never more so than at this time. . . . To me the crowning glory of Spiritualism is its ethical system, its pure and perfect code of morals. . . . I am profoundly grateful to Mr. Tuttle that he has undertaken the work. . . . —Wm. E. Coleman.

. . "This subject should have been thoroughly treated before now by some of our ablest minds, but it may be for the best that it has been comparatively neglected, and the duty left to him of presenting it in his unequaled way. . . . —Eugene Crowell, M.D., author of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism.

"I have just read your announcement concerning the series of articles you will soon begin to publish from the ever-active and thoroughly honest pen of Brother Hudson Tuttle. He is a farmer, and knows how to plow and sow and reap; a grape-grower, and can discriminate between good and bad fruit. He writes from the fulness of the spirit, and therefore he constantly rises above the clouds of materialism. He is no sophist, no hair-splitting apologist for the loose practices of mankind, and so you may look for the highest and most philosophical statement of the morality from his faithful pen; and the comfort is great when one reflects and knows to a certainty that Hudson Tuttle is no hypocrite, and hence is always personally as good as his written word."—Andrew Jackson Davis.

. . "The questions he proposes to answer are important and concern us all, and no writer is better qualified to enlighten the world on these topics. I congratulate you on being able to secure the services of this inspired philosopher." . . . —Warren Sumner Barlow, author of The Voices.

The author has steadily aimed to bring his work within the smallest possible compass, and has most admirably succeeded. Though the subjects treated are of the highest importance, Mr. Tuttle has restrained every disposition to dilate upon them, and has thus condensed the book into one hundred and sixty pages. The book is well printed on heavy paper, and altogether is a work that every Spiritualist and Liberalist should own.

12mo. Cloth, 160 pp. Price, in cloth, 60 cents; Pamphlet, 40 cents.

A GOOD PLAN.

The best and most popular plan for operating stocks is that of combining capital of various sums, or pooling the orders of thousands of customers and operating them as one mighty whole in which shares are issued, which has been made so successful by the firm of Messrs. LAWRENCE & CO., Bankers, 55 Exchange-place, N. Y., the profits of which are divided pro rata among the shareholders at the expiration of thirty days from date of certificate. By this excellent plan each investor is placed on an equal footing with the largest operator. For example, within a month you made $2,000 upon an investment of $100, upon $25 the profit would be $500. An investment of $10 would pay $50, making 5 per cent. during the month. An investment of $100 would pay $1,000 profit, making 10 per cent.; an investment of $500 would pay $2,500 profit, making 5 per cent.; and so on, according to the market. The firm's circular explains everything. The editor of the Brooklyn Journal says: "The very satisfactory results made in these combinations by friends led us to order 20 shares, and at the final result we made a clear profit of $101.25 after deducting all commissions and our original investment. The firm is in every respect worthy of the utmost confidence. Send for their explanatory circular." Mr. H. F. Giddings has kindly tendered the firm his experience over his signature, as in no event would they use any of their customers' names without such authority:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1878.

LAWRENCE & Co., 55 Exchange Place. Dear Sirs:—Your favor containing your check for $1,376.63 at hand for which I thank you, as it is in excess of what I expected. As to your request for an expression in writing from me, I can cheerfully say that the above result is very satisfactory, and I believe I can safely recommend your combined system to everybody. And further, more, I would say that I first saw your advertisement in a N. Y. paper, and sent for one of your circulars, on receipt of which, as you know, I remitted you $300 for 300 shares in Class C in one of your combinations, and by return mail received your certificate for the same, and during the month received five notices of purchases and sales of different stocks, in all amounting to 4¼ per cent., or $1,275 profit on my 300 shares, after deducting your commissions of $198.37, leaving me a net profit of $1,076.63 over and above my investment of $300. Yours truly,

H. F. GIDDINGS,
837 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

An article in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, under date of June 29, 1878, says: "The reports of fabulous profits realized to numerous parties by this plan led us to investigate the matter closely. The system is based on safe business principles, and is the only method by which large operators attain their greatest success. The pools in which their customers are interested are placed on an equality in every respect with the leaders of the street. As the firm's whole interest lies in their commissions, they naturally wish to make their operations aggregate as large as possible. We believe the method of Lawrence & Co. to be the most safe and successful of any that can be found. New combinations and pools are formed every day or two. The firm will send their comprehensive circular, giving full details, to any applicant. One of their old customers, who held a few shares in one of these combinations, after receiving check for his profits, writes: 'Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, N. Y.: Your remittance for my profits, $393.75 is received. I again most heartily thank you, &c. Numerous testimonials are contained in their circular.' New York Illustrated Times says: "A safe method of dealing in stocks.—The great desideratum has always been to discover some method by which a party, operating on limited capital, can stand an equal chance with men like Gould, Vanderbilt or Keene. A plan has lately been adopted by the banking house of Messrs. Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, that seems to fill the bill completely. The reports of numerous parties who have made large sums of money by this plan, has led us to investigate the matter, and we find the rumors are based on facts. They are also large dealers in all kinds of bonds.

Their circular is truthful and instructive," send for it.

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

Gems of Thought.

BEAR no envy, that life may not be tasteless for thee.—Parsi.

BEYOND the universe there is nothing, and within the universe the supernatural does not and cannot exist.—Ingersoll.

PRACTICE not wrathfulness, since a man, when he practices wrath, becomes then forgetful of his duties and good works.—Parsi.

SLANDER not, lest ill-fame and wickedness come to thee therefrom, for it is said every other demon attacks in the front but slander, which assaults from behind.—Parsi.

OUR motives are never quite so good as we think, and never quite so bad as our enemies suppose. Our best is interwoven with evil, and our worst, let us hope, has some strands of good.

I BELIEVE in allowing children to think for themselves. I believe in the democracy of the family. If in this world there is anything splendid, it is a home where all are equals.—Ingersoll.

ANNOUNCE to those who believe and do the things that are right, that for them are gardens through which rivers flow; so oft as they eat the fruit therein they shall say, "This same was our sustenance of old."—Koran.

HE who injures animals that are not injurious from a wish to give himself pleasure adds nothing to his own happiness, living or dead; while he who gives no creature willingly the pain of confinement or death, but seeks the good of all sentient beings, enjoys bliss without end.—Menu.

THERE is in all the utterances of the world no grander, no sublimer sentiment. There is no creed that can be compared with it for a moment. It should be wrought in gold, adorned with jewels, and impressed upon every human heart: "The world is my country, and to do good my religion."—Ingersoll.

IF we leave until to-morrow that which should be done to-day, we place an insurmountable barrier in the way of our progress; for often are we left to grope in darkness toward that which we ought to accomplish, from the lack of that experience which we should have gathered through the duty neglected.—Lessie N. Goodell.

HE whose knowledge is deep, who possesses wisdom, who knows the right way; he who is tolerant with the intolerant, mild with the fault-finder, free from passion with the passionate, him I call indeed a man. The manly, the noble, the hero, the great sage, the guileless, the master, the awakened, him I call the right and true Man.—Buddha.

DO NOT treat your children like orthodox doorposts to be set in a row. Treat them like trees that need light and sun and air. Be fair and honest with them; give them a chance. Recollect that their rights are equal to yours. Do not have it in your mind that you must govern them—that they must obey. Throw away forever the idea of master and slave.—Ingersoll.

LET the student honor his food, and eat it without contempt. Food eaten with constant respect gives muscular force and sustains manhood, but eaten irreverently, destroys both. Excessive eating is prejudicial to health and virtue. When one among all the student's organ's fails, by that single failure his divine knowledge passes away, as water flows through one hole in a leathern bottle.—Menu.

I KNOW not what discoveries, what inventions, what thoughts, may leap from the brain of the world. I know not what garments of glory may be woven by the years to come. I cannot dream of the victories to be won upon the fields of thought; but I do know that, coming from the infinite sea of the future, there will never touch "this bank and shoal of time" a richer gift, a rarer blessing, than liberty for man, for woman, and for child.—Ingersoll.

IT is impossible to calculate the moral mischief that mental lying has produced in society. Where a man has so far corrupted and prostituted the chastity of his mind as to subscribe his professional belief to things he does not believe, he has prepared himself for the commission of every other crime. He takes up the trade of a priest for the sake of gain, and, in order to qualify himself for that trade, he begins with a perjury. Can we conceive of anything more destructive to morality than this?—Thomas Paine.

THE more a man knows, the more he is valued by others, and the more competent he is to provide for himself and for those dependent upon him. We should learn all we can of many things. Our knowledge is our individual property. It is ours as long as life lasts: no one can steal it from us, nor can they burn or otherwise destroy it in any way or shape. Let us then, each and all, lay up in the storehouse of our minds immense hoards of this priceless treasure, so that we may, in time, become fabulously rich in something better than silver and gold, and more to be desired than pearls or diamonds.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

MAN advances only as he overcomes the obstructions of nature; and this can be done only by labor and by thought. Labor is the foundation of all. Without labor, and without great labor, progress is impossible. The progress of the world depends upon the men who walk in the fresh furrows and through the rustling corn; upon those who sow and reap; upon those whose faces are radiant with the glare of furnace fires; upon the delvers in the mines and the workers in the shops; upon those who give to the winter air the ringing music of the ax; upon those who battle with the boisterous billows of the sea; upon the inventors and discoverers; upon the brave thinkers.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

A FALSE scent—A counterfeit penny.

"DYING in poverty," says a modern moralist, "is nothing. It is living in poverty that comes hard."

FIRST lady—"Why do they call those balls foul?" Second lady—"Don't know, unless it's because the pesky things are continually flying over the fence."

TWO LITTLE girls were comparing progress in catechism study. "I have got to original sin," said one. "How far have you got?" "Oh, I'm beyond redemption," said the other.

"DOESN'T Boston Harbor remind you of the Bay of Naples?" asked an enthusiastic Boston yachtsman. "Yes," was the answer, "in one respect. They are both full of water."

"JOHN, did you take the note to Mr. Jones?" "Yes, but I don't think he can read it." "Why so, John?" "Because he is blind, sir. While I was in the room he axed me twice where my hat was, and it was on my head all the time."

A CLERK in a Philadelphia book-store, thinking to annoy a Quaker customer who looked as though he was fresh from the country, handed him a volume, saying, "Here is an excellent essay on the rearing of calves," "Thee had better present that to thy mother, young man," was the quick reply of the Quaker.

"VAT'S de matter?—vat's de matter?" exclaimed an old Dutchman, as he tucked up his apron and ran out of his shop to know the meaning of the crowd in his neighborhood—"vat's de matter?" "There's a man killed," replied a bystander. "Oh, ish dat all?" said our friend, evidently disappointed; "Ish dot all?—shoost a man killed? Humph! I thought it vas a fight."

CONVERSATION between an inquiring stranger and a steamboat pilot: "That is Black Mountain?" Yes, sir; highest mountain above Lake George." "Any story or legend connected with that mountain?" "Lots of 'em; two lovers went up that mountain once and never came back again." Indeed! why! what became of them?" "Went down on the other side."

SPEAKING at a dinner given him by the Carlton Club, Lord Beaconsfield described Mr. Gladstone as a "sophistical rhetorician, inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity and egotistical imagination." This terrible indictment may not "live as long as the language," but it cannot be entirely forgotten while the affectation of polysyllabic volubility dominates the vituperative vocabulary determining the ambidextrous applicability of its characteristically convertible equivalents.

"LITTLE."

A pompous attorney, while trying a cause,
Was quizzing a witness and "picking for flaws."
The witness, who owed him a personal grudge,
Provoked him until he appealed to the judge.
"I demand, sir," he cried, with a fiery red face,
"A little attention while trying this case."
"Your honor," responded the meek little man,
"I'm paying as little as any one can."
The Judge, with a frown,
Looked solemly down
On the squable, and said, from the bench where he sat,
"We want nothing but silence, and little of that."

"BRAZIL'S treasury is empty." Dom Pedro, old boy, shake; two souls without a single cent, two hearts that long for tin—but when did you start a newspaper?

"CAN the horse run fast?" asked a boy of a milkman, the other morning. "No, sonny," replied the purveyor of aqueous lacteal fluid; "he can't run very fast, but he can stand the fastest of any horse you ever saw."

DON'T LIKE 'EM.—Little English, the shiner, worked in with a Sunday-school excursion the other day, and there was a look of awful disgust on his face as he came into this office yesterday to relate his experience.

"In the fust place" he began, "I sot down on two cheers on the bow of the boat, an' I was gittin a luvly breeze right between the eyes, when along comes one o' them kind-eyed deacons, an' sez he: 'Now, my dear hangel, you git up'n fly right smart!' I had fer cave, an' he took one o' the cheers an' a fat woman took the other. I was slidin' along fur a stool when a big good boy what kin learn ten verses for Sunday-skule grabbed me by this 'ere hair and called out that the wicked shall not live out half their days, an' he sot down on my stool. Then I went down among the good children. One of 'em offered to fight me three strings for a cent, another hooked my sandwiches, and a boy with lots of good clothes on him said my presence on that side of the boat oppressed the hatmosphere. If I slid inter the cabin, the teachers slid me out. If I went haft, the women spit on their handkerchiefs and wanted to wipe off my chin. If I went for'ard the good boys hit me in the eye with peanuts, and said they'd like to make me climb for low wages an' poor pay.

"Well, sur," he went on, after taking breath, "when we got to Sugar Island there wasn't a bit of sugar there. It was the deadest give away you ever seed. Everybody got a tree of his own, while I had to walk around in the sun. One feller axed me under his tree to sit down on a thistle, but I didn't tumble. I didn't git nuthin' to eat but one pickle an' two drinks of water; an' afore we left the island a drove of good boys slid down on me an' rushed me over a fence an' through half an acre of briers, an' a feller picked up my lost revolver an' chucked it into his pocket for loot. I got a cinder in my eye comin' home, had three fights an' got licked, an' when we reached the wharf a hackman pulled my hair an' said he could see my hangel wings sproutin' out. You'd orter say in your paper for all bootblacks to stay to hum an' let these ere Sunday-skule scursions go right on to destruction."—Detroit Free Press.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 37. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, September 14, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

ONE of the deacons of a church which was about to build a new house of worship was shewing to some of his friends the architect's plans, and called their particular attention to the steeple, remarking: "There, that steeple will be 180 feet high—the tallest in this part of the State: won't that make sinners tremble?" The friends agreed that if it did not, there would be nothing about the church that could.

ELDER DANIEL CARR, Adventist, was recently surprised at night in Lawrence, Mass., by officers, in bed with a fascinating grass-widow named Mrs. Louisa Spencer, with whom he had been sleeping for a long time to the neglect of his sickly and unhappy wife. The guilty pair were locked up in prison and will soon have a trial. He was also arrested previously for the seduction of a German girl, but the matter was settled by his paying $2,000. O! that the holy shepherds would not be so sinful.

NATHAN HILLES, the President of the Philadelphia Gas Trust, who has just been compelled to resign his position on account of developments affecting his business integrity, is of the very pink of Philadelphia respectability—bank president, treasurer of a religious society, president of a Pennsylvania mining company, director in a street-car company, and, of course, trustee of several estates, besides being President of the Gas Trust. "Mr. Hilles," says the Record, "was held up as a paragon of honesty." He is now proven to be a defaulter to the amount of about $300,000.

HELD IN $1,000 FOR TRIAL.—LEE, MASS., Sept. 6. L. F. Hurd, brother to the horse-thief, H. A. Hurd, recently sentenced by the court in Greenfield to the State Prison for four and a half years, was to-day brought into court, charged with being an accessory of H. A. Hurd. He was put under $1,000 bonds for trial next Thursday. L. F. Hurd is a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church here, has been for two years superintendent of the Sunday-school, and has a license as a local preacher.

A STIRRING FIGHT.—A mortal combat between a humming-bird and a bumblebee in a Springfield (Mass.) flower-garden was witnessed the other morning. The bird was busily engaged in gathering its breakfast of honey from a bunch of lilies, when it dipped its long bill into a blossom which had been pre-empted by a bumblebee, and the enraged insect immediately flew out to battle. Two or three slight collisions, hardly occupying so many seconds, followed, and then the humming-bird, with the tiniest note of pain, darted off and dropped dead in the grass, not five feet away. It had evidently been stung to death.—Springfield Republican.

THE Rev. W. T. Ellis is pastor of the Congregational Church in Woodstock, Conn. He habitually uses violent language in his sermons. This is only a sample. "You low, mealy-mouthed looking wretches of the devil, you look as though you had but now hopped up out of hell, and the devil had stuck you up against the fence to dry. It would make heaven's stomach sick to look at you." A part of the congregation united in requesting him to resign, but he refused to go. A committee and a policeman went to take possession of the church. Ellis and a few adherents locked the doors. A whole night was spent in quarreling and actual fighting, but in the morning the pastor retreated.

THE Rev. H. L. E. Pratt, recently from Staten Island, where he ministered to an Episcopal congregation for fourteen years, but, for bad conduct, was forced to leave, was recently caught by a policeman at night, in the Central Park, in connection with Miss Mary Clark in such a kind of criminal connection that some of the daily papers said the act could not be named. As bad as the case was against the reverend gentleman, he found a sympathetic friend in Justice Bixby, who called his Court at midnight and dismissed the case. He is charged also with being guilty of similar conduct in other localities. When will clergymen learn to behave themselves better, so as not to bring disgrace upon all humanity?

THE Rev. H. H. Hayden, Methodist, of North Madison, Conn., has been arrested for the murder of a young girl named Mary E. Stannard. By the evidence thus far produced, it is to the effect that he had had criminal intercourse with her, and apprehended that she was in a condition to become a mother; and, to hide the evidence of his guilt, he appointed a meeting with his victim in a lonely place in the woods hard by, where she was found with her throat cut and her head badly bruised. He, of course, denies his guilt, and prays and smiles, and even laughs as sweetly as ever. At this writing the evidence is only partially given, but the general impression is that he is a guilty man.

LIKE Abraham of old, the darkies of Atlantic City have offered up a lamb in sacrifice. There is a camp-meeting going on among the cedars near the Excursion House, and on the spot the brethren have for more than a week been wrestling with sin. On Sunday afternoon a lamb was placed in a pit and a blazing pine-knot fire kindled. Five cents had to be paid for a peep at the animal sizzing in the tank. The Rev. Eliza Henderson adjusted her neat bobinet cap and preached the sermon, the burden of which was, "Glory to God, honey, if there are one hundred sinners on top of one Christian, at the sound of the trumpet he would jump right up and get on top."

THE GREENBACKERS' VIEWS OF THE HARD TIMES.—The State Committee of the Greenback party, in an address to voters, say that it is time to reorganize New York City politics. Many of the wharves are going to decay; business is decreasing through railroad company discrimination, and through the Government's suicidal policy in regard to the navy and the currency of the country. The leaders of both parties are accused of being paid attorneys of the great corporations, and unwilling to attack them. The address reminds laboring men that they have the same right to combine for self-protection that capitalists and corporations have, and urges them to send men to Washington and to Albany who will insist upon the enaction of laws to protect and make prosperous the sons of toil.

THE Nevada City Transcript has a detailed account of a gay clerical Lothario in that locality who has made love to quite a number of maidens and married women. His plan has been to go home with them from prayer-meetings, and while in earnest conversation with them concerning the necessity of their so living that they will be fit to join the angelic band, to slide off on to the subject of loving one another. As he warmed to his subject, and as his subject warmed to him, he would gently place his arm around her waist, and pour sweet words into her unsophisticated ears, until her poor foolish head dropped unresistingly upon his shoulder, and—the rest can be imagined. It is a way the dear clergy have.

THE Rev. George S. Vosburgh, who was a few months ago subjected to an unpleasant and protracted trial on the charge of having attempted to poison his wife, and in whose case there was about an even division of public opinion as to his guilt, but who was found not guilty (whereupon he resumed preaching again until the time of his vacation), and who in consequence of the divided sentiment of his church in relation to him (a portion of them not being satisfied that he is innocent) has at length been forced to resign. It is amusing to notice with what assurance he bases his resignation upon the grounds of overwork and need of rest. It is well understood that could his flock all have believed him innocent, or have kept quiet about his guilt, no resignation would have been offered.

AN UNLUCKY CLERGYMAN.—Among the entire list of bankrupts the name of but one clergyman occurs, this being that of Alvah Wiswall, late of St. John's Guild. Wiswall has been, on the whole, one of the unluckiest men of his profession. He came hither nearly twenty years ago from Vermont, and married a half-crazy woman, who was fifteen years his senior, the only attraction being a fortune which was vastly overrated. This was a ruinous step. The woman took an intense dislike to him, which, perhaps, was a feature of her insanity, and soon their domestic trouble came before the public. The result is that Wiswall, who once was rector of St. John's Church, lost his pulpit. He then got into difficulty with St. John's Guild, of which he was master, and now he appears in the bankrupt list. Wiswall's career has certainly been very unfortunate.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

CLERICAL FAUX PAS.—When the criminal record of the year all over the United States comes to be summed up, we hardly think that the statistics will redound to the credit of all clergymen. There have been numerous cases in which clergymen who have reached middle and old age, and who have been much respected, have been shown to have committed revolting crimes, in which tender youth has been the victim. Murder, which is scarcely more horrible, is contained in the list of atrocities perpetrated by men included among ministers. We only mention these because an odor of sanctity is too often instinctively ascribed to a clergyman merely because he belongs to a profession supposed to be sacred. On the contrary, though clergymen are, perhaps, better as a body than any other body of men, yet there are so many exceptions that sensible people can no longer receive a clergyman with full faith merely because he is one. That kind of credulity has long ago been worked out.—Telegram.

BISHOP SAMUEL MCCOSKRY, of the Diocese of Michigan, seventy-five years of age, who several months ago was accused of writing love letters to and other improprieties with a young lady placed under his protection, has had no little trouble arising out of the affair. Among other things, he resigned and went to Europe, hoping that his brethren would not subject him to further disgrace; but at a meeting of bishops in this city, recently, it was at first decided to find that he was troubled with a disease, satyriasis, which is an excessive development of sensual passion, but they afterwards decided to suspend him without comment or parley. So the old man, now absent in Europe, who for forty years has been a high dignitary in the Episcopal Church, and probably has lived as good a life as those who have condemned him, is now utterly disgraced in his old age, when, it would seem, his brethren in Christ might have been more merciful to him and accepted his resignation, and not have officially announced to the world that they believed him guilty of adultery and other criminal conduct. Many kind-hearted persons condemn them for their unfeeling conduct towards the poor old man.

THE Rev. Daniel Carr has for twenty years been pastor of the Advent Church in Lawrence, Mass. His long service has been checkered with adversity. The tongue of accusation has been wagged against him. A long time ago his stove was blown to pieces, just as though a considerable quantity of gunpowder had exploded in it. His own theory was that sap had, in some mysterious way, been suddenly turned into steam by the fire, and had broken with great force from its confinement in the burning wood. A neighbor had a different theory. He said that wood had been stolen from his pile, and that he had charged it with gunpowder to expose the thief. This untoward event not only destroyed the pastor's stove, but seriously injured his usefulness in the pulpit. However, he kept right on in his work, ready for the next reverse, which was not long coming. It was a lawsuit, brought by a girl who said that he had promised to marry her. He swore that he had taken her into his home out of charity, and that he had been like a Christian father to her; yet a jury compelled him to give her $2,000. Again his influence for good was impaired; but, with indomitable energy, he began a highly successful revival, and was soon fully re-established. Next, another girl said that he ought to be her husband, and he suffered again in pocket and influence. This time he narrowly escaped expulsion from the Advent ministry, and very hard work was necessary to recover his ground in the estimation of his people. But he did it. Now his crowning sorrow has come. He is in jail, accused of Beecherism. His wife is the accuser, and he is beset by the most damaging kind of circumstantial evidence. Public sentiment in Lawrence is strong against him. Even his twenty years of pastorate seems to weigh as naught in the balance against the testimony of several officers as to what they saw, and the Rev. Daniel Carr is despondent.—Sun.

"'They shall speak with new tongues.' Let one come here and talk a little in these 'new tongues.' Any one of your many 'dipped' converts will do as a test. If he talks Dutch, Mrs. Shy will understand; if Spanish, aunt Mary will comprehend a little of it; and plain common sense I will try to understand. 'Take up serpents.' Find the Christian and I'll find the 'rattler.' 'Drink any deadly thing.' Let one try a bit of prussic acid if he dares. 'Lay hands on the sick and they shall recover.' Why any need of a death, then, in a Christian family, save from pure old age? 'Cast mountains into the sea by faith.' I'll believe this when I see a 'true Christian' do it. Call ignorant people who differ from you—or wise ones either—'fools,' 'vipers,' 'Satan,' etc., etc. Altogether lovely! 'Resist not evil,' yet scourge money changers out of the temple. That is, use force and compulsion, rather than argument, persuasion, and love, to effect your desires and purposes.

"There! that is Bible Christianity, and directly from its choicest writers, and it is all legitimately deduced from texts and verses which I can mention, if necessary. Now, try and live it out. Show me any one who ever did live it out or ever can do so. Please show me wherein I have misrepresented one iota in all these ear-marks of true Christianity. I do not deny that there is a good side also shown up; but these things I quote are just as much Christianity as is the portion you generally show forth. And I declare them bad doctrine, and as such they prove Christianity to be a bad thing. If true, a man might upset the world, cast a mountain into our mill-dam by faith, and ruin all the business men here; send devils into our hogs, and do—oh! such mean things. I rejoice that prayer and faith are really not such effective weapons as the pious old 'school-book' says they are.

"But since searching the 'record,' I find it harder than ever to decide what a 'true Christian' is, or how there can possibly be one. You have asked me often what objection I had to a 'true Christian,' and referred me to the Bible for a description of one, and I have honestly and fairly shown up such points as I object to in that definition of one; and now I will rest my case till we meet, which I hope will be very, very soon.

CHAPTER XIII.

Now we will take up a few threads in the love-life of our Edith, and see what came of the little romance Sue had gotten up for her during her bridal trip. Mr. Williams, the gentleman whose photograph had made so favorable an impression on Edith, had passed through the town of S—— about three months after Sue's and Charlie's return from O—— (his mother's home and his own), and he stopped at Flowers' and spent a day or two there, renewing the pleasant acquaintance so auspiciously begun in the waters of the little lake. Sue, who had been advised of his coming, had invited Edith there to spend the day; and, being fond of the society of her lively little friend and that of her good, noble, and intellectual husband, Edith had gladly accepted the invitation, though not aware whom she was to meet there. The day passed very pleasantly to them all. Mr. Williams and Edith sang together, and in the sweet concord of sounds they felt that intense joy that only the true lover of music can appreciate. Neither of them had ever before met any one whose voice harmonized so completely with their own; and they found their views to be alike upon so many subjects that the day was gone almost before they realized it. When Edith's horse was brought up for her to go home, Mr. Williams insisted on riding with her, saying his pony had been standing in the stable all day, and needed exercise. Sue stood in the door and watched them off with a wise, knowing smile, as much as to say, "My plans are all working right;" and indeed such seemed to be the case, as it was in the wee, small hours of the morning when Mr. Williams got back to Flowers' and sought his pillow—not to sleep, but to think and dream of Edith.

He had won her promise to correspond with him, and this correspondence had been of great interest, and also a means of improvement to them both. But of late a little cloud had been slowly gathering in the horizon, and it seemed as though a storm might some day overwhelm them with its desolating power and destroy the bright air-castles they had been so carefully rearing. What this cloud was will be seen by the following extract from one of Mr. Williams' letters:

"MY OWN DEAR EDITH: I have many times noticed in your letters passages, strong and eloquent, in which you have portrayed your dislike to the use of tobacco; and in your last letter you say you would never marry a man who smoked or chewed. It is very humiliating to me to be obliged to confess that I do both these things, and have done so ever since I was ten years old. My father, grandfather, and great-grandfather all smoked and chewed, and every male relative I have uses tobacco. I have tried again and again to give it up, especially since I found you are so opposed to its use. But it is all around me; I smell the delicious perfume of the cigar, and my good resolves are all as naught. I see a man take a chew, and my mouth waters, and every nerve in me cries out for it, and I yield. You don't know, Edith, what a slave a man is to the tobacco habit when once it is thoroughly formed—at least when one has used it as long as I have, and inherited so strong an appetite for it. But I am trying once more—making a last final effort to give it up. I am a man of powerful will, but, alas! of powerful appetites and passions as well. I may conquer, and I may not. Time alone will tell which is victorious, myself or my longings for the 'vile weed' you so stigmatize."

All this, and much more, he wrote, and Edith, who had never dreamed that her hero was a "tobacco worm," was stunned and bewildered at the sudden calamity. She felt that her life's happiness was at stake. She could not give him up, and yet she could not marry him if he continued the use of tobacco in any form. She had always called it her pet weakness, this antipathy to the vile weed. She could not bear a tobacco breath, or to smell the smoke from a cigar, or, what was worse yet, an old short black pipe. If compelled for a time to inhale tobacco smoke by being in company with some one who was so inconsiderate as to smoke in the presence of those who never use tobacco, she generally had a fit of sick headache after it; and there was her mother, too, who hated it as badly as she did; and as one home was to be theirs, she, too, must be thought of. All night she lay and wrestled with her thoughts, revolving the subject in every possible way; and at last she came to the conclusion that she would write a series of arguments against tobacco, and tell of its effects upon the mind and body, and describe the disgusting appearance of those who used it as they seemed to one who seldom saw them.

I will not weary the reader with all she wrote, but simply give her main argument against its use and its evil results:

"The first and strongest objection I have, my dear friend, to your use of tobacco is its effect upon your bodily health. It is a rank poison, and only persistent effort will enable one to learn its use. In time the system adapts itself to the innovation, just as it would to that of arsenic, and then it begins to crave the stimulus, precisely as the constitutions of those who have become slaves to strong tea and coffee crave their accustomed invigorators. Tobacco lowers the general tone of the whole physical and mental system. No man who uses it can be perfectly well or happy. The spirits will feel depressed, and all the natural jubilance of pure, healthy, happy humanity will be lost. He may think he feels well, but it is because he has forgotten what real health is. Then its use predisposes to consumption and cancer, as well as many other diseases.

"At a polytechnic school in Paris one of the professors inquired into the habits of one hundred and sixty students there. He found that one hundred and two were smokers and fifty-eight never used the weed, and that in each grade of the school the students who did not smoke outranked those who did, and the scholarship of the smokers steadily deteriorated as the smoking continued; and at last tobacco was forbidden to students as being injurious to physical and mental development. It is always considered as a low and vulgar habit. Clergymen generally use it under protest, and feel criminal in doing so at all, for they know that they are considered to be guides and leaders of the people, and that it is their highest duty to be living examples in their every-day conduct and behavior. The president of a great nation like ours should never smoke, chew, or drink. No teacher or parent should be guilty of these habits, for they are leaders and guides, and they cannot guide with a full heart and earnest spirit unless they first walk therein themselves.

"Dr. Prince, formerly Superintendent of the Northampton Lunatic Asylum, was cited as saying that nearly half the patients at that institution came there from its use. Nearly every one will agree that tobacco is a bad thing to use, but an excellent one to sell, and the money it brings into the South is one great plea here in its favor. But no really conscientious person would care to make money by raising and selling that which is an injury to his race. Henry Ward Beecher, who has uttered many good and true things, says: 'The highest type of manliness involves personal cleanliness, self-denial of injurious indulgences, and a scrupulous regard for the comfort of others—three elements not easily combined with chewing, smoking, and spitting.'

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

Every one will agree with these three propositions of Moritz Wagner's. But we must consider his view, that the migration and the subsequent isolation of the emigrant individuals is a necessary condition for the origin of new species, to be completely erroneous. Wagner says, "Without a long-enduring separation of colonists from their former species, the formation of a new race cannot succeed—selection, in fact, cannot take place. Unlimited crossing, unhindered sexual mingling of all individuals of a species will always produce uniformity, and drive varieties, whose characteristics have not been fixed throughout a series of generations, back to the primary form."

This sentence, in which Wagner himself comprises the main result of his investigations, he would be able to defend only if all organisms were of separate sexes, if every origin of new individuals were possible only by the mingling of male and female individuals. But this is by no means the case. Curiously enough, Wagner says nothing of the numerous hermaphrodites which, possessing both the sexual organs, are capable of self-fructification, and likewise nothing of the countless organisms which are not sexually differentiated.

Now, from the earliest times of the organic history of the earth there have existed thousands of organic species (thousands of which still exist) in which no difference of sex whatever exists, and, in fact, in which no sexual propagation takes place, and which exclusively reproduce themselves in a non-sexual manner by division, budding, formation of spores, etc. All the great mass of Protista, the Monera, Amœbæ, Myxomycetes, Rhizopoda, etc., in short, all the lower organisms which we shall have to enumerate in the domain of Protista, standing midway between the animal and vegetable kingdoms, propagate themselves exclusively in a non-sexual manner. And this domain comprises a class of organisms which is one of the richest in forms, nay, even in a certain respect the richest of all in forms, as all possible geometrical fundamental forms are represented in it. I allude to the wonderful class of the Rhizopoda, or Ray-streamers, to which the lime-shelled Acyttaria and the flint-shelled Radiolaria belong.

It is self-evident, therefore, that Wagner's theory is quite inapplicable to all these non-sexual organisms. Moreover, the same applies to all those hermaphrodites in which every individual possesses both male and female organs and is capable of self-fructification. This is the case, for instance, in the Flat-worms, flukes, and tapeworms, further in the important Sack-worms (Tunicates), the invertebrate relatives of the vertebrate animals, and in very many other organisms of different groups. Many of these species have arisen by natural selection, without a "crossing" of the originating species with its primary form having been possible.

As I have already shown in the eighth chapter, the origin of the two sexes, and consequently sexual propagation in general, must be considered as a process which began only in later periods of the organic history of the earth, being the result of differentiation or division of labor. The most ancient terrestrial organisms can have propagated themselves only in the simplest non sexual manner. Even now all Protista, as well as all the countless forms of cells, which constitute the body of higher organisms, multiply themselves only by non-sexual generation. And yet there arise here "new species" by differentiation in consequence of natural selection.

But even if we were to take into consideration the anima and vegetable species with separate sexes, in this case too we should have to oppose Wagner's chief proposition, that "the migration of organisms and their formation of colonies is the necessary condition of natural selection." August Weismann, in his treatise on the "Influence of Isolation upon the Formation of Species," has already sufficiently refuted that proposition, and has shown that even in one and the same district one bi-sexual species may divide itself into several species by natural selection. In relation to this question, I must again call to mind the great influence which division of labor, or differentiation, possesses, being one of the necessary results of natural selection. All the different kinds of cells constituting the body of the higher organisms, the nerve cells, the muscle cells, gland cells, etc., all these "good species," these "bonæ species" of elementary organisms, have arisen solely by division of labor, in consequence of natural selection, although they not only never were locally isolated, but ever since their origin have always existed in the closest local relations one with another. Now, the same reasoning that applies to these elementary organisms, or "individuals of the first order," applies also to the many-celled organisms of a higher order which only at a later date have arisen as "good species" from among their fellows.

We are, therefore, of the same opinion as Darwin and Wallace, that the migration of organisms and their isolation in their new home is a very advantageous condition for the origin of new species; but we cannot admit, as Wagner asserts, that it is a necessary condition, and that without it no species can arise. Wagner sets up this opinion, "that migration is a necessary condition for natural selection," as a special "law of migration"; but we consider it sufficiently refuted by the above-mentioned facts. We have, moreover, already pointed out that in reality the origin of new species by natural selection is a mathematical and logical necessity which, without anything else, follows from the simple combination of three great facts. These three fundamental facts are: the Struggle for Life, the Adaptability, and the Hereditivity of organisms.

We cannot here enter into details concerning the numerous interesting phenomena furnished by the geographical and topographical distribution of organic species, which are all wonderfully explained by the theory of selection and migration. For these I refer to the writings of Darwin, Wallace, and Moritz Wagner, in which the important doctrine of the limits of distribution—seas, rivers, and mountains—is excellently discussed and illustrated by numerous examples. Only three other phenomena must be mentioned here on account of their special importance. First, the close relation of forms, that is, the striking "family likeness" existing between the characteristic local forms of every part of the globe, and their extinct fossil ancestors in the same part of the globe; secondly, the no less striking "family likeness" between the inhabitants of island groups and those of the neighboring continent from which the islands were peopled; lastly and thirdly, the peculiar character presented in general by the flora and fauna of islands taken as a whole.

All these chorological facts given by Darwin, Wallace, and Wagner—especially the remarkable phenomena of the limited local fauna and flora, the relations of insular to continental inhabitants, the wide distribution of the so-called "cosmopolitan species," the close relationship of the local species of the present day with the extinct species of the same limited territory, the demonstrable radiation of every species from a single central point of creation—all these, and all other phenomena furnished to us by the geographical and the topographical distribution of organisms, are explained in a simple and thorough manner by the theory of selection and migration, while without it they are simply incomprehensible. Consequently, in the whole of this series of phenomena we find a new and weighty proof of the truth of the Theory of Descent.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.—CONTINUED.

The condition of slaves under the Christian system remained essentially the same for two hundred years. The abolition of the punishment of crucifixion and the law forbidding the separation of families of slaves were beneficent measures. There were others, however, of a different character. For instance, if a slave and his mistress had improper relations, the woman was executed and the slave burnt alive. Under paganism the woman was simply reduced to slavery. Another bad law was that of Gratian, which was to the effect that any slave who accused his master of any offense, high treason alone excepted, should be burnt alive, without any inquiry into the justice of the charge. Slavery was formally and distinctly recognized by Christianity, and it encouraged docility and passive obedience on the part of the slave. None of the Fathers condemned it as the Essenes had in the first century. It is true that the Church, by creating a new relation for the slave, by allowing him to participate in the religious service, and by giving prominence to the servile virtues which were encouraged by monastic life, did something to mitigate the hardships of slave life, yet the system continued under Christianity eight hundred years from the time of Constantine, and the number subject to it, historians have declared, was greater in the Empire under Christianity than under paganism. Shall we be told that a religion under which slavery flourished for nearly a thousand years led to the abolition of the institution?

During the reign of Christianity, no doubt, admirable institutions for the poor were founded, and monkish corporations were formed and devoted to deeds of love.

To a great extent this was due to the same pure benevolence which had its source in the human soul wherever civilized man is found, and which had prompted to similar efforts on a less extensive scale, perhaps, in Egypt, India, Judea, Greece, and pagan Rome. The credit of founding lunatic asylums, so often claimed for Christianity, belongs to the Mohammedans of the seventh century. No lunatic asylum existed in Christendom until the fifteenth century, and then in places in close proximity to the Mohammedans.

Just as the gratuitous distribution of corn was among the prominent causes of idleness and corruption in pagan Rome, so the charity of the Church, by multiplying beggars and promoting indolence, had an exceedingly injurious influence in the Christian Empire. Consider the thousands without means withdrawn from the fields of productive labor, the multitudes of saints wandering about the country begging money to give to beggars, encouraging indiscriminate alms-giving, habits of improvidence, admiration for poverty, and antipathy to labor.

"The Monastic movement," Gibbon tells us, "was not less rapid or universal than that of Christianity itself." One small Egyptian city devoted itself almost wholly to ascetic life, and in its monasteries lived ten thousand monks and twenty thousand virgins. At the close of the fourth century, the monastic population of Egypt equaled the entire population of its cities.

The Empire swarmed with men whose only business was to wander from place to place, asking alms and collecting stories of miracles, and peculiarities of the saints for the benefit of the Church. "A hideous, sordid, and emaciated maniac, without knowledge, without patriotism, without natural affection, passing his life in a long routine of useless and atrocious self-torture, and quailing before the ghastly phantoms of his delirious brain, had become the ideal of the nations which had known the writings of Plato and Cicero and the lives of Socrates and Cato" (Lecky's Morals, vol. ii, p. 107). To separate from his family if he had one, and to show no regard to the mother that bore him were thought by the hermit as the most acceptable offerings he could make to God.

The feeling that prevailed toward woman is illustrated by the story of a monk who was traveling with his mother, and coming to a stream which he had to cross, he wrapped his hands in cloth, lest in conveying her across the water, he should touch his mother, and thereby disturb the equilibrium of his saintly nature.

A law of Justinian prohibited parents from restraining their children from entering monasteries. Exhorted by the Fathers, multitudes of women adopted the ascetic life. Some of the Fathers wrote treatises to show that those who entered monasteries contrary to the wishes of their parents were more worthy than those who did so unopposed by parental authority. St. Crysostom said damnation awaited those who should attempt to prevent their children entering these institutions.

Practiced with no object except to make sure of a place in heaven, the effects of this asceticism must have been very injurious on the general character of its devotees.

The estimate of woman was very low in the Christian Empire. "Woman was represented as the door of hell, as the mother of all human ills. She should be ashamed of the very thought that she is a woman. She should live in continual penance on account of the curses she had brought upon the world. She should be ashamed of her dress, for it is the memorial of her fall. She should especially be ashamed of her beauty, fo it is the most potent instrument of the demon. . . . Women were even forbidden by a provincial council, in the sixth century, on account of their impurity, to receive the eucharist in their naked hands. Their essentially subordinate position was continually maintained.

"It is probable that this teaching had its part in determining the principles of legislation concerning the sex. The pagan laws during the Empire had been continually repealing the old disabilities of women, and the legislative movement in their favor continued with unabated force from Constantine to Justinian, and appeared also in some of the early laws of the barbarians. But in the whole feudal legislation, women were placed in a much lower legal position than in the pagan Empire. In addition to the personal restrictions which grew necessarily out of the Catholic Christian doctrines concerning divorce, and the subordination of the weaker sex, we find numerous and stringent enactments, which rendered it impossible for women to succeed to any considerable amount of property, and which almost reduced them to the alternative of marriage or a nunnery. The complete inferiority of the sex was continually maintained by law; and that generous public opinion which in Rome had frequently revolted against the injustice done to girls, in depriving them of the greater part of the inheritance of their fathers, totally disappeared. Wherever the canon law has been the basis of legislation, we find laws of succession sacrificing the interests of daughters and of wives, and a state of public opinion which has been formed and regulated by these laws; nor was any serious attempt made to abolish them till the close of the last century. The French Revolutionists, though rejecting the proposal of Siéyés and Condorcet to accord political emancipation to women, established at least an equal succession of sons and daughters, and thus initiated, a great reformation of both law and opinion, which sooner or later must traverse the world" (Lecky's Hist. Morals, vol. ii. pp. 438–340).

"No society," says Maine, "which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions, is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by the middle Roman law" (Ancient Law. p. 158).

Under Christianity, patriotism so necessary to the defense of the state, was continually discouraged. The heroes of Rome could inspire the Christians with no admiration, and they steadfastly, from the first, refused to take part in any demonstrations expressive of attachment to country; with a home and a country in another world, they were, consistently enough, indifferent to the secular interests of this. When Rome was invaded by the Vandal, the invasion was regarded "as a just and heaven-commissioned visitation," and "resistance a vain, almost an impious struggle to avert inevitable punishment', (Milman's Latin Christianity, vol. ii, p. 206).

"Asceticism, drawing all the enthusiasm of Christendom to the desert life, and elevating as an ideal the extreme and absolute abnegation of all patriotism, formed," says Lecky, "the culmination of the movement, and was undoubtedly one cause of the downfall of the Roman Empire" (Hist. Morals, vol. ii, p. 141).

"The genius and the virtue that might have defended the Empire were engaged in fierce disputes about the Pelagian controversy, at the very time when Alaric was encircling Rome with his armies, and there was no subtlety of theological metaphysics which did not kindle a deeper interest in the Christian leaders than the throes of their expiring country. The moral enthusiasm that in other days would have fired the armies of Rome with an invincible valor, impelled thousands to abandon their country and their homes, and consume the weary hours in a long routine of useless and horrible macerations. . . . Many of the Christians contemplated, with an indifference that almost amounted to complacency what they regarded as the predicted ruin of the city of the fallen gods. . . . The immortal pass of Thermopylæ was surrendered without a struggle to the Goths. A pagan writer accused the monks of having betrayed it. It is more probable that they had absorbed or diverted the heroism that in other days would have defended it" (Ibid, pp. 142–3). How evident it is that the subversion of the Roman, to which the darkness of the middle ages was so largely due, was encouraged by the policy, if not sometimes aided, by the direct efforts of the Christian Church.

Letter from a Western Convert.

A BOY'S OPINION OF CHRISTIANITY.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Teacher: One year ago to-day I read the following in a leading St. Joseph paper;

"Read Thomas Paine's works before you condemn them."

At that time I was a firm believer in the Episcopal doctrine. Being accustomed to hearing Paine denounced as a Godless Infidel, this article from the press in his defense made me interested, and out of curiosity I ordered, through our news agent, a copy of Paine's works. In due season I received a handsomely bound volume from the publishing house of D. M. Bennett. At first I was like the man who had drawn the chief prize in a circus lottery—the elephant; I didn't know what to do with it. I was afraid to read it for the sake of my soul; so I laid it away.

Some months later I picked it up abstractedly and began running over its pages. Suddenly these words struck my eye: "I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life." Thinking there could be no harm in reading the works of a man who could utter such sentiments, I read on and finished the volume.

To say that I was staggered would hardly give my true feelings. I said to myself, "This can never be; the man Paine is wrong. I will read the Scripture carefully, and see if it bears out these terrible charges." Out came the family Bible, which had been in the family for years and whose truths had never been doubted. "Ha, ha," I laughed, "we will soon prove Paine wrong." The more I read, the more convinced did I become that he was right and that I had been for years believing in a book that had no more truth in it than the "Arabian Nights." From that moment I was a different man. I knew I was a man, and not the poor, crawling, miserable worm I had believed I was.

In the same book I saw advertisements of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Rev. "Triptolemus Tub." I secured copies of each, and found that THE TRUTH SEEKER suited me exactly. I immediately sent in my subscription for three months. I still take it, and hope to get a copy every week till I die.

From THE TRUTH SEEKER I acquired a taste for truth-seeking books, and at different times I secured copies of "Analysis of Religious Belief," "World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Heathens of the Heath," Volney's "Ruins," Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary," "Koran," "Christianity and Infidelity," four volumes of Tracts, and last but not least, the greatest literary boon of modern times, the "Champions of the Church, their Crimes and Persecutions," well worth its weight in gold.

No wonder Anthony Comstock wished to place an injunction upon it, for no man likes the truth told about himself, especially if it showed him up in his true colors. The article on Anthony Comstock alone is worth the price of the book.

By judiciously lending the above books I have secured no less than fourteen members from the folds of the Christian Church, much to the disgust and consternation of the ministers, who have denounced me as an ungodly Infidel, from the pulpit. I am, like you, Mr. Bennett, proud of the name.

Allow me, before I close, to give you the opinions of a reformed Christian:

1. That the Bible is taken from the Shasta, the Vedas, the Talmud, and the writings of the heathen sages.

2. That the miracles described in the Bible are silly and untrue, as well as useless.

3. That Jesus Christ is a myth, existing only in the Bible; that he was, as therein described, a dead beat and a communist; that he had no respect for the burial of the dead; that his teachings were all second-handed; that he was an anti-Murphy, and set many bad examples to wine drinkers; that when he died on the cross he could not save himself—let alone saving all mankind.

4. That there are $200,000,000 spent annually for the support of churches and clerical wind-bags; that if that vast sum of money was only devoted to the interests of the public schools, it would do more real and lasting good.

5. That over 300,000,000 people have been slain by Christian wars, and that blood enough has been shed to float all the ships in the world.

Respectfully, R. W. RIGGS.

XVIII.

We will conclude this chapter by an extract from Father Secchi's work on "The Sun," in which he summarizes the facts hitherto ascertained concerning the great orb of day.

"That igneous globe, a source of life, and cause of motion amongst the planets, was once a nebulous mass like those which we now see in the depths of the sky. This mass as it grew cool gave birth to the planets and their satellites. It still preserves in its midst all the heat which must have resulted from its condensation and the collapse of its different particles, which, from the furthest limits of its domain, have, in obedience to the law of attraction, fallen towards the center.

"This enormous mass, undergoing the phases of gradual cooling through which the planets around it have passed, may one day lose the whole of its present brilliancy, but it will yet be millions upon millions of years before this takes place.

"The gaseous composition of the Sun accounts for the phenomena which we notice upon its surface. The part which is exposed on the outside to radiation towards the regions beyond loses its gaseous constitution as it gets cool; it remains condensed in the shape of masses, vaporous but incandescent, in the gaseous and transparent atmosphere by which the globe is surrounded, forming a brilliant stratum which we call the photosphere. This stratum, like the interior of the solar body itself, is the seat of vast chemical processes and physical movements of a very complicated character. Causes as yet unknown, transporting considerable masses from the interior to the exterior, create immense gaps in the luminous stratum, and so give rise to the spots. The center of these gaps, more obscure and more absorbent, cuts off from us the great majority of the luminous rays emanating from the central nucleus, composed as they are of a gaseous matter and quite isolated from each other.

"Above this luminous stratum spreads the atmosphere, formed of transparent vapors, which attain various degrees of altitude according to their specific weight. Hydrogen, being the least dense of all these substances, floats at a great altitude, forming columns and clouds which constitute the red prominences seen about the Sun during an eclipse. Iron and calcium are the substances most abundant in the hollow of the spots and in the rents of the photosphere.

"The Sun's atmosphere is vast, extending to a distance equal to the fourth of the solar radius; it is elliptic in shape, with a greater elevation at the equator than at the poles. In the equatorial regions, in the vicinity of the spots more especially, there is a higher degree of activity than at the poles, as is seen by the greater brilliancy and altitude of the atmospheric envelope itself.

"The spectroscope, in revealing to us the chemical composition of the Sun, has taught us that the substances of which it is formed are identical with those which constitute the terrestral bodies. And yet we are far from possessing a knowledge as to the nature of all these substances."

The information contained in this chapter shows the progress made in the researches as to the Sun, and the rapidity with which they have been prosecuted since the discovery of spectrum analysis.

CHAPTER IV.

MERCURY.

MERCURY is the nearest known planet to the sun, and the smallest of the eight large planets. Its mean distance from the sun is 40 millions of miles, and its diameter about one-third that of the earth. It was well known to the ancients, being visible to the naked eye at favorable times, if the observer is not in too high a latitude. The central and northern regions of Europe are so unfavorably situated for seeing it that it is said Copernicus died without ever having been able to obtain a view of it. The difficulty of seeing it arises from its proximity to the sun, as it seldom sets more than an hour and a half after the sun, or arises more than that length of time before it. Hence, when the evening is sufficiently advanced to allow it to be seen, it is commonly so near the horizon as to be lost in the vapors which are seen in that direction. Still, by watching for favorable moments, it can be seen several times in the course of the year in any part of the United States. The following are favorable times for seeing it after sunset:

1877.....May 3d, August 26th, December 25th.
1878.....April 14th, August 9th, December 9th.
1879.....March 28th, July 23d, November 21st.

The corresponding times in subsequent years may be found by subtracting 18 days from the dates for each year; that is, they will occur eighteen days earlier in 1879 than in 1878; eighteen days earlier in 1880 than in 1879, and so on. It is not necessary to look on the exact days we have given, as the planet is generally visible for fifteen or twenty days at a time. Each date given is about the middle of the period of visibility, which extends a week or ten days on each side. The best time for looking is in the evening twilight, about three-quarters of an hour after sunset, the spring is in this respect much more favorable than autumn.

Mercury shines with a brilliant white light, brighter than that of any fixed star, except, perhaps, Sirius. It does not seem so bright as Sirius, because it can never be seen at night except very near the horizon. Owing to the great eccentricity of its orbit and the great variations of its distance from the earth, its brilliancy varies considerably; but the favorable times we have indicated are near those of greatest brightness.

Viewed with a telescope under favorable conditions, Mercury is seen to have phases like the moon. When beyond the sun, it seems round and small, being only about five minutes in diameter. When seen to one side of the sun, near its greatest apparent angular distance, it appears like a half-moon. When nearly between the sun and earth, its diameter is between ten seconds and twelve seconds, but only a thin crescent is visible. The manner in which these various phases are connected with the position of the planet relative to the earth and sun is the same as in the case of Venus, and will be shown in the next section.

About the beginning of the present century Schröter, the celebrated astronomer of Lilienthal, who made the telescopic study of the planets a speciality, thought that at times, when Mercury presented the aspect of a crescent, the south horn of this crescent seemed blunted at certain intervals. He attributed this appearance to the shadow of a lofty mountain, and by observing the times of its return was led to the conclusion that the planet revolved on its axis in twenty-four hours five minutes. He also estimated the height of the mountain at twelve miles. But the more powerful instruments of modern times have not confirmed these conclusions, and they are now considered as quite doubtful, if not entirely void of foundation. That is, we must regard the time of rotation of Mercury on its axis, and, of course, the position of that axis, as not known with certainty, but as perhaps very nearly twenty-four hours.

The supposed atmosphere of Mercury, the deviation of its body from a spherical form, and many other phenomena which observers have described, must be received with the same skepticism. No deviation from a spherical form can be considered as proved, the discordance of the measures showing that the supposed deviations are really due to errors of observation. So, also, the appearances which many observers have attributed to an atmosphere are all to be regarded as optical illusions, or as due to the imperfections of the telescope made use of. From measures of its light at various phases Zöllner has been led to the conclusion that Mercury, like our moon, is devoid of any atmosphere sufficiently dense to reflect the light of the sun. If this doubt and uncertainty seems surprising, it must be remembered that the nearness of this planet to the sun renders it a very difficult object to observe with accuracy. We must look at it either in the daytime, when the air is disturbed by the sun's rays, or in the early evening, when the planet is very near the horizon, and therefore in an unfavorable situation.

Transits of this planet across the face of the sun are much more frequent than those of Venus, the average interval between successive transits being less than ten years, and the longest interval thirteen years. These transits are always looked upon with great interest by astronomers, on account of the questions to which they have given rise. From the earliest ages in which it was known that Mercury moved around the sun, it was evident that it must sometimes pass between the earth and the sun; but its diameter is too small to admit of its being seen in this position with the naked eye. The first actual observation of Mercury projected on the face of the sun was made by Gassendi, on November 7, 1631. His mode of observation for viewing the solar spots was by throwing the image of the sun on a screen by means of a small telescope. He came near missing his observation, owing to his having expected that the planet would look much larger than it did. The imperfect telescopes of that time surrounded every brilliant object with a band of diffused light which greatly increased its apparent magnitude, so that Gassendi had no idea how small the planet really was.

Gassendi's observation was hardly accurate enough to be of any scientific value at the present time. It was not until 1677 that a really good observation was made. Halley, of England, in that year was on the island of St. Helena, and, being provided with superior instruments, was fortunate enough to make a complete observation of a transit of Mercury over the sun which occurred on November 7th.

The following are the dates at which it has been calculated that transits of Mercury will occur during the remainder of the present century. The first transit will be visible over the whole United States, and the second on the Pacific coast.

1878.....May 6th.	1894.....Nov. 10th.

Conventions in Western New York.

WATKINS.—FREEVILLE.—A BULLDOZED JURY.—JOSIE IN JAIL.

DEAR BENNETT: While at Watkins I received an invitation to address the "First Annual Convention of Freethinkers and Spiritualists," then appointed to be held at Freeville, N. Y., on Sunday, September 1st. I accordingly found myself in Freeville last Sunday, and met there the gathered thousands of the friends of mental liberty and spiritual progress of that region. Freeville is a new railroad centre between Auburn and Owego; and four railroad trains, specially chartered for this more than ordinarily righteous Sunday work, came in from four directions laden with our style of meeting-going citizens. Besides, the horse-power of all the country around hauled in, in all sorts of vehicles, many hundreds of others. The day was as delightful as any of those that shone down upon us in Watkins. The convention was held in a beautiful grove. A well-drilled local choir discoursed music that seemed as harmonious, and stirred us with as lively emotions, as any ever heard under any steeple. It was difficult to believe that it was Infidel music; but I am afraid it was.

The morning session was addressed by Amelia H. Colby—and I am glad I didn't sell a "Cupid's Yokes" and get shut up at Watkins, and so have failed to hear this grand, brave woman. She is a magnificent structure on the most approved mental and physical model—about two hundred and fifty pounds of well-proportioned woman of the Roman matron style. I wish all the world could have heard her, and, with a trifle of addition to her voice, they might. I never heard so powerful, so sonorous a voice in a woman. It is specially adapted to grove-meetings, of which she has addressed many hundreds. She can compete successfully with rattling leaves, loud talkers, crying children, and neighing horses; and, in a church, no snorer could be heard enough to disturb the meeting. And yet it is a voice which the fair owner—for she is fair—knows how to manage with artistic and thrilling effect.

We met the night before, and talked over the Watkins convention, the resolutions, the arrests, and the exciting times there. The theme was uppermost; the people had heard something about it, and wanted to know more; so she took for the subject of her discourse, "The Watkins Convention;" and she came to its support bravely and well, and denounced the pious conspirators against intellectual and social freedom with all the force and fervor which a brave, talented, untrammeled woman can bring to bear on such a subject.

In the afternoon my own ordeal came, and I trembled under the responsibility of attempting to address so large an audience who had come together under the expectation of hearing the highest and best truth there is going. However, I told them what I knew about "social evolution," and traced the architecture and the industries of the wild and savage creatures who have now grown to be men up to their present wonderful stage of development; and drew some conclusions as to what home, the human dwelling, and the housing of the people are likely to be in the future. I constructed for them a socialism which they do not read of in the newspapers, and of which no one has any reason to be afraid.

Much more that is interesting might be said about this Convention, but other incidents of my trip must have attention. I went from Freeville on Monday morning to Watkins to see the state of things then existing in that town of "arrested development." I found a marked change in our favor among the people generally; though the same bitterness, hostility, and determination to proceed to extremities existed among the orthodox party. The people, however, had talked the matter over and had come to their senses. When the arrests were first made, the active fomenters had gone around town screaming "Obscenity! Oh obscenity! Bad books in Watkins! 'Cupid's Yokes!' Bible abridged! Hairs all on one plate, and no butter on the other! For shame, shocking, shoo fly! 'Sh—," yes, all the 'shs they could think of. The community was at first so bulldozed they really thought something was the matter. They rushed to the doors and stuck their heads out of the windows as if there was a fire or a fight; but when no head broke and nothing blazed, they all jeered the getters up of the false alarm and then went about their business.

I heard from several sources that the Grand Jury had been fairly bullied into bringing in bills against the persons accused of obscenity. I heard that the Grand Jury three times voted to reject the indictment, and the Judge finally instructed the Jury that they must agree and must bring in an indictment. I heard that all this would not do, and that finally two clergymen were let in on the jury to labor with them and persuade them to bring in charges and put the accused on trial. In such a body of men, though bound to secrecy, there are always some who will leak; and one legal gentleman assured me that on Wednesday evening one juror declared that they had not agreed and that there was no prospect that they would agree to indictment; and this gentleman believes that some most extraordinary influence must have been brought to bear, after that, to secure the action demanded by the orthodox party. How's this for tampering with a jury? Col. Sellers hugging the foreman of the jury trying his client is the only parallel I can quote among the legal precedents. If these asserted irregularities can be established they will make a very important part of the case, and they alone will quash the indictments. They will be investigated.

I called at the jail on Miss Josephine Tilton. I found her serene and happy, and as determined as ever to rent her room by the quarter and board by the season on the bounty of the Watkins people. Her street shoes had been buried at the bottom of her baggage, and her bonnet wrapped up and stowed away, not needed for immediate use. The sheriff had promised to have her little room furnished and whitewashed, and she had planted herself down for a three months' siege, awaiting trial.

But I brought her news and considerations from the outside world, which modified her decision and "changed the current of her sinless years."

In my conversation with the people, her friends as well as enemies, I found them generally admiring her grit and energy, but they thought she was carrying her "spunk" too far. They sympathized with martyrdom, but not when it was self-imposed. They thought she ought not to put the county to the expense of keeping her when the bail was so low (only $500) and easily procured. If the bail had been excessive and difficult to find, that would be good reason for refusing it; otherwise it ought to be accepted. This feeling among the citizens, from among whom a jury must be selected, would tend to her prejudice on the trial. They would feel like saying, and certainly would be asked by the prosecution to say, "If she likes prison so well we will give her enough of it." Then if her case should be tried first and decided against her, it would affect the other cases unfavorably, and she ought not to throw cost on others.

Mrs. Ingalls, who had been her preliminary bail, and was willing to continue, came in opportunely, and we talked the matter over pro and con. I urged that the men had all availed themselves of their privileges, and out they went. But bail was as good for a woman as for men, and I wasn't going to urge her to seek a martyrdom that the men had declined, and especially at so cheap a rate. We finally concluded, "Josie" coming very reluctantly to the conclusion, that she had better accept bail and leave the prison. The controlling motive with her was that her action might injuriously affect others; if she stood alone, she protested that she would stay in jail till her trial.

It was by this time late in the afternoon, but the court was still in session. We went immediately over. Mrs. Ingalls offered and was accepted as bail, and Miss Tilton was free. The next thing to do was to dig out from their depths those shoes and that bonnet, and otherwise pack up. The fruits and flowers that had been sent in to her were distributed among the prisoners left behind, with whom she had established herself as a friend and favorite, good-byes were said, and we all left the lock-up. Josephine came on with me to New York for a little needed rest after the excitement of the previous weeks. Her letters will be forwarded to her, and she may be addressed to my care, 201 East 71st street." She proposes in a few days to commence a tour of canvassing for The Word and the various books of Mr. Heywood—selling her way towards Watkins, where she will arrive in time for her trial. May she find many friends and patrons along her line of travel. THERON C. LELAND.

The World Moves.

The recent interesting phenomena of the heavens have naturally engaged the attention of scientific thinkers. A few of these, calling to mind the sublime combats of the past on the battle fields of astronomy, have, perhaps, dropped a silent tear to the memories of those grand old heroes, Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler.

Gazing down the centuries, we behold the Church, both Catholic and Protestant, with all its dogma, superstition, ignorance, and cruelty, arrayed in one vast consolidated army against those three brave men successively. Its instruments of warfare, Inquisition, torture, prison, fire, and sword; theirs, earnest investigation of the arcana of nature, and the pen.

No ancient or modern battle field of the earth, no contending hosts, with all the awful paraphernalia of war, can vie in moral sublimity with the opposing forces on the battle fields of science.

Did not Scripture teach that the earth was flat and had four corners? that the sun and stars journeyed around it every twenty-four hours? that Joshua caused the solar luminary to lengthen out the day for his divine work of bloodshed and carnage? Should these vile heretics oppose inspiration and the churches?

The germs of truth in regard to the motion, correct position, and relation of the heavenly bodies had found place in the minds of a few earnest men at a very early date, but the cold slime of a dogmatic theology covered the face of Europe as with a fetid pall, and it was reserved for Copernicus, near the beginning of the sixteenth century, to first announce to the world that the sun is the center of the solar system, that the earth has two motions, one on its axis, and one around the sun.

He had written his great work on the "Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies;" during thirty years it was kept a secret, only known to a few friends, through fear of the anathemas of the Church. Finally it was published by Oslander, with a lie for a preface, and a copy was placed in the hands of its author a short time before he ceased to breathe.

Who can imagine the feelings of this dying man, his eager, extended hand trembling with age and disease, the death dew on his wrinkled, massive brow, as he looked with dimmed and glassy eyes upon this immortal volume?—this volume which should declare to the infinite generations, "The world moves!" He soon expired, his icy fingers clasping the loved book, and thus cheated the Church of its living prey. But even the marble shield of death could not protect the silent victim from its cruel vengeance.

Copernicus was a learned, good man; his life had been spent in the cause of education and humanity. As a physician, he had freely given his services to the poor, without money and without price, and this, too, while pursuing the arduous duties of his professorship, yet no friend, for a third of a century, dared to record on his tombstone a memorial of his scientific discoveries.

His book was condemned by the high prelates of the Church; to read it was to incur damnation. The battering-rams of old theology were set to work to beat back the unholy doctrines of the heliocentric theory. From shadows of cathedrals and cloisters, like bats and ill-favored birds of prey, came sermons and treatises declaring that the earth was the center and immovable, for the Lord had spoken through his inspired penman, "The earth standeth fast forever."

Protestants went hand in hand with Catholics in persecuting the memory of Copernicus, in ridiculing and abusing his book. Luther called him ugly names, and quoted Joshua's wonderful performance to prove the earth an immovable center. Even the sweet-tempered Melancthon was not backward in persecution. He wrote articles condemning Copernicus, declaring that "the earth can be nowhere except in the center of the universe."

Truth may be crushed, but it cannot die. This new truth had found lodgment in the minds of many men, but only one brave tongue dared to utter it. Bruno believed it and promulgated it; he was hunted from land to land like one guilty of high crime, by the despicable sleuth hounds of dogmatism until he turned upon his pursuers with terrible invectives. He was seized, imprisoned six years, then burned alive, amid the jeers and scoffs of his enemies, and his ashes thrown to the wind.

Still the earth moved on, and ten years after the martyrdom of brave Giordano Bruno the telescope of Galileo established the truth of the revolution of the world around the sun, and glorified Copernicus. The enemies of the dead king of astronomical science had said during his life, "If your theories were true, Venus would show phases like the moon." In real royal meekness he had replied, "You are right; God is good; and we shall in time find this to be so;" and the telescope of Galileo, rude and simple though it was, showed the phases of Venus. Preachers and learned laymen declared these appearances to be illusions of the devil, and it was rank heresy to even look through the instrument.

Theologians avowed that these grand discoveries in astronomy upset the whole plan of salvation; if the earth was a planet, and there were other planets, they too must be inhabited. These inhabitants could not have sprung from Adam and Eve, and could not have been redeemed by the death of Christ. So the persecutions of Galileo were cruel and long, and he was stigmatized as an Infidel and Atheist. But night after night, while the planetary worlds, with their attendant satellites, swept through the infinity of space, the old philosopher studied the heavens with his humble telescope, and announced the discovery of mountains and valleys in the moon; announced that this orb shone by the reflected light of the sun. Here, again, was heresy, said the Church; for did not the inspired volume declare the moon to be "another great light, like the sun?"

Then the accursed telescope revealed spots on the sun, and their phenomena plainly showed its revolutions on its axis. The Church's cup of venom was full to overflowing. Galileo was imprisoned, persecuted, and worried, till weakened in mind and body.

I never read his recantation without tears of wrath and pity springing to my eyes—wrath and bitter contempt because of the wretched minions of the Church's tender pity for the harassed old man of three score and ten. Bigots worthy to be hated through all the coming ages by all the yet unborn generations forced him to kneel and say, "I, Galileo, being in my seventieth year, and on my knees before your eminence, having before my eyes the Holy Gospel, which I touch with my hands, do abjure, curse, and detest the error and the heresy of the movement of the earth."

O Galileo! aged, feeble, tortured Galileo! Would to all that is good, brave, and courageous thou couldst have been spared this dishonor. And still the Church poured out her poison animus upon him; it had no bowels of compassion. He was exiled from family and friends, deprived of all opportunities to carry on his noble investigations, and commanded never to speak of his loved theories. He became blind, and wasted almost to a skeleton. Even death could not put a stop to their cruel persecutions, and his last dying request that he might rest in his own family tomb was denied him. When in a scientific work he was spoken of in a kindly manner as "renowned," the dignitaries of the Church ordered the word to be expunged and "notorious" put in its place.

He was buried in a stranger's grave, without ceremony, monument, or epitaph. A century afterwards all that remained of him was placed in his family tomb at Santa-Croll and a monument erected to his memory; but no words were allowed to be engraven thereon that were not first submitted to the tribunal of the Inquisition.

The Church was flattered at her success in the warfare against the bold Infidelity that said the world moves, and considered herself the victor; but as I said before, truth never dies.

Copernicus and Galileo had supposed the planets moved in circular orbits. A new investigator arose. Kepler discovered the orbits to be ellipses and the paths of the secondaries to be the same curve. He next determined the dimensions of the orbits and to what the velocities and times of revolution of the planets were proportioned.

Kepler was ridiculed, persecuted, hunted like a wild beast, bayed down, and imprisoned; but investigators increased in number, and science conquered on the battle-field of the heavens. Still, from time to time, the Church has renewed the fight against the science of astronomy—"falsely so-called" even up to the nineteenth century.

The planets move on; eclipses occur; instead of panics and prayers to Mumbo Jumbo to avert some terrible calamity he had made up his mind to send upon mankind, Infidel and Christian calmly look through the same piece of smoked glass to observe the phenomena.

Yes, the world moves — the world of thought in the orbit of reason, around the effulgent sun of science. The Church has become dimmed; it is no longer the center of the universe. Dark spots, poisonous valleys in which grow the upas trees of bigotry and dogmatism, horrible crevasses and frightful cañons cross and recross its wrinkled surface, while fiery volcanoes and stormy upheavals are rending its very vitals.

Heywood, Truelove, Besant, Chase, be patient and brave. The world moves; and with those grand warriors who fought for truth on the battle-field of astronomy, you are immortal. Seaver and Mendum, Bennett, Underwood, Ingersoll, Henderson, Monroe, Slenker, and a host whose name is legion, are battling for human freedom—for freedom of thought, word, and action.

After the night of superstition and mental slavery will surely come the morning. Take courage in your prisons; have heart amid your persecutions. The great voice of Humanity sends up the glad notes in full rhythmic octaves, "The world moves!" All Nature joyfully shouts back, in grand diapason tone, "THE WORLD MOVES!"

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

I.

Voltaire had a very stormy youth—ordinary parturition of great men.

A student in the college Louis-le-Grand, directed by the Jesuits, to whom he was destined to give such rude blows, he filled his teachers with admiration.

A celebrated Aspasia, who loved science, intelligence, and liberty as much as love, Ninon de L'Enclos, was so much charmed with the keen intellect of the young collegian that she desired to be his intellectual godmother. She bequeathed him in her will two thousand pistoles "for the purchase of books."

His classical studies were hardly terminated when Voltaire abandoned himself to his poetical inspiration. Quatrains and epigrams already circulated around him. His father, M. Arouet, payer of fees in the Chamber of Accounts, absolutely desiring to cauterize the poetical mania of his son, and to prevent him from sacrificing to the muses, in order to make him like himself a model notary, imagined nothing better than to banish him to Holland, near the Embassador of France, the Marquess of Châteauneuf.

At Hague, in spite of the rigid supervision of the Marquess, the young Arouet lighted up the foggy sky of Holland with the sun of his youth. He began an amorous intrigue with Olympia Dunoyer, whom he surnamed Pimpette. The young girl was to that degree enamored with Arouet that she would come to see him in masculine disguise.

This affair did not suit the mother, Theresa Dunoyer, an intriguing woman, who aspired to wed Pimpette to some high personage. It seems that Cavalier, the hero of the Cévennes, was among the pretenders to the hand of Olympia.

To avoid a scandal, and being interested in managing Pimpette's mother, then director of the Quintessence, a magazine of clippings, of piquant anecdotes and flippant gossips, the Embassador interrupted the relations of the lovers by sending Voltaire back to his father, to whom he described him as incorrigible, incapable of being held in check, and a precocious rascal. He represented his amorous prank in the blackest colors in his missive, which he began thus:

"I have no more hope for your son. He is twice cracked: in love and a poet."

He called those things follies, the old diplomat!

Paraphrasing him, the good man Arouet dolefully said:

"I have for my sons two fools: the one in verse, the other in prose."

The "fool in prose" was the elder brother of Voltaire, who had become Jansenist.

Voltaire returned to France by the way of Gand, whence he wrote to his Pimpette.

In 1716 he was banished to Sully-sur-Loire for having lampooned the doings of the Regent and his girls. He enlivened that retreat by agreeable relations with Mademoiselle de Corsambleu, who had a taste for the stage, and who, four years later, made her début in a production of Voltaire, Artémire. The production and the débutante fell, the one upon the other.

In the course of the year 1717, Voltaire, once more in Paris, was accused, wrongly this time, of being the author of a satire entitled J'ai Vu (I Have Seen), which ended thus:

"I have seen, 'tis enough, the Jesuit adored."

The supposed author of the J'ai Vu was thrown into the Bastille. There he composed the cantos of his Henriade, and came out only in April, 1718. The Marquess of Nocé, designing to save Voltaire from exile, which was customary and of right after an incarceration in the Bastille, sought to reconcile him with the Regent, and conducted him to a reception at the Palais Royal. A storm burst out overhead.

Voltaire, looking at the sky, cried out in the midst of the courtiers:

"If a Regent governed up there, things could not go on any worse!"

The Marquess of Nocé, when presenting Voltaire to Philip of Orleans, said to him:

"My lord, this is the young Arouet whom you have just taken out of the Bastille and whom you are going to send there again;" and he related the sally about the storm.

The Regent, who was as witty as licentious, philosopher in his own good hours, burst out with laughter, and spoke of giving a pension to Voltaire, who thus replied to him:

"I thank your Royal Highness for your bounty in taking charge of my dinner-table, but I pray you never more to provide my lodging."

However, Voltaire found it necessary to seek the country air and to go to Châtenay, where his father had engaged to have him watched over by one of his relatives. After passing some time in that forced retreat, he returned to the capital, and brought out at the Theatre Français his tragedy of Œdipe, which was applauded, and of which the two following famous lines soon passed from mouth to mouth:

"Our priests are not, in truth, what a vain people see;
Their craft is only born of our credulity."

Somewhat making light of his own production, the author appeared upon the stage, carrying the train of the high priest.

As soon as the work was printed, Voltaire sent a copy of it to Jean Baptiste Rousseau, who answered him from Brussels by a letter, of which we give the conclusion:

"I would say a great many things concerning the excellent work you have sent me. . . . But I hope that we will meet in Brussels, and there have the pleasure of discoursing upon many things which would be too tedious to write."

In May, 1719, another harsh measure fell upon Voltaire, to whom was attributed the Sophomoric poem flung at the Regent, the Philippics. Voltaire was once more banished from Paris. He led a wandering life, now at Sully, with the duke, now with the Maréchale de Villars, with whom he fell in love, now in Touraine, at la Source, with Lord Bolingbroke, a man of learning and a Freethinker, banished from his country through the intrigues of the Jacobites, and who had married a French woman, Madame de Villette.

Thus went Voltaire, from castle to castle, conversing, devising, sowing wit upon his way, and ever working wherever he happened to be.

The following year his ban was raised, and he hurried back to Paris. But soon after another misfortune befel him. Voltaire, meeting at Versailles, at a ministerial dinner, the officer Beauregard, whose denunciations had caused his first embastillement, he exclaimed:

"I was well aware that spies were paid, but I did not know yet that their reward was to eat at the table of the minister."

Having resolved to take revenge for this cruel affront, Beauregard watched for the passage of Voltaire at the bridge of Sevres, took him unawares, riddled him with blows and wounded him in the face.

Voltaire asked for justice. The officer-spy had rejoined his regiment, and moreover he was protected by the minister.

From a letter sent by Voltaire to Cardinal Dubois, dated at Cambrai, July, 1722, we learn that he was the companion, the attendant of the Marchioness Julie de Rupelmonde during a pleasure tour in Belgium and Holland.

A beauty named Rupelmonde,
With whom the sly Cupid and I
Do roam of late par tout le monde,
And who does o'er us lord it high,
Commands that instanter I write. . . .

This marchioness, daughter of Marshal d'Aligre and widow of a rich lord of Flanders, to whom she had been married in 1705, was in full maturity, blonde, and sprightly. Voltaire had cured her from bigotry and from the zealots who love to console young widows, by converting her to philosophy. But to that she had added gallantry. To her it is that Voltaire had addressed the celebrated Ode to Uramie, which was at first the Ode to Julia, and some lines of which are subjoined:

Thy will is then, fair Uramie,
At thy behest a new Lucretius born,
That, by my fearless hand, for thee
The bands of superstition may be torn;
That I expose the dangerous sight
Of all the holy lies that fill the earth with blight,
And that, imbued with my philosophy,
The horrors of the tomb thou mayest scorn,
And all the foolish dread of the life unborn.

The fair widow and the witty philosopher, happy wandering couple, had a great struggle in tearing themselves away from the Cambrai fêtes, where a congress had assembled, and from the agreeable receptions they received, in order to cross the Belgian border. In Brussels, Voltaire repaired, au débotté, to the house of his friend, Jean Baptiste Rousseau, whom he thought he would find a Freethinker as in Paris, but quantum mutatus ab illo!

Rousseau was a skillful rhymer, of incontestable talent, but who did not possess the elevation of character and the nobility of soul of the true poet. He had returned to the lap of the Church, probably touched by Catholic gracein his exile at Brussels, exile which he had brought to himself by his Moside (Moïsade), by his scurril-lous pamphlets and licentious epigrams, levelled in Paris at everybody's head.

After the first expressions of friendship and the warm demonstrations of the two friends so much charmed once more to see each other, Voltaire proposed a promenade outside the city, and they mounted the carriage.

The Radical Pulpit.

If you Take Away my Religion, What will you Give me in its Stead?—Continued.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEWARK LIBERAL LEAGUE, JUNE 2, 1878, BY H. B. MARTIN, M.D.

Among the sacred writings which the Church has seen fit to deem apocryphal, there was a book attributed to Christ himself, in which he declares that he was in no way against the heathen gods (Jones on the Canon, vol. i, p. 11); and Origen vindicates, without denying, the charge of Celsus, that "the Christian religion contained nothing but what Christians held in common with heathens; nothing that was new, or truly great" (Bellamy's translation, chap. iv).

The learned Christian advocate M. Turretin, in describing the state of Christianity in the fourth century, says that it was not so much the Empire that was brought over to the faith, as the faith that was brought over to the Empire; not the pagans who were converted to Christianity, but Christianity that was converted to paganism.

Considering the remote antiquity in which all evidence on the subject must necessarily be obscured, so positive and distinct an avowal of this, of the very highest authority that could possibly be, that the gospels and epistles of the New Testament constituted the sacred writings of the ancient sect of Therapeutæ, before the era which modern Christians have unluckily assigned as that of the birth of Christ, supported as that avowal is by internal evidence and demonstrations of those Scriptures themselves, even in the state in which they have come down to us, and explaining and accounting as that avowal does for all the circumstances and phenomena that have attended those Scriptures, which no other hypothesis can explain or account for without calling in the desperate madness of supposing the operation of supernatural causes—we hold to have presented a demonstration of certainty than which history hath nothing more certain: that the writings contained in the New Testament are hereby clearly traced up to the Therapeutan monks before the Augustan age, and that no ancient or equally ancient work was ever, by more satisfactory evidence, shown to have been the composition of the author to whom it has been ascribed, than that by which the writings of the New Testament are proved to have been the work of those monks. To be sure, they have been reedited from time to time, and all convenient alterations and substitutions made upon them, "to accommodate them to the faith of the orthodox." (See Manifesto of Christian Evidence Society.) Some entire scenes of the drama have been rejected, and some suggested emendations of early critics have been adopted into the text. The names of Pontius Pilate, Herod, Archelaus, Caiaphas, etc., picked out of Josephus and other histories, have been substituted in the place of the original persons; and since it has been found expedient to conceal the plagiarism, to pretend a later date and a wholly different origin, texts have been introduced directly impugning the known sentiments and opinions of the original authors; and, by an exquisite shuffle of ecclesiastical management, what was really the origination of Christianity has been represented as a corruption of it.

But as there has to be a groundwork or starting-point for the foundation of all religions, so we find Christianity possessed of one. This groundwork or starting-point is predicated on the so-called Mosaic account of the transgression of Adam and Eve, who, it is claimed, were the first man and woman that lived on this earth, and were created by God about six thousand years since, and placed in the so-called Garden of Eden, said to have been located on the continent of Asia. The immediate cause of their transgression is said to have been the eloquent appeals and solicitation of a certain kind of snake, called in the account the Serpent, to which the woman yielded and also persuaded the man to yield. This transgression, it is claimed, called down upon their heads the wrath of God, who cursed the three concerned in the transgression with each a separate curse, as follows:

"And unto the woman he said, Because thou hast eaten of the fruit of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat, in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children all the days of thy life; and thy desire shall be toward thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." This is the whole of the curse pronounced upon the woman, and certainly there is no call for any religion to reconcile an offended God here; but if there is need of anything in her case, it is for some law or judgment to free her from being kept eternally under the rule of man; and that is one of the things that Liberalism proposes to try to accomplish.

"And unto the man he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the fruit of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake; thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground, for out of it thou wast taken; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." And this is all of the curse pronounced upon the man; and it is undeniably a distinct and separate curse from the one pronounced upon the woman, so that whatever may be implied from the curse of the man, it cannot be said with any more reason to apply to the woman than can the curse of the woman to apply to the man; so that the last clause of the curse on the man, "For dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," does not in any sense belong to the woman, because, first, the woman was not created out of the dust, but, according to the account, was taken out of the man; second, we might with just the same propriety apply the curse pronounced on the woman to the man, "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children all the days of thy life," as to claim the curse of the man to apply to the woman. Therefore, the claim that death was passed upon man for this transgression does not affect woman in any sense, and we shall have to look for other cause for death in women than that given in Genesis iii, 19.

There is one other who comes under this fit of cursing, and that is the serpent. We find here, as in the other cases, that he too comes under a specific or entirely different curse from either of the others, viz.:

"And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shall thou eat all the days of thy life." Let us for a moment consider this curse. First, the words, "above all cattle, and above every beast of the field," certainly imply that they too were under a curse, for some cause not mentioned. Second, the peculiarity of this curse is such that if it was ever executed and carried out, it would be obvious to every nation under heaven. Let us look at this cursed serpent a little. Now, in what does the curse exist? There are hundreds of God's creatures to-day far more helpless creepers than any of the different species of snakes known within the whole range of natural history; consequently, in that sense, what remains as a positive proof that the snake has been visited by God's vengeance, or cursed? We know of many kinds of creatures that, through their groveling, helpless condition, become an easy prey to all kinds of snakes; while the snakes of all species are swift, nimble, rapid, and agile. Some kinds make it their sport to capture sheep and lambs, and even some of the wild beasts of the forests. Everything that is known of the snakes, of all kinds, contradicts the idea that the snake has been cursed, and makes the belief in such irrationality appear perfectly ridiculous. In all meekness, I would like to be informed what species of snake this cursed snake belonged to.

Since this snake was doomed to subsist on dust all the days of his life, is it not a little singular that some of our professional naturalists never have, or do not occasionally, come across one of the kind now and then, here or there, in some corner of the world? There is not known within the sphere of natural history so much as one single proof that any one of the different species of snakes ever did, or ever tried to, sustain its life by eating dust. It is known that many other creatures make use of dust in small quantities, as some use salt and others use sand; but it is not known of any species of snake that it makes a specialty of eating dust, or of using dust for food. Some kinds of snakes are not content with anything inferior in quality to what man considers clean and wholesome, and will have such if it is anywhere within their reach; others are satisfied with hogs, dogs, and cats, wild or tame; others with hares, rabbits, opossums, rats, and moles; others with fish in rivers, lakes, and dams; others with all kinds of birds and their eggs. Other species will not touch any kind of flesh, but subsist entirely upon all kinds of herbs; some upon bark, others upon leaves of trees, others upon grasses, others upon flowers, bulbs, and roots; but natural history is as silent as the tomb in regard to any kind of snake that subsists upon dust.

Now, then, since natural history, present and past, is so silent, and since not one snake can be found showing proof of being subjected to this cursed condition narrated in the Bible, where rests the foundation of the inspired infallibility of the tradition? If the Bible story goes contrary to facts so obvious, or if nature, in its daily manifestation of facts, contradicts the Bible narrative, which must we believe? If we, in the light of history and observation, reject this single story, what then will become of "man's fall"? The snake story is so inseparably connected with the doctrine of the fall of mankind in the first Adam that if we reject it, the whole economy of the plan of salvation is deprived of its chief cornerstone. Apart from the idea of the first Adam being deceived by the snake, there is no sense or import whatever in the prediction of the second Adam coming to bruise the head of the serpent, which has invariably been interpreted to mean Christ's conquest over Satan. The belief in the story of the snake, cursed and subjected to subsist on dust, is at the very foundation of the whole fabric, and to reject this tradition is equal to denying the system of Christianity entire.

Motion of the Universe.

IS IT CAUSED FROM ITS OWN CONSTRUCTION, AND CONTAINED WITHIN ITSELF, OR FROM AN OUTSIDE INFLUENCE?

BY JEROME S. DAVIS.

1. Matter is that portion of the physical universe which we perceive by the five senses. Mind is that portion of the universe which cannot be perceived by these senses. Assuming that there is nothing in the universe that is not material, we shall lay down as the basis of our argument the proposition that no science can satisfactorily prove, no philosophy elucidate, and no discovery reveal the secrets of motion, whether it be the motion of the largest world or the smallest insect. We affirm, also, that nothing in the material universe is constant and unchangeable. Motion is the power through which life is manifest. Wherever there is motion there is life, and wherever there is life there is self-existing power. There is nothing within the universe or around it that is at rest. There is no such thing as rest connected with it. Motion is everywhere apparent. The invisibility of motion is manifested in the imperceptible changes which material substances are constantly undergoing. What we call rest is but a lesser degree of motion. Through and by motion have originated all the material forces of which we are cognizant. Light and heat are but manifestations of motion. The difference between the rapidity with which the earth revolves around the sun and the rapidity with which the matter of the earth's composition moves are merely differences in the degrees of motion.

2. There must be some positive power of motion outside of the Universe which controls all substances, or else there is a self-resident property in matter which constitutes its life. Now we claim that the theory of a power of motion outside of matter is incorrect. We can conceive of no place outside of the universe where it could exist. Neither can we conceive of a place in the universe where it could exist, save where motion itself exists. We can see no cause of motion, no power of life, no property of existence that is not within matter. The power of motion is capable of increasing the force of matter. Matter would have but little force without motion. Weight is a relative, and motion a positive property in matter. We cannot coincide with the theory that the cause of the motion of the universe exists outside of the universe itself. If there is not power in the atoms which compose the universe to move it, then there is no power that can move it. Although originally there may have been but one element of power, there has through motion been others produced, until at last the chemist has discovered sixty or more, but all of these may be resolved back again into the one positive, acting, living force in matter, which is motion. There is no decay, no death, no decomposition that is not directly traceable to the law of motion. Motion being constant, cannot discontinue.

3. Rest is a relative condition of matter. A mountain seems at rest, because you cannot see that it has any motion in comparison with the motion of the earth. Atoms of matter seem at rest, because, owing to the fastness of the earth you do not discover their working. You yourself seem at rest compared with the solar system above you. The sun seems to move around you, but science tells you you are moving around the sun, and that the sun is comparatively standing still. We cannot conceive of a power of motion outside of matter. We cannot conceive of a force acting upon matter that is not self-resident in matter. Were it not for the self-resident power in matter, your form could not exist, and you could have no individuality. There is a self-resident power in the heart, which, uncontrolled by the mind, goes on and on, producing all the wonderful changes of physical development and growth, and when the body is said to be dead, motion is still apparent in it. Gradually it becomes decomposed. Each particle assumes its own proper condition. One goes to the formation of mineral life, another to the formation of vegetable life, another to the enrichment of the soil, and another to the formation of food for the beasts of prey.

4. What causes the chemical attraction? The power of natural force. There is life within each atom of your physical system. Each knows what it has to do. Each performs its own mission. Each has its own self-resident powers of motion. There is a self-resident principle of life in matter. There is a function in it obedient to certain laws, which enlarges in proportion as man progresses in knowledge, so as to comprehend them. If the earth derives its power of motion from any other part of the universe, from whence does the universe derive its power of motion? We may trace it from sun to sun, from star to star. We may call it attraction, or gravitation, or cohesion, or any of the other many names which have no meaning, and yet we cannot find its source. If there is not a self-resident principle of motion in each particle of matter, you cannot find anything in the universe which can give to matter the power of motion. Every atom of matter has a motive power within itself, and the worlds above and around us revolve in their orbit simply because of the amount of life which they contain. They remain where they are as a consequence of this life, and not because any other body or system of bodies in the universe keep them there.

BY W. S. BELL.

The Reformation was not the work of Luther, but the result of many causes which had produced both it and him. There had been many previous struggles in behalf of freedom before Luther threw down the gauntlet. "Arnold of Breschia had been put down, Fra Docina had been put down, Savonarola had been extinguished, the Albigenses had been scattered, the Vaudois, Lollards, and Hussites had all been put down" before Luther came out or rather was driven out of the Church of Rome. The Reformation had greater depths of meaning than Luther or his associates had ever imagined. With him freedom and toleration meant nothing more than freedom to believe and worship as he believed and worshiped. The Reformers when in power were almost as intolerant as the papists. Calvin was doing god-service when he burned Servetus. The strongest sect has always persecuted the weaker. Orthodoxy means simply to be in the majority. Heresy is always in the minority. If we would seek the cause of religious persecutions, we shall find it lying back of Catholicism, Lutheranism, and Calvinism in the essential elements of religion itself. The naked ideas of heaven and hell, of God and the devil, of a divine revelation and a plan of salvation, carry in them inexorably the command, "Believe or be damned." M. Guizot declares that "the Church has always ranged herself on the side of despotism." Even this frank statement by a Christian writer does not exactly cover the ground. It is a great deal nearer the truth to say the Church is of itself in its very nature a cruel despotism. It seeks not so much to range itself on the side of power as it does to grasp power, and use it for sectarian purposes.

Protestantism was a vindication of the rights of conscience—it was a claim to protest against religious tyranny. But there were no definite limits to the right of protesting. This, happily, no one foresaw. Luther subsequently declared that if he had seen what was coming, he never would have launched into the Reformation. Protestantism could not stop with one series of protests. In course of time, others claimed and exercised the right to protest against established errors and despotism. And so the cause of Protestanism has gone on protesting against one thing and another until the whole Church which was a unit is now broken into four hundred or more warring sects. "Every new sect," says John Stuart Mill, "was but a step further toward Infidelity. Every new religion has rejected something that before was regarded as divine."

Protestantism has gone to seed; it is no longer able to throw off another shoot. In the development of humanity, the graft of another fruit has been fixed in the human mind in the form of Freethought—the all-absorbing spirit of inquiry, investigation, and observation. It is educational, but not revolutionary in its methods, and seeks to clear the way for the new age. But the conservative cries out, "Your new thought, your free thought, is only destructive. It tears down but does not build up. What are you going to give us in place of our religion?" It must be remembered that every great reform comes into existence only by the destruction of something. Even "liberty of conscience was not conceded," says Mill, "as a human right, until fairly won by desperate struggles."

It is natural that the old should give way to the new. The first undertaking of Christians was to tear down the religion of the Jews; and inasmuch as the structure was old, it came apart without much work. And now in its turn, after nearly nineteen centuries, the Christian religion has become old, and shows signs of rapid decay. It is now undergoing its last ordeal—dissolution; but like many a man in the hour of death, it is unconscious of its approaching end. It has sought and applied remedies in vain. It has tuned the revival harp, and played upon its thousand strings to call men and women into the ranks. It has organized its Young Men's Jesuit Association for purposes of interfering with other people's business. It has thrown up the intrenchments of an Evangelical Alliance, where the orthodox guns may be trained upon the ranks of Infidelity, and where the jealous gladiators may, between times, take a few bouts with one another. Another Jesuitical enterprise is the Temperance Movement. It pretends to be only a temperance cause, but its advocates as soon as they are successful in gaining pledges, unmask themselves, and assert that men and women must belong to the Church before they can be temperate.

Another desperate effort toward "holding the fort" is the Commission for Retranslating and Correcting the Bible. It will truly be a hopeful sign of the times if these translators of the "Word of God" can find grace enough to leave out all the obscene portions of the old book.

But if Christianity has always ranged herself on the side of power, she has not forgotten the fact, and consequently she is trying now to put the name of her God in the Constitution of the United States, that she again may have power.

Schuyler County Justice.

Notwithstanding the severe instructions given by Judge Hurd to the Grand Jury when marking out to them their duty as to the venders of the books that had been sold at the Freethinkers' Convention, and deciding for them the character of a certain book called "Cupid's Yokes," informing them that he regarded it as obscene, and that it was their duty to so find it, it seems, after two or three days' deliberation, and after perusing the little pamphlet, they failed to find anything in it to justify them in indicting the parties who had been arrested for selling it. This we learned with a good deal of directness, and by more than one person, while we were still in Watkins. Certain members of the Grand Jury had imparted to certain confidential friends that no bills would be found for selling "Cupid's Yokes." It was given out that they had taken three separate votes upon the subject with the same result, and that there was not sufficient grounds for holding us for trial.

According to subsequent information which has been communicated to us, when Judge Hurd learned that the Grand Jury had failed to find bills of indictment against the four who had been arrested for selling the pamphlet alluded to, he went before them, or had them brought before him, and urged them to reconsider the matter, and enjoined them by all means to find bills of indictment against us. He again urged it upon their attention that he had read the pamphlet and that he pronounced it obscene, and they must hold the persons who sold the same; and, lest his coercing should prove insufficient, he turned in two orthodox clergymen to bulldoze them from a theological standpoint and urge them by all means to find bills against the Freethinkers who had sold "Cupid's Yokes."

If these statements are true—and we believe they are—it is one of the most flagrant judicial outrages of modern times. We have heard of but few instances since the infamous Jeffreys where the action of a judge has been more unjust and reprehensible. It is well for a judicial official to be vigilant and active, but it is not expected he will be informer, persecutor, and prosecutor all at the same time. If the twenty-four worthy citizens who composed the Grand Jury could not find enough in the little pamphlet to hold four persons for trial for having sold it, it certainly was no part of the Judge's duty to try to coerce them and cause them to act differently from what their judgment dictated, or to try to make them see what they could not see without his help, much less to send in two bigoted and unfriendly clergymen to swing the whip ecclesiastical over the heads of the Grand Jury and to help him to bulldoze and overawe them. Judges have their province and Grand Juries have theirs, and it is as wrong for the judge to influence the jury as for the jury to influence the judge. Either course is wholly reprehensible and improper.

Judge Hurd may have been very anxious to secure our indictment and conviction, but it was wrong in him to allow that anxiety to carry him so far as to perform such acts as a judge never ought to be guilty of. By his prejudging the case and by his unduly attempting to cause the jury to reconsider their decision and adopt his views, he has unmistakably disqualified himself from sitting in judgment on the cases when tried; he has vitiated the indictments and justly laid himself open to impeachment. It will be well for the citizens of Schuyler county to keep their eyes upon the action of their judge, and to have his illegal and improper acts duly examined into and punished.

Judge Hurd would doubtless resent it to be called a thief, but, in our estimation, he has committed an offense much worse in character than ordinary thieft. A man who steals a loaf of bread to keep his family from starving or a coat to protect himself from the winter's blast is a thief, but when a man takes such steps as deprives another of his reputation, and with a view of depriving him of his liberty too, the injury is far deeper and greater than the stealing of a few dollars' worth of property. As regards a good name, Shakspere had the true conception:

"Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

This is what Judge Hurd has attempted to do by us. How would the Judge like to be telegraphed over the country as a dealer in obscene literature, with all the opprobrium that attaches to the vile offense, when he had done nothing in that direction but to hand out a pamphlet treating, in decent language, the subjects of marriage, divorce, and the relations of the sexes? This injury has been done us. We have never had any desire to deal in obscene literature, and are as free from it as Judge Hurd himself, or his friend the Rev. Mr. Waldo. If we sold a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" from Miss Tilton's stand and in her absence to the Judge's brother, we did so at his request and as innocently as we would have handed him a glass of water had he requested it of us, and with the same amount of profit. We certainly offered none for sale and urged no one to buy it, Warren Hurd's oath and the indictment to the contrary notwithstanding. For the simple handing up of the book by request the, Judge seems anxious to deprive Mr. Bell and ourselves of our liberty, a boon which every American prizes far above property or dollars and cents.

The Judge may regard himself as a man of perfect uprightness, and he may look upon us as a criminal, justly deserving punishment, but in our opinion, in his transcending his duty and inducing the Grand Jury to exceed their own judgment to find us guilty of a crime punishable with fine and imprisonment he committed a far greater offense against the principles of justice and right than we did in selling "Cupid's Yokes" and all the other books we ever sold. Yes, we would far rather sell a thousand copies of "Cupid's Yokes" than be guilty of the course in this matter which Judge Hurd has pursued.

The Judge is evidently a man of strong prejudices, and it is easy for him to co-operate with ecclesiastical magnates and influences. He reads a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" and he perceives obscenity in it, and he thinks the person who sells it ought to be condemned and be deprived of his property and his liberty. The Rev. Mr. Waldo arrives at the same conclusion. But thousands of other Americans, with equal intelligence, fairness, and love of virtue, have read it and find nothing obscene in it and nothing that should send a person to prison for writing it or selling it. They find it perhaps very radical in treating marriage laws and usages, but is that a crime for which an American ought to be fined and imprisoned? Shall nothing be said touching marriage, divorce, and the propagation of our species except it be said in the interest of the churches?

If, as is well known, there are hundreds of thousands of instances where the marriage relation, under the auspices of the church, fails to produce happiness, and the victims to the institution live a cat-and-dog life together, and find the marriage bonds the most irksome that can be imagined, shall not a word be said by way of condemnation or suggestion? Shall a man really be sent to prison for pointing out the evils he finds in existence and suggesting a remedy? What if Mr. Heywood is radical? has he not a right to be so on any subject under heaven? Are the conservatives to imprison and impoverish the radicals? Is this the ultimate of American liberty and civilization? We hope not; we trust that every person will have the right to think his own thoughts, to write them, to print them, and to dispose of them to others. Unless we have this right, unless the freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of pen, and freedom of the press is preserved, our boasted liberties are a mere sham, and America should no longer be called a free country. We should confess ourselves abject slaves, and not again claim the honored title of freemen.

It is to be feared that Judge Hurd is one of the number who think that the masses should be subservient to the dictum of the ecclesiastical power, and that no one disagreeing with the belief of the churches should be allowed to raise his voice or utter his convictions. The Judge should be tolerant enough to allow others the same privileges in matters of thought and expression that he claims for himself, and consider that though many may differ widely from the conclusions he has arrived at, they may still be just as honest and just as much within the bounds of propriety as himself. It is to be hoped he will remember that this government was not founded on a sectarian basis, and that in matters of opinion no class is required to be subservient to another. The government was designed to be just as free for the unbeliever as for the believer, for the Buddhist, Brahmanist, Mohammedan, Jew, or Infidel, as for the Christian; and it will prove a fruitless task to undertake, at this late day, to change this equitable rule.

In the unequal struggle that was made by the American colonies for liberty, the Judge should bear in mind that among the prominent and foremost in the struggle were many who were not believers in orthodox Christianity, and to that extent were Infidels and Freethinkers. Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, and Thomas Paine were Deists; Thomas Jefferson, Aaron Burr, and Ethan Allen were pronounced Infidels, if not Atheists; and among the other dissenters from Christian dogmas were John Adams, Anthony Wayne, Gouverneur Morris, Benjamin Rush, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and others. These men struggled for mental liberty, and not for sectarian bigotry and tyranny. We who are born under this government and have not grounds to accept the claims of the various sects with which the land is filled have the same sacred right to entertain our respective opinions that is possessed by the most bigoted sectarian devotees.

It should be borne in mind that the founders of our Government and the framers of our Constitution, in establishing that glorious instrument, recognized neither Jehovah, his son, nor his sacred Scriptures; and for that very reason the zealous devotees of the various sects in the land have felt sorely aggrieved and have for years been making earnest efforts to have God, Jesus, and the Bible duly recognized in our National Charter of Liberty, but thus far have not succeeded. When George Washington was President, and a treaty was being entered into with the government of Tripoli, Washington himself emphatically assured the representatives of that country that "the American Government was not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." This is most true, and shows conclusively that unbelievers in Christianity have still just as sacred rights under this Government as the most submissive believers and devotees. It is true that within the last few years laws have been surreptitiously and unfortunately added to our statutes, both State and national, which have given the Young Men's Christian Association and their favorites advantages for oppressing unbelievers not before possessed; but as in spirit and in fact these laws are unconstitutional, the lovers of liberty must struggle on until they cease to disgrace our statute books. What are known as the Comstock obscenity laws are among those alluded to. Without defining in what immorality, indecency, and obscenity consist, they have made them crimes punishable in the most severe manner. It is left with bigoted courts and juries to pronounce that obscene and indecent which is clearly not so, and to send persons to prison and saddle them with fines when really they have committed no offense. E. H. Heywood is one of these victims. His conviction and sentence were a disgrace to American jurisprudence. He was violently condemned by Judge Clark, of the U. S. Circuit Court, who showed a degree of bigotry, intolerance, anger, and hatred for independent believers that was absolutely a disgrace to him and wholly unfitted him to be a just and impartial judge! Yes, Ezra H. Heywood is now in prison, serving out his sentence at hard labor, for committing no crime whatever but simply exercising the right of a freeborn American, who has the right to hold to his own views and to express them with freedom.

Let not Judge Hurd copy after Judge Clark, but let him, rather, pattern after George Washington, who believed that the rights of the unbeliever and the radical were precisely equal to those of the believer and the conservative. The people of Schuyler county should not forget that they are making history, and that their action in the prosecutions under the frivolous arrests that have recently been made in their midst will be honestly recorded, will pass into the history of our country, and will stand either to their future credit or disgrace. It is earnestly hoped that it may be the former and not the latter.

The Village of Watkins.

We find by conversing with persons residing in different parts of the State that Watkins is considered one of the most bigoted and straight-laced places in the State, and we are inclined to accept the estimate without a word of dissent. The Freethinkers decided to hold their convention there in part because of the beautiful natural scenery in the vicinity, and they went there with the kindest feelings in the world towards the place and the people. Of course the people attending the convention left considerable money with the hotels, boarding-houses, etc., while they probably did no harm to the denizens of the village, and they had a right to expect courteous and friendly treatment in return. The convention had the fairness to allow their opponents, the orthodox clergy, to speak two hours from their platform, thus showing far more liberality than they are in the habit of receiving from the same clergymen in their public meetings. We think we speak truly when we say that the Freethinkers felt naught but good will towards the people of Watkins; but they did not receive good will in return. An unfriendly spirit was made visible from the leaders of the pious party on more than one occasion. A plan had evidently been concocted by the pious portion of the town to annoy and possibly break up the meeting. Parties were employed and instructed to purchase certain books on the ground, for which arrests were to be made. Two persons advertised as the speakers in the meeting were thus arrested, and two others were subsequently arrested. The brother of Judge Hurd was one of the parties thus selected and instructed to make purchases of "Cupid's Yokes." He seems to have had his instructions to buy one of us, direct. Possibly he did, for he swore that he did; but we have no recollection of selling one to anybody on the grounds. If we did sell it to him, he asked for it; for, we repeat, we offered none for sale and asked no person to buy them. We had none at any time on our table or on the grounds.

One of the leaders in this plot to entrap the Freethinkers, and who is perhaps the ecclesiastical leader of the village, is the Rev. Mr. Waldo, of the Presbyterian church—one of the strongest and most opulent churches in town. His enmity was made apparent on more than one occasion, and his influence over Judge Hurd and the District-Attorney is pretty well understood. He was the man behind the scenes, able to pull the wires and direct the movements. His earnest, implacable face, reminds one of his great theological leader, John Calvin; and he doubtless would be glad to rule over the people of Watkins with the same tyrannical ecclesiastical authority with which Calvin ruled over the city and council of Geneva. The disciple of Calvin, the Rev. Mr. Waldo, may be supposed to entertain the same kind of feeling towards the Freethinkers assembled in his town, that his great leader, Calvin, felt towards those who presumed to differ from him in opinion. When, in 1546, in his celebrated letter to his confrere, Farel, he wrote these words: "If he [Servetus] comes here [to Geneva], and my authority be consulted, I will not permit him to escape with his life." Possibly, if the Rev. Waldo's power in Watkins were equal to what the Rev. Calvin's was in Geneva, and the times were as propitious for that kind of business as three hundred years ago, our fate might have been like that of poor Servetus, and we might have been burnt at the stake. We think we can thank the progress of civilization for our escape more than the tender mercies of the Rev. Mr. Waldo. We thought we easily detected the holy venom in his countenance. He is a nice man, indeed, for Judge Hurd to send before the Grand Jury to aid him in bringing them to the state of mind he desired.

The reverend gentleman is, doubtless, naturally a good sort of man had he less piety and religion, but an excess of Calvinism has made him a bigot; and he would hold the world where Calvin would have held it, and he would punish those who cannot think as he does the same as his great captain punished those who differed from him. It would be well, however, for the reverend gentleman to realize that the world is advancing; that men are losing faith in the old dogmas of the past; that whatever rests on fiction and fraud must be overthrown; that institutions that organize impostures and spread delusions must show what right they have to exist. As Prof. Draper says, "Faith must render an account of herself to reason; mysteries must give place to facts; religion must relinquish that impious—that domineering position which she has so long maintained against science. There must be absolute freedom for thought. The ecclesiastic must learn to keep himself within the domain he has chosen, and cease to tyrannize over the philosopher, who, conscious of his own strength and the purity of his motives, will bear such interference no longer." Probably the gentleman will be as unable to stop the onward flow of Freethought and the teachings of demonstrative science as Dame Partington was with her mop and broom to arrest the powerful in-flowing tide of the great Atlantic Ocean.

The reverend gentleman in his narrow creed may think he has attained unto perfect wisdom, and that his doctrines embrace all the truths in existence; but he has much to learn yet about the laws of the universe. He has to learn that every result is the direct effect of a natural cause; that supernaturalism is wholly a vagary and never had an existence, and that his system of theology, which is built upon supernaturalism, must fall to the ground and give place to the teachings of science and truth. He needs to have more tolerance towards the belief and unbelief of others and not indulge in the disposition to arrest, indict, convict, and imprison those who cannot arrive at the same conclusions that he does. He may be apprehensive that his power or the power of his creed is slowly but surely passing away, and in his trepidation and desperation he may make heroic efforts to hold the waning power and throw in prison all who dare to revolt; but it is better that he bow to the inevitable and make a virtue of necessity that every man may have freedom to judge for himself in matters of theology as well as in everything else. Tolerance towards the opinions of others is hardly an ingredient of Calvinism, but we would be glad if the Rev. Mr. Waldo would cultivate it.

If we are to be convicted and sent to prison we should prefer that the issue had been made on some other ground or upon some other book besides, "Cupid's Yokes;" but if our enemies choose that for an issue we are forced to accept it. We do not take a vast amount of stock in that publication. It does not present our views fully, but we do hold that the man who wrote it is an honest man and that he had a right to write such a book and publish it, and that he and everybody else has a perfect right to sell it and give it away if they choose. There is not an indecent word in the book, nor was it written to excite the passions or injure the morals of any one. It may contain suggestions calculated to benefit the moral leprosy that exists in the marriage relation of this Christian land or it may not, but the writer at all events had the right to give his views and we all have the right to read them, even though they may be called radical. We have a right to be radical and we shall maintain that right by every means in our power.

If the Rev. Mr. Waldo and Judge Hurd succeed in sending us to prison for the great crime of handing to Warren Hurd a copy of the pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes" we shall bear the infliction with the best possible grace. We would just remark, however, that while clergymen are just now being arrested on all hands for adultery, sodomy, poisoning, larceny and murder (for some particulars see first page) it would seem a little out of proportion to send humble individuals like W. S. Bell and ourselves to prison for handing a man a copy of "Cupid's Yokes," in which we had not the slightest interest. But regardless of consequences we shall by voice and pen defend the right of American citizens to read and think and decide for themselves upon all subjects and if necessary we will lay down our life in the defense of this glorious principle.

Let The Truth Seeker Flourish.

One thing is very evident, and that is that THE TRUTH SEEKER has bitter enemies who would gladly crush it to the earth were it in their power. The repeated arrests that have been made and the others that are threatened point unmistakeably in that direction. What shall be done about it? Why, let its friends rally to its support. Let them just resolve that double the number of persons that read THE TRUTH SEEKER now shall read it before the first of January next. It can easily be done if the friends of the cause will only work in earnest. New subscribers, in view of the hard times, need not subscribe for a whole year at once, but for six or three months, as they see fit. Remember, to trial subscribers we send it three months, postage included, for 50 cents. And on this occasion we will make this special offer: We will send to new subscribers THE TRUTH SEEKER from the middle of September to January, 1879, and a copy of Webster's Pocket Dictionary, containing 150,000 words, or a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason," as may be preferred, and all for 60 cents. For many and obvious reasons the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER should be largely increased. Thousands who are now borrowing it should remit their little fifty cents and be independent and have a copy of their own. What is the reason why ten thousand new names cannot be sent in by the first of January next? How many will go to work to bring about this result?

We of course are not anxious to look upon the inner walls of a prison, but in carrying out what we believe to be our Constitutional and legitimate right, we shall not recoil. If, however, such a fate is in store for us, THE TRUTH SEEKER will be promptly continued. We have a corps of assistants who can conduct the paper with ability though its editor is behind the prison bars, and it is possible an occasional letter from within the prison grates will be more effective than a greater amount written without its walls. Those who subscribe for the paper for any length of time will be sure to receive it for the time paid for. What we want now is 10,000 new names to add to our list.

Speeches at the Watkins Convention.

We are now busily engaged at getting up a fine volume of the various addresses and speeches made at the Watkins Convention, and with the excellent character of the addresses there delivered we feel sanguine that the volume will contain some of the best thoughts of the day, and will possess peculiar and marked value. It will contain the addresses delivered by Dr. T. L. Brown, Prof. Toohey, G. L. Henderson, Dr. T. B. Taylor, Dr. J. M. Peebles, W. S. Bell, Prof. A. L. Rawson, Elder F. W. Evans, Elder G. A. Lomas, Mrs. L. K. Coleman, Mrs. Laura Kendrick, Mrs. P. R. Lawrence, Ella E. Gibson, Giles B. Stebbins, Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, James Parton, Elizur Wright, Horace Seaver, T. B. Wakeman, T. C. Leland, W. E. Copeland, Lucian Scott, Hon. Geo. W. Julian, Mrs. Clara Neyman, and others. Probably few volumes will contain deeper, better, and a wider range of thought than this volume containing the speeches of the four days' Convention. The arrests that were made at the Convention, and the trials that are to follow will add somewhat to the interest of the work.

Those who wish a copy of the volume are requested to send in their names at once. It will be a 12 mo. volume of 400 or 500 pages, and we have concluded to offer it well bound at the low price of $1.25. It will be out in a few weeks. It will cost $1,000 to get out an edition of it, and those who feel like advancing the price will be the first to be served, and they will contribute to the necessary expenditure of bringing it out. Money is a very scarce article with us. Please let the orders flow in. How many shall be received within the next ten days? The work will be out in October.

THOSE WHO wish a copy of The Champions of the Church, The World's Sages Thinkers and Reformers, Viscount Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief, or Thomas Paine's Great Works—all large octavo volumes—can have either of the four, with a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year for $5.00, or any two of the works named by mail for $5.00. Send in your orders.

WE are getting numerous orders for that remarkable little work, entitled "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu,' the Book of the Generation of Jesus, the first English translation of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about the year 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam, by Joseph Pandora. It is attracting much attention. Price, 10 cents.

WE have received pretty direct information, which we deem authentic, that it was Anthony Comstock who instigated our arrest at Watkins, Aug. 24th. It would seem that our suspicions that he had written the Young Men's Christian Association at Watkins how to proceed in the matter were correct. If this information is true, we have again to thank this pious character for another arrest by the powers of the orthodox church. Frederick Davis, Dr. Thompson, Rev. Mr. Waldo, Warren Hurd, and his brother, Judge Hurd, ought to feel very proud to thus be the tools and dupes in carrying out the instructions of this execrable character.

The Index says not a single word about the Watkins Convention, nor about the arrests. But it has a leading article on "Catholicism in Canada." That's enterprise in the Organ of the League!

Declaration of Rights.

A CASE FOR THE COURTS.

To the Editor of The Transcript: Quoting from my remarks in Faneuil Hall, as reported in full in the Globe of yesterday, you kindly commend my motives, but condemn my logic. Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust. Yours seems to assume that courts never make mistakes, and, therefore, the Comstock law is constitutional and "Cupid's Yokes" an obscene book. Let that be true, and what follows? By chapter 165, section 15, of the General Statutes, the possession of an obscene book is an offense, punishable by imprisonment and fine. I possess "Cupid's Yokes," and mean to do so, whatever the courts have decided or other people think. If the District Attorney of Middlesex, knowing all these facts, does not prosecute me as soon as possible, he will violate his oath of office. Will you show your readers where the flaw is in this logic and oblige, Medford, Mass., Aug. 3, 1878. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

We, the undersigned, free and independent citizens of the United States, recognize the above words of the Hon. Elizur Wright as the utterance of a brave, honest, and independent American. They were published more than a month ago, and he still has his liberty. It is to be inferred that the District Attorney of Middlesex does not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene book; otherwise he is derelict in the performance of his duty. We wish also to place our names on record that we do not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene publication. Many of us have read it, have it in our possession, and propose to so retain it so long as we choose. While we do not indorse every sentence in it, and think some portions of it are in bad taste, we regard it as the expression of an honest, earnest man, who had a legal and undoubted right to so express himself, and that every American possesses the right to read it, to own it, to buy and to sell it, to exhibit it, and to send it from point to point by any public mode of conveyance.

We furthermore recognize the attempt on the part of any one to deprive us of the right to own, buy, sell, or transport this or other similar books, including works on medicine, hygiene, physiology, sociology, social ethics, relations of the sexes, etc., as subversive of the very highest principles of American liberty; and while we are opposed to obscene and vile literature, that really is so, we hereby pledge ourselves to forever uphold freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails. These are the fundamental principles of American liberty, the birthright of every American citizen, and we never wish to see them infringed or subverted. To maintain and perpetuate these rights "we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Pledges to the National Defense Fund.

We hope our kind and sympathizing friends scattered over the various States and territories will not loose sight of the approaching trials and struggles. Four of us are now under bonds to appear before the Court of Oyer and Terminer, and other arrests are threatened. Some heavy fighting will have to be done in opposing our intolerant and tyrannous enemies, and funds are necessary to carry the cases triumphantly through the courts, or even to conduct them in any way. There is nothing like being well prepared for battle.

The following are the pledges that, up to this time, have been given:

Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., $60.00; James Parton, $25.00; Cortlandt Palmer, $25.00; A. Lohry, $20.00; J. K. Ingalls, $25.00; E. M. Sellon, $10.00; T. B. Wakeman, $10.00; Mrs. E. Wilcox, $10.00; T. R. Ide, $2.00 (pd.); R. S. Shoemaker, $1.00; Mr. F. W. Titus, $5.00; H. Ellington, $5.00;

Our Liberal friends are requested to state such amounts as they are willing to pledge to meet the necessary expense in defending any who are wrongfully attacked. Let a fair sum rolled be up. Whose names shall be added next?

Josephine S. Tilton.

By reference to Mr. T. C. Leland's letter on page 580 it will be seen that this lady has accepted the bail which Mrs. J. K. Ingalls so kindly offered and has since been at liberty, although she had made up her mind to remain in Schuyler County jail until the day of her trial. She is at present in this city and is canvassing for E. H. Heywood's pamphlets. She is small in body, but in spirit she will not suffer in comparison with any.

It is a peculiarity in the bail offered at Watkin's after Mr. Bell, Miss Tilton, and ourselves were indicted that it was solely by females. All honor to woman. She is indeed the lovable portion of Humanity.

Voltaire in Exile.

In our pre-occupation for the past three weeks we have neglected to mention the able serial articles we have been laying before our readers upon the great philosopher, poet, and historian, Voltaire. They are from the pen of M. Gastineau of Paris, who has written some thirty works that have been and are popular with the French people. This work which we have commenced to reproduce was published in Paris in the present centennial year of Voltaire's death, and has already passed through several editions in France, showing the great popularity it has attained there. We have at considerable expense caused it to be translated expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER, hoping our readers would appreciate the same. Comparatively little is known in this country of the great Voltaire or of his writings. This work, by Gastineau, will enable them to know much more of him. It is our purpose, as soon as we are able, to add another 8vo. volume to the "Truth Seeker Library," consisting of the theological writings of Voltaire, many of which have never been published in English. We trust the work, "Voltaire in Exile," which we are now re-publishing, will "whet up the appetite" of our readers for the larger work.

LET it be remembered by those who wish a photograph representing Mr. Bell, Miss Tilton, and ourselves, by some one called The Trinity (ourselves, presumably, being the older member of the firm), can procure a good one for fifteen cents; or either of the three will be furnished by itself for ten cents.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

The mainspring of action in Paul's morality is gratitude to God for invaluable benefits freely bestowed on the undeserving. In the midst of our selfish unconcern, and, it may be, sensual folly, salvation is sent to us from above. A superhuman, pre-human, heavenly being (mentally constructed by Paul), came down to save us from the day of wrath, and sanctify us for heaven. God did not spare his best beloved, but allowed him to suffer even the cruel humiliation of the cross, in order to unite Jew and Gentile in mutual love; and now, in recompense, has confided to him the task of subduing all enemies, and restoring all things to the divine rule; after which the Christ will resign his throne, that God may be all, and in all. Believers are called and chosen to be God's holy ones. Holiness is the noblest state, the best state, the condition of union with God and admittance into his eternal kingdom. Paul exhorts to whatever things are just, pure, lovely, and of good report. In crowns and thrones for the saints he could not disbelieve; but he does not dangle forth "the appendage" to occupy our imagination. The case is like that of university competition. He who loves knowledge most, and thinks least of prizes, is most likely to win the prize; so he who, from gratitude and love to God and Christ, counts his body and soul to have been new created for holiness and for every form of goodness, is most likely to attain that mental state to which a just and wise God may attach high and responsible power. But to think much of such power and station as a recompense, by no means conduces to the saintly condition; and in Paul the other topics take the lead. The love of his ideal Christ constrains him. He is not his own; he is bought with a price. He lives for him who gave himself for us, to deliver us from this evil world. To be a living sacrifice to God is our reasonable service. The heir of heaven must put on the image of Christ—kindness, meekness, bravery, industry, purity, and above all, charity. The saint is no longer under bondage to law; the era of slavery to a sacred letter is past; he is now a law to himself by God's spirit within him. He is made alive in the Spirit; let him now walk in the Spirit. He is a fellow-citizen with the saints, and belongs to the household of God. Let him aspire to the full stature of Christ's perfection, who is the image of the blessed and only Potentate; let him live the new life of righteousness and holiness, blameless and harmless, as a son of God. These ideas reign through all Paul's epistles. I am told that his theory is complex, fanciful, artificial, fine-drawn, a cobweb spun out of his own brain; and that his argument about predestination in Rom. ix,* blackens the character of the Most High. Be it so; I am not panegyrizing his theory, his Christology, nor all his details of argument, but his moral and spiritual tone. His rabbinical interpretations of the Old Scriptures perpetually lead him astray. If his predestination ended in universal salvation, it is utterly different from that of Luther, Calvin, and Augustine. I urge that his morality is warm, elevating, purifying, just, and tender; and prodigiously superior to the parables, prudential exhortations, apothegms, enigmas, overstatements of partial truth, and overstraining of just precept, which are put before us as discourses of Jesus. On the subject of wealth and alms the contrast of Paul and Jesus is signal. Paul calls covetousness idolatry, the desire of wealth a temptation and a snare; nay, he says, having food and raiment, let us therewith be content; but he does not disparage and condemn wealth as the unrighteous mammon. Give alms, says Jesus, and all things are clean unto you. If I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, says Paul, and give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. He urges rich men not to trust in riches, but to be rich in good works and ready to distribute; but he does not bid them to get rid of their wealth; nay, he says, it is right for parents to lay up for their children. So far from bidding to "give to every one that asketh," he distinctly commands to refuse support to the idle. Industry is with Paul a positive duty; a sentiment which cannot be discovered in the precepts of Jesus, who teaches that to abandon one's trade and wander at his side is highly meritorious. Paul thought he had a right of pecuniary support from those who listened to his instructions; yet in order to maintain his independence of mind he worked at his trade of a tent-maker, and took care to give no countenance to religious mendicancy. Against idle religionists he speaks severely.

So far as we can guess at the real Jesus, he must have been widely unlike Paul's ideal. I easily admit the thought that if the three gospels had been written and published in the year after the crucifixion, Paul never would have become a Christian. He would not have relished the picture of Jesus there set forth. What was the true picture, one may have a more or less probable opinion; but with documents so imperfect, I suppose we never shall be agreed. We cannot divine lost history. The Jesus of Matthew is intensely severe on the Pharisees because they taught that duties to a parent may be superseded by some vow of service to God, which incapacitates a man for filial service. "Ye hypocrites!" he exclaims; and so on in his own style (Matt. xv, 3–9). Matthew makes this indeed a recrimination on scribes and Pharisees, when they complained that his disciples did not wash their hands before a meal. Nevertheless this writer seems to forget that he represents Jesus as having a beam in his own eye, while he is extracting a mote from the Pharisee's eye. Jesus called the sons of Zebedee to abandon their father (Matt. iv, 2); he sternly rebukes a disciple for begging time to bury his father; and another for desiring to bid farewell to those at home: he avows that none can follow him, who will not hate father and mother; and he extols forsaking parents for his name's sake, as a merit deserving heavenly crowns. How wonderful that good men endure and swallow all this contradiction! Zeal to serve God will not justify the omission of filial duty; but zeal to swell the train of Jesus fully justifies it, and is a merit that he will amply repay when he comes in the glory of his Father.

IV.

Whence has come the direful shipwreck of the Catholic Church in Episcopal and Papal pretensions? Can this possibly be an accident? Sacerdotalism might have seemed the state least likely of all to have been developed from the teaching of the Galilean carpenter. We may point out to special causes tending that way; first, the imitation of haughty and bitter denunciations; next, a certain extravagance, either uttered by him or imputed to him, concerning the power of "the Keys." In our Bibles, according to Matthew, this power was given to Simon, and with the keys the new name of Cephas, rock, as a reward for avowing Jesus to be the Messiah. The fourth gospel contradicts this indirectly by stating that Andrew, long before, knew Jesus to be Messiah, having learnt it apparently from John the Baptist, who pointed to Jesus as the Lamb of God (John i, 33, 40–42). Andrew sought out his brother Simon, revealed to him who Jesus was, and brought him to Jesus; who immediately gave to Simon the surname Cephas, but without the power of the keys; as indeed without any event to deserve or suggest such a thing. A second contradiction to Matthew's statement (John xx, 22) may perhaps be called direct; for there Jesus gives the keys to all the eleven indiscriminately, which is scarcely compatible with his earlier gift as a special possession of Simon; to whom in Matthew is added a solemn blessing, with the avowal that flesh and blood had not revealed the mighty truth to him, but his Father in heaven: while in John i. 41, this truth was revealed by flesh and blood, that is, by Andrew. That the first and fourth gospels are alike inventing fictions, may be argued from the Apocalypse, in which the apostle John makes Jesus say: "I am he that hath the key of David: I open, and no man shutteth; I shut, and no man openeth;" Rev. iii, 7. Jesus, in claiming the key for himself exclusively, denies that he has ever committed it to any man. It appears equally certain that Paul, who withstood Peter to the face at Antioch, was ignorant that Jesus had invested him with primacy, had pronounced him to be the rock on which the church was built, and had given him the mysterious keys. Remembering further that in the Acts of the Apostles no superiority whatever is accorded to Peter, who is called to account by unnamed disciples for baptizing Cornelius, we must probably acquit Jesus and all the apostles of an extravagance apparently invented after most of them were dead. Yet the facts remain that the narratives have been received as sacred, as divine testimony, as infallible, and that they contain the monstrous, the impious doctrine, that fallible and frail men may exercise a divine power.

The metaphors in Matthew run thus: "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi, 19.) The fourth narrator replaces metaphor by plain words: "Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained" (xxiii). The mention of the keys made it inevitable, that the metaphor of the former passage should be thus interpreted. Scribes and Pharisees might well cry out concerning Jesus, "Who is this that forgiveth sins? Who can forgive sins but God alone?" Christians who believe that the human Jesus was omniscient and therefore a searcher of men's hearts, find no difficulty at all, so far. But when the narrative proceeds to represent Jesus as transferring this attribute of God to finite and imperfect man, Christians ought to be startled as well as Jews. Nothing but custom from childhood hinders their seeing its enormity, its impiety. So dull, so dead are men under the power of routine, that in Protestant England, in the Anglican Church, the bishop ordains every priest by this formula of words: "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained."

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINTEENTH CENTURY.

REBEKAH.

A manifestation of uncommon significance is recorded in the twenty-fourth chapter of Genesis, where Abraham commissions his eldest servant not to take a wife unto his son Isaac of the daughters of the Canaanites, but to go into his (Abraham's) own country and among his own kindred. And so the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham (instead of on the good book) and swore to him concerning this matter, took ten camels of his master's, a host of jewelry, such as maidens were well pleased with even in those primitive times, departed, and went direct to the city of Nahor, Abraham's brother. All who desire to possess a full knowledge of this wife-hunting transaction should read the entire account in the five succeeding chapters. It is an interesting romance, and a most wonderful illustration of God's power in directing the servant to the very place where his master told him to go, without any other guide-board than the Lord God of Abraham.

The servant's little trial or test with God was fulfilled in verse fourteen, for out came Rebekah, who was the granddaughter of Abraham's brother Nahor, with a pitcher on her shoulder. Now, like her great-aunt, Sarah, she was very fair to look upon, a virgin, . . . and she went down to the well and filled her pitcher and came up. The servant ran to meet her. His test proving successful, he took a golden earring of half a shekel weight and two bracelets for her hands, of ten shekel's weight of gold, for the Lord had greatly blessed his master and he was very rich. He then inquired whose daughter she was, and ascertained that he and the camels could lodge in her brother's house, bowed his head and worshiped the Lord God of Abraham, so delighted was he at the probable issue of his mission.

It appears that Laban, Rebekah's brother, possessed the same love of filthy lucre then which so distinguished him afterward in his dealing with his sister's son, Jacob, for when he saw the ear-ring and bracelets upon his sister's hands, the camels and wonderful retinue of this man, he said: "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord," and made him welcome simply for his riches.

The servant was faithful to his business, declaring he would not eat until he had told his errand, relating the experience before alluded to and the test on meeting Rebekah at the well. (The reader is referred to the pictorial Bibles for the illustration of this event of "Rebekah at the well.")

Laban and Bethuel answered and said, "The thing procedeth from the Lord," for every successful enterprise in those days was attributed to the intervention of the Lord, very much as modern Christians are disposed to refer all good to his providence, even to selecting a wife. Another scene of bowing and worshiping ensued, and another installment of jewels brought forth and presented to Rebekah, the brother and mother, and "they did eat and drink," and had a general good time. In the morning the man was in a hurry to depart, but the brother and mother begged that the "damsel might remain ten days;" but they were forced to yield, for the man said, "Hinder me not." It now occurred to them, it appears, for the first time, to call the damsel and inquire at her mouth, "Wilt thou go with this man?" which met with the ready response, "I will go."

And so they departed, Rebekah and her nurse, Abraham's servant and his men, with this blessing shouted in the ears of the future wife and mother, "Thou art our sister; be thou the mother of thousands of millions [awful,] and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate thee."

Now Isaac, the lad, being only forty years of age (Gen. xxv, 20), was walking out after supper meditating in a blushing kind of a pit-a-pat way what kind of a wife his father's servant might bring him, when "he lifted up his eyes and behold, and Rebekah lifted up her eyes." What a lifting up of eyes was that; fancy the meeting! We will drop the curtain, only adding that the historian states that when Rebekah saw Isaac, "she lighted off the camel, took a veil and covered herself," (modest girl that,) and that "Isaac brought her into his mother's tent, and took Rebekah, and she became his wife, and he loved her, and Isaac was comforted after his mother's death." Now was not that a better way to get a wife than advertising through THE TRUTH SEEK-

ER? Not quite so available, it may be answered, to those who have not the camels, the bracelets, the ear-ring (for there was but one), the jewels of silver, the jewels of gold, and precious things, the father's faithful servant, and the good old faithful father himself?

In the meantime Abraham dies, and Isaac and Ishmael bury him beside his wife, Sarah, in the cave at Machpelah, and twenty years pass away and Isaac, like his father Abraham, despairs of posterity, but unlike him does not accept of his wife's bondmaid, at her own request, but entreats the Lord for his wife, as any good, prayerful man should, instead of consulting an M.D., and the Lord was entreated of him. And here follows an account in Gen. xxv, 21–27, that Anthony Comstock ought not to allow us to publish here, since no book for which arrests have been made contains such indecent expressions, and no TRUTH SEEKER reader either would thank us for publishing, therefore we refer all persons to the sacred Scriptures, which are able to make them wise unto salvation.

Now these two boys, Esau and Jacob, though twins and the sons of godly parents, were not very good friends. It could not be expected otherwise, if the truth is told in Rom. ix, 11–13, "For the children [Esau and Jacob] being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand not of works, but of him that calleth, it was said unto her [the mother, Rebekah], The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated." The "I," it must be remembered, who hated Esau was the Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the mother, Rebekah, seems well calculated to help the Lord to carry out his love to Jacob and his hatred to Esau, as will be seen hereafter. Besides, it is declared (Gen. xxv, 28), "Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison; but Rebekah loved Jacob," for what we are not told, perhaps because "Jacob dwelt in a tent." Any way, here was a pretty family partiality, but Rebekah had the advantage over the poor old blind patriarch, Isaac, for she had the Lord on her side, even before the children were born, as already shown and as confirmed in Gen. xxv, 22, because the Lord came and told her so when she went to inquire of him, "If it be so, why am I thus?"

But to return: Esau being the eldest was entitled to the birth-right possession of his father, while all other children were to be sent away to shirk for themselves. This Rebekah did not mean should be the lot of her darling Jacob, and besides she must assist the Lord to carry out his plan of election. Everything seemed to favor the Lord, Rebekah, and Jacob, and work to the disadvantage of Isaac and Esau. There were two parties in this transaction, and the Lord's side beat, whether justly or unjustly we leave the reader to determine.

One day Esau got very hungry and begged of his brother to give him of his pottage, and the stingy fellow would not give him one sip, though poor Jacob appealed, "I am faint, I pray thee." Who but Jacob could have resisted it, but the crafty fox saw a chance for himself and told him he would give him pottage for his birthright, and coaxed Esau to sell it to him, and made him swear in his dying moments, as Esau believed, that the birthright should be Jacob's. It is probable that this sale pleased Rebekah mightily, though no mention is made of it. In it she might then see a chance to promote her favorite by supplanting Esau. In process of time, Isaac grew old and must die, "his eyes were dim so that he could not see," but the ruling passion strong in death prevailed, and he desired once more to eat of Esau's venison from his own hand, and give him his father's dying blessing before he went hence, to be here no more.

Rebekah was prying round and heard the request; and now came the trying moment of this mother in Israel, this godly woman, this lovely Rebekah, for whose beauty her husband had feared, like his father Abraham, he should be put to death, and, like him, he denied she was his wife, saying: "She is my sister," and like him, it was done in Gerar, and like him, the lie told to Abimelech, the king; but unlike him the record does not give but one instance where Isaac denied his wife, while faithful (?); Abraham did it the second time.

The Trinity.

While we were in Watkins some one facetiously styled Miss Tilton, W. S. Bell and ourselves "the Trinity," "father, son, and holy ghost," and suggested that we have photographs of the three on one card. We acted upon the suggestion, and had a quantity made with the trinity. Those who wish copies of the same can be supplied at 15 cents each. Either of the trinity singly on a card, 10 cents. If a copy of the trinity and "Cupid's Yokes" are ordered, a pamphlet of sixty pages containing T. B. Wakeman's great speech at the Faneuil Hall Heywood meeting and his argument against the Comstock Postal Law will be added gratis, and sent by mail, all for 30 cents.

OPPRESSION FOR OPINION'S SAKE.

ZION HIL, N. J., Sept. 9, 1878.

MR. EDITUR: I am sorry to se by yure last 2 papers that yu hav ben getting into trubble up at Watkins while attending yure big konvenshun thare. I red yure deskripshun ov the kuntry and its natcheral kuriositys with a good deel ov plezure. It seemd to me that yu shode a spirit ov frendliness and farenes that shood hav ben appreshiated by the peepel ov that town, and that unless yu did perform sum overt akt tha shood not hav ben gilty ov diskurtesy to yu and the others hoo assembled in thare villej to hold yure annual meeting, patronizing thare hotels and bording-houzes.

While I think yu ar a man hoo haz denide the only fathe which iz kapabul ov saving a wurld ov sinners, and that yu ar lost in the dark wilds ov unbeleef and karnal reezon, I kan't help thinking that yu ar onest in yure opinyuns and that yu aktually beleev what yu rite. I am sorry yure mind iz so darkened, and that yu ar so far lost from the blessed Jezus hoo alone haz the power to save yure sole from eternal torments prepard for thoze hoo wil not luv God and giv him thare hole hart; but I pra for yu evry da, and I entreet God to bring yu, forsibly, if nesessary, to the nolej ov him and hiz son; and yu no I hav fathe in prare.

But all this, Mr. Editur, haz nothing to do with yu and thoze 3 others being treeted in a spirit ov intoleranse and unfairnes by thoze hoo profes to hav the grase ov God in thare harts, and to skware thare lives by the teechings ov the meek and lowly Jezus, hoo felt kindly to evrybody (exsept on a vary fu okkashuns), and I am sorry to se that my brethren in Kriste shood so far stra from the path ov richusnes az to want to oppres and annoy eny wun hoo differs from them in matters ov fathe and opinyun. I waz glad to se yu did not sa enything about the Baptists being engaged with the Presbyterians and the Episcopalyans, at Watkins, in thare attaks upon yu; for while I am fre to admit that tho I hav menny times none men and wimmen hoo belongd to my denominashun that wer gilty ov meen akts which tha never shood hav kommitted, I am parshul to my church, and am alwaze glad when tha keep out ov bad kompany and meen kondukt. Az I think tha ar a little neerer the truth than eny other Kristyans, I also think tha aut to sho thare superiority by performing more good akts, and fewer bad wuns.

I aksept yure statement that yu had nun ov thoze books kalled "Kupid's Yokes" at Watkins, and that if yu sold eny it waz to hand wun up when sumbody kalled for it and when the yung lady hoo had them for sale waz awa, and that reely the book haz no bad wurds in it, and iz not obseen, and also that yu had no sort ov share in the profits from the sales that wer made. I believ enuf in yu to think yu tel the truth about this biznes, and from that vu I must sa I think yu reseevd vary unkind treetment and that thoze pius fokes wood hav dun much better to hav let yu depart in pees than to attempt to konvikt and imprizon yu on so slite a provokashun. I hav no idea that the juj's bruther or the juj himself or eny wun hoo red the book haz ben depraved, vishiated, or debauched by reeding the littel book. If the juj and hiz bruther kan reed it without injury, why kannot almost any other purson? It iz kurius how much more afrade sum peepel ar about others being injurd by indesent publikashuns than themselves. I don't suppoze wun ov that Grand Jury wood own that tha had ben hurt by reeding "Kupid's Yokes," but tha wer so afrade that sum other purson wood be hurt by it that tha think yu aut to be sent to prizon for a number ov yeers bekauz yu kasually handed a kopy ov it to the juj's bruther hoo asked yu for it. Such iz human natchure the world over.

Yu aut to heer my Suzan tawk about yure arrest. Yu no I hav told yu before that she iz a gurl ov the kleerest vuze ov any gurl in this kounty. I don't remember az I hav ever none her to be far out ov the way in her jujment and opinyun. She sez it iz a perfekt shame that the old editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER shood be arrested on so trivial a charge, and she don't beleev that Kristyans hoo kood be gilty ov such kondukt ar eny better than heethen, if az good az sum ov them ar. She sez it makes her most mad to see peepel hoo pretend to hav found more grase than other fokes, to be meek and lowly foloers ov Jezus, and speshul favorits with God and the Holy Gost, and then to turn round and be gilty ov all sorts ov meen triks and subterfujes to get thare fello beings hoo cannot think just az tha do into trubble and to shut them up in prizson and take awa thare munny and other property. She gits so exsited on the subjict that I think she tawks pritty near az harsh about professing Kristyans az yu do. She sez from what she haz red and what she has seem she has kum to the konklushun that Kristyans or Church fokes kan be just as meen, kruel, tyranikal and intolerant al eny peepel in the wurld, and she noze thare no more kwarelsum and mischief-making peepel under the sun. She haz red history a good deel and she sez tha hav dun more fiting, more killing and slaying, more hanging and burning for opinyun's sake, than eny other kind ov relijunists in the hole wurld. I don't no but Suzan iz about rite, but I hate to own up to her that church fokes ar az bad az tha ar.

She sez it iz a shame and an outraj for a man ov yure aj, and hoo trize so hard to teech peepel the truth az yu do, to be throne into disgrase and expense, with a prospekt ov being deprived ov yure liberty, on such a pitiful pretense. She sez that juj must hav a grate deel to do to send hiz brother to by the pamphlet ov yu for the sake ov entrapping yu, and then to instrukt the Grand Jury that tha must find the book to be obseen bekauz he had red it and pronounst it so. She thinks he overstepd the bounds ov hiz duty when he told them what desizhun tha must kum to. In this opinyun she haz support from a lawyer hoo belongs to our church and livs in our naberhood. Hiz name iz Greenfeeld. He duz not praktis very much now, az he iz getting along into yeers, but he haz ben a very prominent man in this kounty. He haz ben sent 3 times to the lejislacher ov the State, and waz wun ov the most influenshal members thare. He haz ben a kandydate for juj, and kame within 27 votes ov being elekted. Wel, he sez that Juj Hurd transended hiz duty when he pronounst upon the natcher ov the pamflet and told the Grand Jury what konklushun tha must kum to, and he thareby shode a parshality, or prejudis, that inkapasitates him to sit az juj on yure trial. He sez the offis ov juj iz a very important wun, but it iz very eezy for him to be over-zelus and go to far in hiz likes and dislikes. He thinks that iz just whare Juj Hurd haz mist it.

We feel a grate kuriosity to see "Kupid's Yokes." Pleez, for the enklozd, send me 3 kopies. Mr. Greenfeeld wants wun, Kaptin Smith wants wun, and I want wun. We all want to see what it iz that the juj ov Skyler kounty haz made so much fuss about. I prezume a grate proporshun ov yure reeders wil feel the same wa. Kaptin Smith waz over here last nite, and he waz a good deel eksited over yure arrest. Yu no I hav told yu before that he waz a warm frend of yurz, and he espouzes yure kauz with a grate deel ov ernestnes. He sez yure enemys ar trying to krush yu and brake up yure biznes; but he iz konfident tha wil fale, and, that insted ov putting yu down, yu wil rize higher in the estimashun ov the Liberal peepul ov the kuntry. He told me to rite yu not to be down-hearted, but keep up good kurrij, az yu hav dun heretofore. He told me to tel yu he would send yu 10 dollars before yure trial kums off to help defra the expenses, and, if nessessary, he wil raz 50 dollers for yu. He said, the last thing before he went awa, "I take a good deel ov stok in Bennett, and I am going to stand by him to the last." You aut to hav seen Suzan briten up at that. She sed, "Good for yu, Kaptin Smith. I oner yu for thoze brave wurds. I am with yu hart and hand. I beleev that man iz fiting an unekwal battle with the forses ov preestkraft, bigotry, and superstishun, and I am proud ov every wun hoo, like yu, iz not afrade to sustane him. I wish I had a 100 dollers. I would send him haf ov it to help him in hiz brave work, and to help him in hiz defense against the allied powers ov Church and State."

When my dawter had made that littel speech wife sed to her: I think Suzan you have sed kwite enuf. It seems to me yu ar getting to be a pritty warm frend ov that old Infidel Bennett. I wunder what yu kan se in his wiked, blasfemus paper that yu think so much ov. For my part, I had rather reed the Examiner and Kronikle wun our than to reed that old TRUTH SEEKER a week. I don't se what my dawter sees in it to admire, for to me it iz abominabul. I do hope the family of Deeken Skidmore iz not all going to turn infidel. Suzan iz about az good az that now, and I reely beleev the Deeken himself iz about wun kwarter konverted; but I tel yu what it iz, hiz wife wil never forsake the tru kolors ov the Prinse ov Zion. I am going to follo him in this wurld and rane with him in the next. Yu ma all follo Bennett but I will follo Jezus.

At that Suzan sed: "Mother I meen to follo after the truth wharever I kan find it. I am bound to no man nor no speshal mediator. Wharever I kan find the truth thare is whare I will follo and it makes not a bit of differense to me whether it iz uttered by Jezus, Konfusius, or Pythagoras, I aksept it, az freely from wun az the other when I am konvinsed ov its reality. So long az I think Bennett gives us the truth, so long wil I kontinue to respekt him; and it iz just az onerable in him to be pursikuted for opinyun's sake az eny others ov the past teechers ov the wurld."

Mr. Editur, yu ma think me a littel shaky, but stil I stand firm on the rok ov Zion; but I kan't help thinking Suzan iz kwite az neer rite az the old woman. I subskribe myself yure frend,

NOTES FROM THE LECTURE FIELD.

BY J. L. YORK.

IONIA, MICH.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. So I conclude you are loved much. I am not surprised to learn by your last TRUTH SEEKER that you are in the toils again through the malignant spirit which has always characterized the Christian religion. Whoever will speak the truth to-day, as in all times past, must feel the blighting mildew of that thrice cursed system. Be of good cheer, friend Bennett. The battle has just begun, and will not cease until the last vestige of superstition has been lifted from the hearts of the people. To superficial people it may seem a matter of but little consequence that men and women are arrested and thrown into prison. By a few you are blamed. But, thank God, the great mass of Liberals indorse you in your efforts to free humanity from the domination of Church and priest. Thinking people see a deeper significance than the simple fact that you and others have been arrested and caused trouble and expense. They see the principle of human liberty involved. They see proscription with its lying, crafty attacks upon the liberty of the people. They see not simply Bennett, Bell, and Miss Tilton in the toils, but they see the cause of free speech menaced—the fires of the Inquisition kindled anew. Bro. Bennett, the Liberals of our country see more than this. They see clearly that it is not a rootless Radicalism that is on trial to-day, but the Christian Church and Bible. A corrupted priesthood and an obscene Bible is on trial to-day. And, seeing this, I know the brave-hearted Liberals of the country will stand by you as a noble defender of truth.

Since I wrote you last, I have been constantly engaged speaking to the people of Michigan. I can hardly tear myself away. You don't know how much I was disappointed in not being with you at the Watkins meeting, but circumstances were such I could not. But my heart is made glad by the noble words spoken on that occasion.

Michigan is in a blaze of Freethought. I have held fourteen grove-meetings this summer, all of which have been large and enthusiastic. My thanks are due to a host of friends in this State for helping hands and warm hearts, and especially am I under obligation to brother Earl, of Plainwell, and M. P. Thurston, of Burr Oak—live men full of zeal for the cause of truth.

On the 25th of August I attended the Schoolcraft meeting, and, with Mrs. Shepard, broke the bread of nature to more than four thousand people. On the 29th of August the semi-annual convention of Spiritualists and Liberalists met in Grand Rapids. About twelve hundred were in daily attendance; and, under the management of Dr. A. B. Spinney, was a feast of reason and flow of soul. The convention held four days, and will long be remembered as a good time. Among the speaders were Dr. Burnham, of East Saginaw, Dr. Farlin, Mrs. Shepard, M. E. French, C. Andrews, Elder Stewart, and others. A broad spirit of Liberalism ruled the convention throughout. Two Unitarian ministers, Mr. Cook and Mr. Pardee, addressed the convention at length with acceptance. The convention closed on Sunday, the fourth day of its session, to meet at Lansing, in March, to hold its annual meeting.

September 8th we are to hold a grove-meeting at Burr Oak; September 15th a grove-meeting at Vicksburg, after which I am to visit Sturgis, Kendalville, and South Bend. I hope to visit the East before I return to California, and will be glad to respond to calls to lecture on the way at Cleveland and other points. I have remained in this State much longer than I anticipated, and have for months been trying to close out. But my work was a need among the good people of Michigan, as I have given as many as eighteen lectures at several points in this State; and I can say, of a truth, Liberal and Spiritualistic thought was never more alive than at this time.

Our convention at Grand Rapids, stimulated by the camp-meeting interest, which is rapidly growing in this State, have appointed a committee to buy a camping ground for the perpetual use of our people in this State after the fashion of the Eastern States. So let truth find utterance until it shall burn up bigotry and every form of oppression in Church and State.

My address will be at Ionia, Michigan, during October.

A CARD FROM W. S. BELL.

I take this method of informing our Liberal friends—the friends of Freethought—that I am now prepared to make engagements to lecture during October and November, in Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. Those wishing my services will greatly aid me by arranging as speedily as possible for such lectures as they desire, as I wish to have all my appointments made out before leaving home. W. S. BELL.

New Bedford, Mass.

NEW YORK, Sept. 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend and Brother: I extend to you "the right hand of fellowship" (with five dollars in it), in this your time of trial and trouble; and I trust the grasp fraternal will be of some comfort to you in your pilgrimage to that bourne where you are to stand as a representative of all that is godlike in humanity—reason, truth, liberty, humanity itself. You will find arrayed against you, in the name of Christianity, the hate, bigotry, intolerance, and murderous vengefulness that prompted Calvin to convert poor Michael Servetus to ashes, that tortured Galileo, that nerved the hearts and the arms of the assassins of the Huguenots, that stimulated the souls of the Puritans to murder Baptists, Quakers, and witches—the spirit that, like the devil of their own making, roams about, seeking to devour that nobleness in humanity which makes us the superior of brutes and little less than gods—reason. You represent me, you represent every man and woman who desires to free their manhood and womanhood from the shackles of mental slavery Christianity has bound us with. You are one of the living protests against the bloody hands that have been laid in murder on the minds of men because they have dared to be more than brutes or slaves, because they have dared to claim their minds as their own, and to know for themselves. In your person Christianity finds its prey, and you being the most active leader of the Freethought press, nothing possible to obtain your conviction and make you infamous will be left undone by the bloodhounds of the Church, to hunt you down and destroy you, and to give warning by your destruction to those who, like myself, have cast off the chains of the Church, of the fate in store for the lion-hearted who dare to lead, and thus cast us down, and cripple or weaken our cause.

Liberals of America, I appeal to you, in the name and for the sacred cause of humanity, for liberty, show your colors! For the enthronement of reason avow yourself. Give your moral and money support to the cause. Give the strength of your good names. How many of you are moving through the world with your hearts full of the spirit of Infidelity and liberty, but dare not avow it in the face of the hate of the Church and its bigots? Your numbers are legion. Take heart; support your principles and leaders on all occasions; assume the aggressive. The noblest men of ancient and modern times were and are Infidels. You have everything to be proud of in men, and principles, and progress. Infidelity means liberty. Infidels have dragged the sparks of humanity left by Christianity through the hideous night of ignorance and superstition, until now they glow as stars in the heaven of Reason. Infidelity means hope, love, honor, charity, truth, and has been the cause of saving us from the barbarism that Christianity would have consigned us to. Infidelity and Infidels have, while surrounded with fire, rack, sword, ax, and prison, wrought out the grand truths of nature, learned her secrets, made all the grand discoveries of science, elevated humanity, and lightened its burdens and sorrows.

Freethinkers, Liberals, Infidels! we are a power in the land. Let our power be felt. Organize for joint action. Our liberties are in peril through the persons of our leaders. D. M. Bennett is the arch-offender, and is to be crushed at all hazards, if possible. His battle is ours; let us assume the aggressive and fight the Christians' devil with fire.

Who are Liberals? Put your names on the "Roll of Honor." Respectfully yours, DANIEL E. RYAN.

NEW HAVEN, CT., Sept. 2, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Your valuable work "The Champions of the Church" reached me safe and sound—especially sound, from the standpoint which I am accustomed to occupy in my judgment of Liberal literature. I would have acknowledged your favor some time ago, but did not get time to examine the work other than superficially until quite lately, though since reading "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers" I had been anxious to read the announced "Champions." I regarded the "World's Sages" as a thoroughly useful book, and can now feel gratified that the two books, "Sages" and "Champions," both so well calculated to supply the growing need amongst those Liberals who can scarcely afford an extensive library, are in the market and fast finding their way into the hands of Freethinkers who know how to appreciate their value. I consider that this last compilation, besides being a very convenient as well as interesting work, also enhances the value of the "World's Sages." These two books are full and running over with useful information, particularly interesting to persons who are emerging from conservatism into the fuller light of Liberal thought and ideas. Written in plain and unaffected style, they bristle all over with incontrovertible facts, and ought by all means to have their handsome gilt-lettered backs placed conspicuously in a place of honor, plainly to be seen and read by all men, and women too, on the shelves of investigating, progressive thinkers.

Liberal friends, if you can have but few books, and desire a considerable range of facts at little cost, you should at once secure copies of these two compendiums, useful, durable, and cheap. Try them. JENNIE BUTLER BROWN.

NEW YORK, Sept. 5, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: Allow me to thank you for your prompt reply to the editor of the Zion's Herald. What does that apparently good man want us to do—take the Bible for our guide, and the teachings of this kind, merciful, and just God? Let us look into the Bible and see where his kindness, mercy, or justice appears. What would you say of a man who caused innocent children to have their brains dashed out against walls of stone? God did this.

And again he shows his mercy and love when his people were starving he furnishing them with meat, but ere they had partaken thereof, he causing a plague to come upon them. God did all this.

And did he not cause 50,070 of his people to be struck dead in a second? This was another of his kind and merciful acts.

Who says that he was modest? Did he not furnish raiment to the man, but not to the woman, that he might discover her secret parts? I could go on to the end of the chapters and show these deluded people what a kind, merciful, and just God they have. I will be contented with quoting a few chapters which if they will take the trouble to compare, they will find in that great book, which, if it had any other name, would be suppressed for its obscenity. There are portions of it that are not fit for the younger branches of the rising generation to read, and for that reason I would put it under lock and key, and make it a point to lose that key so no harm might come from it. The following chapters are the ones alluded to: Gen. i, 31; Job xxv, 4; Job xv, 15; Lev. xi, 11; Psalms xiv, 8; 1 Sam. vi, 19; Ex. xx, 10; James i, 17; Num. xxxii, 13; Deut. xxxii, 10; Num. xxv, 4; Micah vii, 18; Deut vii, 2–19; James v, 11; Hosea xiii, 16; Lam. iii, 33; 1 Sam. v, 9; Josh. x, 11; Num. xxi, 6; Ex. xx, 26; Isaiah iii, 17; Gen. xxix, 31; Gen. xx, 18; Tim. xi, 4; Thess. xi, 11; Jer. ix, 24; 1 Kings, xx, 42; James ii, 5; Acts x, 34.

Yours respectfully, FREE THOUGHT.

STREATOR, ILL., Aug. 30, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: There is but one Niagara in the world, and you are that one. You have shaken the rocks of Gibralter, of the old pagan Holy Bible. Your paper has done much good here. We have a Secular Society here. I am a member of it. I have many good things to tell; must wait till the next. This is the old man Bronson now writing to you. I could not go to Watkins—confined to a sick-room. Bennett, you have made a big man of me.

WM. MARTIN BRONSON.

PORTLAND, ME., Sept. 3, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: With my hands full and my heart three times full, I steal a moment to pen you a line. My hands are full, not of greenbacks, but with traveling to do, and two greenback speeches to make every day, you may know I have but little time to read or write; so little to read that I hardly know what is going on in the Liberal world, and so little time to write that I hardly stop to correspond with my best friends.

But I am not succeeding in my attempt to overcome my indignation. Just as its fever begins to abate, and I think my prayer for grace to coolly stand by and see Liberty stabbed, and Comstock and the Y. M. C. A. drunken with the blood of the martyrs, answered, some new infernal outrage occurs, and I backslide. I am an Infidel; I do not believe in the virtue of prayer or oaths. Just as I was for the last time getting myself thoroughly beprayed and beoathed into the long-sought tranquillity, this new outrage—the arrest of Josie Tilton, W. S. Bell, and yourself—reached my ears, and the fat was all in the fire.

I was at the Etna Camp-meeting (by the way, Mr. Editor, if you want to enjoy the best camp-meeting you ever attended, just go to Etna, Me., next year), had just been making a speech on the Heywood case and presenting the petitions for his release (I won't call it pardon) for signers, when Mrs. Lawrence, of West Garland, brought the news of the arrest of the trio at Watkins. I wish you could have been there to witness the holy indignation manifested there. Several hundred names were immediately obtained to the petition.

I cannot now give you a report of the meeting. Mattie has promised to write it out for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The list of names I send you as subscribers will convince you that there are a few Liberals who are interested in your work.

When the campaign is over in Maine, I go to Massachusetts and New Hampshire; when it is over there, I shall again throw all my power into the Liberal and Spiritual lecture field.

Wishing you prosperity, I am as ever, MOSES HULL.

CELL 52, THE JAIL, DEDHAM, Sept. 7, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Yours and THE TRUTH SEEKER received. Well, you have faced the music with intrepid heroism. I sent you postal yesterday suggesting "one war at a time;" but no matter. Go in. All hearts and hands will back you. It is the pluckiest thing done yet. If Comstock don't light on you, he has ceased to be Comstock. My father's name was Hoar, and I am his namesake. Senator Hoar is a distant cousin, and old Samuel Hoar, of Concord, Mass., of anti-slavery fame, was my great-granduncle. Many eyes are on you now, who are in at the "dead point" of the battle. It is tragic and comical. Mrs. Heywood says we are to have a drama in ideas. It is come. My! don't they pitch into "Cupid's Yokes." It is a comical sight to witness from behind these grates. Jesus wept, but I laugh. Theodore Tilton told Flora, when "Cupid's Yokes" was first published, "It is the bravest book ever written." Josephine's brave demeanor at Watkins reminded me of Joan of Arc, Charlotte Corday, and several other "good girls." Your bold and timely move will help to settle this great question once and forever. All hands around! On with the dance! EZRA HOAR HEYWOOD.

MR. AND MRS. HEYWOOD'S "MOUNTAIN HOME."—WILL FRIENDS OF TRUTH AND LIBERTY HELP REDEEM IT?

DEAR MR. BENNETT: We have till Sept. 26, perhaps longer, to redeem our house in Princeton, and lack several hundred dollars of the amount needed. To break up our residence there and scatter housekeeping outfit, printing-office material and other means of service and living will be extremely wasteful and disastrous. To those who will assist me to save a shelter for my family and a foothold into which I can step at once after my release, and resume the publication of The Word and my other works, I shall be under deep obligations. The value of my books and of my services on the lecture platform will not be lessened but greatly increased by my imprisonment, and I shall therefore be gladly able to return soon what money friends prefer to loan rather than give us. We earnestly wish to save a needed and precious home, and also to make Princeton a growing power in ideas. Friends can remit to J. Flora Tilton, 39 West Cedar street, Boston. E. H. HEYWOOD.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Sept. 3, 1878.

BRO. BENNET: By what I see in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to the arrest of yourself, W. S. Bell, and Miss Josephine S. Tilton, for selling "Cupid's Yokes" at the Watkins Convention, I am informed that the bloodhounds of the Christian Church are after you again. And it does seem that the blindness of the orthodox is driving them on to acts of persecution which must eventually demonstrate whether we have a free government or not; whether there is any freedom of conscience, that can make itself known through a free and untrammeled press, and free speech, or whether we are bound henceforth to doff our hats and bow our necks to the yoke of an old and effete theology. I have no doubt but what this ordeal must come, sooner or later. It is only a question of time.

You and I, and many more of us who have passed the meridian of life may have hoped and thought that this blow would be averted, through the enlightenment of the present and rising generations. But I very much doubt its being averted or avoided. Freethought and investigation have ever had to have a birth through the pains of martyrdom. The whole history of the world teaches us that the right of man to think and act for himself has ever had to be attained through seas of blood. The advancement of science and the mechanical arts has met with but little less resistance and opposition, and how shall we, how can we expect that this, the greatest and best of all freedoms—the freedom to think, to write, and print, and to give utterance to our thoughts, even though it may be for the greatest good and benefit to our fellow-mortals, to escape the ordeal? No! The pains of birth must come. Free speech is yet in the embryo, and we who would enjoy seeing it born a healthy child, must suffer the pain or smother the child. If we would be free indeed, we must, like Socrates, be ready if needs be, to drink the poison hemlock, or like Galileo, on our knees recant, and only say with bated breath, "It does move."

Freethought is becoming too wide-spread to be much longer tolerated by the churches, for it is spreading into and all through the churches, and undermining the very foundation of the whole fabric. It is becoming contagious, and a large portion of the children of Christian parents are catching it, and they cannot get them into the churches, and it is spreading like wild-fire among the older members. The thousands of lazy preachers all over the land are beginning to feel that they are losing their grip. They begin to feel as did Demetrius of old, that their craft is falling into disrepute, and their occupation is in danger, and that they are in danger of being compelled to seek some useful employment for a living, and like him they are stirring up the people against us. Their shrines and temples of worship are being deserted, and the Christian religion is in danger of going to everlasting smash unless the spread of Liberal literature can be stopped. This is no fancy idea or hallucination of an excited brain. As the drifting clouds show the direction from which the storm is approaching, so the tone of the religious press, and the preaching of the Christian pulpit show us to-day that the clouds of oppression are gathering and thickening. There are too many fat salaries dependent on this issue to be easily relinquished, and the thousands of lazy ministers all over the land have too strong a hold on the consciences and purses of their followers to let them slip out of their grasp easily. We have placed too much reliance on the enlightenment of the people. With these ministers, the oft-repeated old texts of "skin for skin," and "What will a man give for his soul?" have come to mean, What will a man not do in order to lead an easy life, and get a fat salary? As for me, having no longer a dread of death or fear of a burning hell after death, having come to look upon death as a friend to the human race, just as much as birth, for death to me is but a birth into a higher form of life, therefore, if need be, I am ready to die or suffer for the truth, but how many there are ready to make this sacrifice I know not. In regard to the cause of free thought, free speech, and a free religion, I think I can truly say, as did one we read of, "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I unto thee," and my earnest prayer is that when the hour of trial does come, I may not, like him, deny and disown the cause. Yours for the truth,

F. F. Follet.

Central, S. C., Sept. 7, 1878.

Dear Mr. Bennett: Sympathy is a poor substitute for money, in fact financially it is a grand failure, and I only regret that I have nothing more substantial to offer you in your present troubles, but my hands are tied and the door locked; adversity has put me to the wall; I am two months behind with my rent, and don't know how soon I may, like poor old Jesus, have nowhere to lay my pate. There is perhaps no man in South Carolina who has suffered more from financial drought than myself. It would be useless for me to try to describe my feelings when I heard of your arrest at Watkins. I was a whole indignation meeting in myself and have ever since been trying to raise a little funds to send you, but alas I am compelled to give it up again and send you another empty letter. I have $3.00 owing to me for the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," which is in good hands, and I could have collected it if I could have seen the parties. I know that you have many friends who are unlike myself, helplessly poor, and it is a source of consolation to feel that others who are able will not see you suffer.

I see in the last Truth Seeker many letters from your friends that are really gems, especially the one from E. C. Walker in defense of Mitchell and Wright. I indorse all that O. Jones says in regard to the financial problem; and last, but not least, the remarks of that noble old veteran Infidel, Daniel Tuttle, are just the proper words in due season. Yes, let every Infidel and Freethinker in the land designate themselves by wearing some appropriate badge or signet. It is a subject I have often thought of but never mentioned, and I cheerfully join our good old brother in his suggestion that a committee be appointed to say what the sign shall be; and whatever it is, I am ready to wear it, and I know of others who will gladly chose the Freethinker's emblem.

I have got about fifty names to the Heywood petition, and shall forward it next week. It has been a troublesome job; people do not sign as freely as I at first anticipated, from the fact that there are thousands of people in this State who never heard of the Comstock law, never heard of E. H. Heywood, never heard of "Cupid's Yokes," never knew anybody had been arrested for selling books, in short, they knew nothing except that "All Scripture is given by inspiration and is profitable for doctrine."

My letter is getting too long, and I must close with my best love to you and all that are like you, but none for Mumbo Jumbo, none for the Holy Ghost or any of his illegitimate posterity. Fraternally, R. M. Casey.

Paris, Texas, Sept. 4, 1878.

My Dear Mr. Bennett: So the miserable hounds are on your track again! But you will come out all right, I am sure, and all your persecutions will redound to the glory of freedom and reason.

Now, I do wonder if the minions of the Church think they can stop the discussion, by speech or press, of social or religious questions. If Heywood's little book can overthrow the family, and if marriage is of the Lord, why, then, the Lord ties people together in a very shabby manner. Ah me! if they could only get God in the Constitution, would not they have the Inquisition, torture, and the stake?

I thank you very much for the extra copies of The Truth Seeker containing my description of Elmina.

I have been very ill—came near dying; had no fears, no hankerings for any myth to make my bed downy. I felt every line of "Thanatopsis," and felt that I could lie down to a pleasant rest with only one regret, and that was that The Truth Seeker and the staunch old Investigator could not have all I have ever given to support myths and creeds.

Inclosed find my mite [$2.00] for your defense. If prayers could make it hundreds instead of single dollars, I would hold a watch-meeting here by myself and pray all night.

With love to Mrs. B. and wishes for your prosperity, I am yours truly, Henrietta L. Buckner.

Carthage, Mo., August 30, 1878.

Editor Truth Seeker: Inclosed please find one dollar for two copies of The Truth Seeker, for three months, trial papers. I hope this large sum will make you rich, but I am afraid it won't. I have been advised by several persons to send for your paper, saying, "perhaps it might help me to reform in some things, and improve in others."

Now, I will state a few things that trouble some of my neighbors who think I ought to reform. In the first place, I believe about the book called the Bible just exactly as Theodore Parker (in a letter to me) said, "I believe the Bible contains a great many good things and a great many bad things, a great many truths and a great many lies." Now, permit me to state a few things I believe to be lies. If I am in the wrong, I hope you will set me right, but if you are going to try to make me believe that Mr. Adam and Mrs. Adam were made in the way it is recorded in Genesis, you will have a great work to do.

A little more of this: I don't believe Abraham was in his right mind when he tried to kill his darling boy; and when he got his hired girl in a peculiar condition, and afterwards turned the poor thing, baby and all, into the wilderness to starve to death. In my opinion, he, instead of being a righteous man, was simply a human devil. We would hang such a fellow out here!

If you think you can make me believe that fellow who killed poor Uzza for doing just what a faithful servant ought to do did right, I only have to say, you will utterly fail. The Bible says it was God that killed poor Uzza, but I say the Bible lies when it says so. Does this seem a little rough? Well, how am I to avoid it? If you can make me believe different sometime, I hope you will do it. Don't you and your paper say you want to seek the truth? I like the heading of your paper. I guess the world needs it. I heard a very intelligent gentleman say the other day, that there was no other paper published in America that equaled it for sound logic and depth of argument.

I have laid on the bed all the afternoon pretty much sick. I could write a great many more things, but I yield to your correspondent Mrs. "Ungodly Woman." I like what she says.

I don't think you will regard this exactly fit for the public eye. The main thing I wanted in writing this. is to have you send the papers to the inclosed names. A. Parkinson.

West Joplin, Mo., Aug. 28, 1878.

Bro Bennett: I herewith inclose you a paper prepared for our Liberal society by B. F. Garrison, Esq, a prominent young lawyer of our city. The Liberals here deem it worthy of publication if you can find room for it in your valuable paper.

I am very sorry to see the bitter feeling on the part of the "cultured editor" towards you. Is he jealous of the power and influence for good The Truth Seeker is wielding? It seems strange that all Liberals cannot dwell in unity together.

We have but one object in life, and that is to emancipate the world from the slavery of religious bigots. I think the "cultured editor" should take this view of the matter, and join hands with The Truth Seeker, and labor for the advancement and common good of the whole people. Life is too short, time too precious to keep up a bitter warfare in our own ranks. The Truth Seeker has become a household word in many families in this city.

I feel like thanking Scar-faced Tony for the good work he has done for Freethought in America, while my heartfelt sympathies are with the martyrs. I cannot but feel that Tony has been the direct cause of the rapid and general Liberal sentiment that is sweeping this country to-day. I value the "Champions of the Church" as one of the choicest among my little collection of Liberal works. You will pardon me for trespassing on your valuable time. You will doubtless discover from my manner that I am not accustomed to writing, but my heart is in this glorious Liberal cause, and I want, however weak my effort, to add my mite to the aid and encouragement of the acknowledged head of the Liberal world to-day, D. M. Bennett. Yours for the right,

Wm. M. Carter.

[The article alluded to is accepted, and will soon appear. Ed. T. S.]

Detroit, Mich., Sept. 4, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I take the liberty of addressing you in regard to that wonderful book, "Cupid's Yokes," which these latter-day saints seem to be so horrified at. What is the price, and can I get a copy? I am a great admirer of your paper, and have been a constant reader for some months. There is a great deal for Liberal papers to do in this part of the country, as the old idea of Connecticut Blue Laws in regard to Sunday amusements, is held by the majority of the citizens of Detroit. The Puritan doctrine, prevails in the Legislature of the State of Michigan, and as we have no local option law, we in the city especially, feel it very oppressive. As there is a large population of Germans residing here, they feel it oppressive and tyranical, particularly the middle and poorer classes who work faithfully six days in the week, and as has always been their custom, take Sunday afternoon at least as a time of recreation—dancing, listening to good music, and sipping their wine or beer over a quiet smoke in the garden or in halls—all this is denied them and others by a bigoted and tyrannical Legislatureat Lansing, composed mostly of men absolutely ignorant of the first principles of social or political ethics, and the repressive policy increases the very evils it aims to correct, drunkenness and excesses of all kinds, and especially those which are particularly demoralizing. I am in hopes to see the day when class and sectarian legislation shall be done away with, and civil rights, in fact, be guaranteed to all. Believing that it will be brought about by the Liberal press, such as yours and others, I remain, yours sincerely, Joseph C. Gibson.

Nokomis, Ill., Aug. 31, 1878.

Mr. Bennett: You richly merit the thanks of the Liberal reading public for sending out weekly a paper laden with truths that make the heart glad. Those who do you injustice will simply take back seats in the car of progress, and eventually sneak off at some way-station (Squan Village) with their disgusting load of envy (Payne passion). I recommend Bro. Abbot & Co. to keep Payne's fate in mind. I cannot see how you can possibly improve The Truth Seeker unless it was minus these quarrelings. Long may you live to conduct it. Yours for truth and progress,

Augustus Hastings.

MR. O. A. PHELPS AT FLORENCE, IOWA.

Florence, Iowa, Sept. 1, 1878.

On Friday evening, August 23d, the Liberals of Florence had the pleasure of listening to a lecture by a new man in the Freethought lecture field, Mr. O. A. Phelps. He is from Illinois, and is a lawyer by profession, but has determined to devote his time and talent to the work of liberating his fellow-creatures from the bondage of superstition. Mr. Phelps is a very pleasant speaker and a close, logical reasoner. It would be vain to attempt to give a résumé of his lecture, for the reason that no mere brief extract could do either the speaker or his subject justice. He is very apt in the use of illustrations, and can show the weak part of an adverse argument so clearly that the dullest and most prejudiced mind can see the fallacy thereof. The orthodox prudently stayed away from the lecture, as they always do here, for they fear discussion as they would the plague. Rev. T. Simmons, the Methodist pastor here, avers that "Infidelity thrives on discussion—it is all that keeps it alive." No wonder that he will not help to spread the principles of the Infidel church by engaging in discussion with any of its champions. Mr. Phelps is ever ready to discuss the questions at issue between Freethought and the popular creeds of the day; and I will assure the mighty champions of Christianity that they will always receive courteous and fair treatment at the hands of this gentleman should they venture to engage in wordy conflict with him. But they will find him a thorough student of history and science, an opponent whose logic is merciless, and a disputant who will hold them rigidly to the consideration of the question under discussion. Mr. Phelps will remain in the West during the coming season, and those desirous to engage the services of a lecturer who will do honor to the cause and to their selection will do well to apply at an early date.

Respectfully, E. C. Walker.

Lawrence, Mass., Sept. 4, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I received the books all right. The "Interrogatories" are a dead open and shut on Christianity. It would rather stagger a Christian to commence on them. Some of them really amuse me. Methinks I see the genial smile of satisfaction light your countenance when you put them into shape.

You have my sympathy in your new distress. Find inclosed two dollars—one for the second roll of honor, the other for four "Self-Contradictions of the Bible."

Sincerely yours, Z. T. French.

Binghamton, N. Y., Sept. 6, 1878.

D M. Bennett, Dear Brother: I am anxious for your welfare; how do you feel with the Watkins shackles hanging at your heels? Their orthodox devil came out and showed his Christian revenge at the free and Liberal convention of true Christians.

Thus it has always been from the early days of orthodoxy to show their spirit of revenge. Their days are short for tyranny here in free America. Try and be patient under this present persecution; they cannot hurt you; this will be the best thing that could have happened to you and our cause. The people will learn to sympathize with the innocent and oppressed. I know they must see their great mistake. What a brave soul that Josephine S. Tilton was at the time of her arrest with yourself and W. S. Bell. She seemed so calm and resigned and submissive to their desire for revenge. She knows the innocent should not suffer. I will do all I can for you. Yours ever for truth and justice, E. C. Leonard.

Snowville, Va., Sept. 3, 1878.

Dear Friend Bennett: I have just finished reading Truth Seeker No. 35, and now sit down to have my usual weekly talk with thee, and, more especially, to tender thee my sympathy for the new persecution that has been inflicted upon thee just when we fancied thee enjoying the adulation, honor, and glory of the great Convention at Watkins. I know every one of thy friends and worshipers will feel the blow like a personal thunderclap. It makes me sad, indignant, and almost revengeful to think of the meanness of human nature. But, alas! it is all ignorance and superstition. Poor dupes of priestcraft! They knew not what they did. Thou proffered them light; they chose darkness, and sacrificed their savior.

In the great calamity of having our leader pounced upon again by the scavengers of the pulpit we must not forget to sympathize with Mr. Bell and Miss Tilton. Oh, how I wish we had means to carry on the war right! The Church has numbers, and law, and money, but we have right, truth, and earnestness of purpose on our side, and I do think we shall come out victorious in the end. I shall put my name on the roll, if it be but for twenty-five cents, and that in postage-stamps. I shall try and do something, and urge all others that I can influence to do the same. My whole heart is in the cause, and its champions are as dear to me as my dearest friends. I shall anxiously wait for next Truth Seeker, to know what you decide on doing, but presume you will hardly decide on any course till after the 27th.

We missed "Deacon Skidmore" this week. Perhaps he was at Watkins and was arrested too! Hope he will come out clean and pure as snow from it all. I was provoked to see Tewksbury come out against Seaver and Mendum in the Times, though if really guilty of fraud and dishonesty I hope they will be ousted, let it shatter our ranks as it may. I have no patience with reformers (?) who deform. But fuss and stuff it is useless to publish. We want hard facts if we wish to expose. Let Tewksbury bring up literal duds, and not wordy war. I received a line from Ella Gibson, saying she had mailed me some Bibles; they have not come yet. I had not heard a word about them, and so was not sure they had come out yet.

Thy time is precious, so I will close with every good wish for thee and thine. Elmina Drake Slenker.

Buchanan, Mich., September 1, 1878.

Bro. Bennett: In your paper of August 31st, I find a letter written by F. F. Follet, headed "Soul or Spirit." We have given the above subject much thought, and have come to some conclusions on the same. Will you allow us to give the readers of the great Truth Seeker of America, our opinion, although they may be right and they may be wrong. One thing, they will draw from the minds of others thoughts that will have a tendency to throw light upon this hidden subject, and as A. J. Davis once said, the agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom. Let us agitate, and by so doing the readers of The Truth Seeker may get some ideas that may have a tendency to enlighten the masses.

In order to give our ideas of the soul and (not or) spirit, let us take an apple for our illustration. The skin of the apple is the same as the skin covering the human body; the core is the frame, or bony structure, the fleshy part of the apple is the cellular system through which run the nerves, tissues, sinews, muscles, veins, and arteries. The seed is the spiritual part that attracts from the surrounding atmosphere *its flavor; that this flavor does not come from the sap is evi*dent, as we can grow both sweet and sour apples from the same sap. The germ in the seed that under proper conditions will produce another tree, is to us the soul; that germ is indestructible, it never had a beginning, neither will it ever have an end, that is in our opinion, (the opinion of the soul and spirit acting through over two hundred pounds of flesh and bones).

Let us take these two elements in nature, and see if we can find a distinction of action by them in man. That there is an element in man that produces the involuntary acts through the physical, no close thinker can deny. Those acts are inhalation, exhalation, pulsation, respiration, circulation, digestion, and gestation. All the above are to us involuntary acts that take place when asleep, the same as in wakefulness; that there is another element that produces the voluntary acts to us is also clear, such as eating, working, walking, talking, singing, etc.

The question for scientists to work out is, which of the above elements or principles is the soul and which is the Spirit, or whether either name is proper. We think that both names came into existence under priestcraft, and we use them for the want of better ones. They may and may not be proper. That there are two distinct elements in man to us is plain; it is a well known fact that each one can act independent of the other, and at the same time both can act in unison.

In our opinion every particle of matter in the universe has a soul that never had a beginning, and will never have an end; that there is a spiritual element that can act only in accordance with the conditions given it to act through, to us is also a fact. That a man can stand up when awake, and cannot when asleep, is another fact. I illustrate as man is composed of 27,000,000,000 distinct particles of matter, so is God, that is, if there is one; or it takes 50,000,000,000 of organized bodies or objects to form the universe; that universe is God, just as the 27,000,000,000 of particles is man. Hence, man is a part and parcel of that God, and if he is in hell, God is in hell; if in heaven or happy, God is also there. If man grows from what we call impure particles of matter, as we believe Comstock did, he will be a nuisance and a tool for designing priesthood that would be as tyrannical today as they were in Hildebrandt's time if they had the power. May the powers of the universe combine to destroy every vestige of priestcraft in the universe, is the earnest prayer of your friend and well-wisher, I. D. Seely.

Ode to Man.

Oh man! dost thou not feel thyself debased
In worshiping a being that thyself hath made?
A being so beneath thy better self
In justice, magnanimity, and truth,
And every sweet and noble attribute,
Thou wouldst not nod to him in the street,
A God that must be prayed and sung to,
Faugh! And prayed on bended knee,
To do an act of simplest justice,
To refrain from thrusting thee in endless torments.
Oh, raise thy head and be a man!
Forbear this soul-sickening, soul-degrading worship,
Cease gazing in the heavens, and turn
Thy eyes on earth, content to know that duty
Well performed in this, our present life,
Prepares us best for any life beyond.

The Passing of the Cloud.

There came a cloud over yonder hill,
When the wind was muttering low,
Round and white as the sails that fill
When the wind's o'er the ocean go,

And the skirts of the cloud were snowy white,
But the heart of the cloud was black;
And the sunshine fled, and the trees in fright
Murmured and bowed them back.

And the cruel north wind whistled shrill,
And the south wind sobbed in turn,
And the east wind shrieked, "Come down and kill!"
Ann the west wind sighed, "Return!"

But the cloud gave heed to sob nor cry,
But swept over hill and plain;
The cloud went by in the broad blue sky,
And the sunshine came again.

"He that Believeth Not shall be Damned."

A BRIEF SERMON.—BY J. A. STEWART.

In the dim and unknown future shall we find that man has erred
By rejecting what is written in the Bible, called God's word.
We have only this to argue, and it is the soul's relief:
That belief is not an option, nor is honest unbelief.

If our God is moved by justice, as our ministers set forth;
If his ways are ways of mercy to the souls he's given birth.
Then why for unbelieving, which the evidence controls,
Should he visit us with torment, or damnation for our souls?

Believing not is not a sin. Belief has nought to claim.
There is no merit in belief, except in reason's name.
If evidence presents to view a ground to fix a doubt,
However much we court belief, it finds itself ruled out.

A church may, in its holy zeal, consign to endless woe
An honest man for unbelief; for Christ has told us so;
But juster views of God and man, if God controls man's fate,
Is, that to unbelievers, too, he'll open wide his gate.

The Rose of Eden.—An Arabic Legend.

Fair Eve knelt close by the guarded gate in the glow of the Eastern spring.
She saw the flash of the angel's sword, and the sheen of the angel's wing;
She thought, as she held her sobbing breath,
she could hear the happy sighs
Of the tiny rivulets that fed the mosses of Paradise;
She knew how the birds were fluttering among the clustered flowers
And gorgeous blooms and arching trees that shadowed Eden's bowers.
She cried aloud, in an agony of wild, remorseful prayer,
"Give me one bud—but one, but one—from the thousands that blossom there!"

He turned as he heard her piteous voice, in his grave angelic grace,
And he looked with a wistful tenderness on the beautiful woman's face,
And because it was so beautiful, and because she could not see
How fair were the pure white cyclamens, crushed dying at her knee;
And because he knew this punishment through the weary years must burn—
That through all things sweet and good on earth her heart would for Eden yearn—
He gathered a rich red rose that grew where the four great rivers met,
And flung to the fair and fated hands that clasped imploring yet.

And though for many a cycle past that rose in dust has lain
With her who bore it on her breast when she passed from life and pain,
There is never a daughter of Eve but once, ere the tale of her days is done,
She will know the scent of the Eden rose, just once beneath the sun!
And whatever else she may win or lose, endure,
or do, or dare,
She will never forget the enchantment it gave to the common air;
For the world may give her content or joy, fame,
sorrow, or sacrifice,
But the hour that brought the scent of the rose
she lived it in Paradise.

Facts from My Sunday Readings.

SEPTEMBER.

Sept. 1st.—St. Giles' day. He was so benevolent that he has become the patron saint of beggars and cripples.

Sept. 8th.—The Nativity of the Blessed Virgin; a grand festival of the Roman Church, and still retained in the Church or England Calendar. This festival has been held with matins, masses, homilies, collects, processions, etc., for upwards of one thousand years, and, according to Catholic writers, a religious contemplative heard each year on this day sweet music in heaven with great rejoicings of angels, and on asking of one of them the cause, he was told that they were celebrating in heaven the nativity of the mother of God! The birthday of the Virgin being thus miraculously communicated to mankind, Pope Servius instituted a festival to hold it in honor.

Sept. 14th is Holy-road Day, the exaltation of the Holy Cross, a festival of the Romish Church. It celebrates the miraculous appearance of a cross in the heavens to the Emperor Constantine. Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after Holy-road Day are Ember days, and the week in which they occur is Ember week.

The 29th is the festival of St. Michael and all the holy angels—it is called Michaelmas day—a grand festival of the Romish and English churches. St. Michael is called the chief of angels, and his feast is observed "that people may know what benefits are derived from the ministry of angels." It was one of the quarter days in England for the payment of rents and wages, and is distinguished as the time for the annual election of magistrates, etc. It was customary to have a goose for dinner on this day—the goose being at its best immediately after it has had the range of the reaped harvest-fields.

QUEEN MERCEDES AGAIN.—Since the 6th of July the London Lancet has published several notes and communications on the demise of the young Queen of Spain. But The Graphic had anticipated the great medical leader by publishing on the 1st of July an article on this event. Several persons having commented upon this tragedy in Spain are known to have never been seen since. Mercedes was not only a fair girl, but a loving wife, who wanted to take her weak-minded husband from the clutches of the camarilla. When the Duc de Montpensier arrived she was just dead; when he asked for an autopsy of his daughter he was refused, but offered an embalming instead. He refused it in his turn, arsenic being the surest cloak for arsenic.

The new Pope, a stout vicillard, has grown in four months to be a broken-down man with an apprehensive eye and countenance. Cardinal Franchi has paid the penalty of his moderate convictions while taking an ice-cream at the Vatican. Who are the Borgias? With Catholic universities teaching in Italy, France, Belgium, England, etc., orthodoxy and toxicology more than morality and therapeutics, are we again to see the times when princes, bishops, cardinals, popes even, will need to have their food tasted and to shun the holy communion, as old rats shake their ears before the delicatesen seasoned by a diplomatic or religious housekeeper?—E. S., in N. Y. Graphic.

THE Thugs of India always seek the protection of their patron deity before going about their murderous work. Some Christians, it seems, have adopted a similar plan. A clerk in the Laporte, Ind., post-office has just been arrested for embezzling money from letters. He said he was a member of the Episcopal church, and had to steal to get money to enable him to dress suitably to attend church. He never took a dollar without getting down on his knees as he did it and vowing it should be the last time. Then, when he couldn't stand the temptation any longer, he would get down on his knees and vow to do it once more and then quit. He never went to bed or got up in the morning without saying his prayers. And he can't understand why heaven should have gone back on him.

THE CRIMES AND CRUELTIES OF CHRISTIANITY. By B. F. Underwood. Truth Seeker Tract No. 126. 30pp., 16mo. N. Y., D. M. Bennett. Paper, 10 cts.

The title of this excellent tract of Bro. Underwood sufficiently indicates its contents. Fortified by the best historians—the highest authorities—it gives a consecutive and accurate narration of the more prominent instances of intolerance and persecution consummated by Christian bigotry, from the days of Primitive Christianity to the present. Its truth cannot be gainsaid. A long and bloody roll of fiendish enormities, unparalleled in extent, and scarcely paralleled in diabolism, attests the malefic influence which the insensate monster, the "child of hell," Christianity, has exerted upon the living page of humanity. Christianity's nefarious atrocities constitute the foulest, blackest stain tarnishing the escutcheon of the race's progress; and the present existence of Christianity is the one great plague-spot upon nineteenth century civilization. Let us fondly hope that the close of the twentieth century will behold the final death and burial of this hideous ghoul, beyond all chance of resurrection.—The Spiritual Offering.

THE BENNETT-TEED DISCUSSION. Held in THE TRUTH SEEKER, between D. M. Bennett and Mr. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, in 1877-8. Proposition: Jesus Christ is not only Divine, but is the Lord God, Creator of Heaven and Earth. 151pp., 12mo. N. Y., D. M. Bennett. Paper, 30 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

Discussions of moot questions in theology and philosophy are always, or nearly always, of interest and value. The strong and weak points of either side of the controversy are usually elicited, to the manifest advancement of truth. Mr. Teed's positions in this discussion were very peculiar; in fact, so peculiar that it is doubtful if any one save himself ever fully comprehended what it was that he was endeavoring to substantiate. His theories and his arguments are intensely metaphysical, intensely ideal, and altogether mystic and transcendental. He is an opponent both of modern Christianity and of modern science, and evidently an exponent of an entirely new system alike of theology and of general science. He also strongly intimates that he (Teed) is the seventh and greatest avatar or incarnation of the Divine Personality on earth, Jesus having been the sixth. Bro. Bennett, who is intensely matter-of-fact and unethereal, found it an impracticable task to follow his Teed-ious antagonist in his aerial flights into the realms of mythical moonshine, and, despairing of ever bringing him down upon the solid ground of rational fact and sturdy common sense, he terminated the controversy, not willing to prolong a discussion which, owing to the slow progress made by Mr. Teed in the promulgation of his theories and arguments, gave promise of being well-nigh endless. The nature and character of the universe, and of matter and mind, in their evolutions and involutions, and the position of Jesus in nature, are skillfully handled by the disputants; and the volume will well repay perusal by all interested in the topics therein involved.

THE ETHICS OF SPIRITUALISM;

A SYSTEM OF

MORAL PHILOSOPHY,

Founded on Evolution and Continuity of Man's Existence beyond the Grave.

By HUDSON TUTTLE,

AUTHOR OF

"Arcana of Nature," "Antiquity of Man," "Career of the God-Idea in History," "Career of Religious Ideas," "Arcana of Spiritualism," etc., etc.

THE FOLLOWING LIST COMPRISES SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL SUBJECTS TREATED:

The Individual; the Genesis and Evolution of Spirit; The Laws of Moral Government; Analysis of Mind in reference to Ethics; The Appetite; The Propensities; Love; Wisdom; Consideration of Rights of the Individual, of Society; Consideration of Duties and Obligations; Duties of the Individual; To God; Of Self-Culture; Duties of Society; Marriage, its Foundation and Responsibility.

The "Ethics of Spiritualism," while running in the columns of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, was widely noticed and commended by the public and the press. From the various published notices we quote a few as follows:

"Contains matter of much interest to Liberal minds."—Pequabuck Valley Gazette.

"Hudson Tuttle's Ethics of Spiritualism, now being published in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, is alone worth the subscription price to that journal. When Hudson Tuttle writes he says something."—Spiritual Scientist.

. . . "We congratulate our brother of Chicago on his securing these valuable contributions. No one is better qualified to treat the subject intuitively and philosophically." . . .—Banner of Light.

. . . "Such a work has long been needed, and never more so than at this time. . . . To me the crowning glory of Spiritualism is its ethical system, its pure and perfect code of morals. . . . I am profoundly grateful to Mr. Tuttle that he has undertaken the work. . . . —Wm. E. Coleman.

. . . "This subject should have been thoroughly treated before now by some of our ablest minds, but it may be for the best that it has been comparatively neglected, and the duty left to him of presenting it in his unequaled way. . . . —Eugene Crowell, M.D., author of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism.

"I have just read your announcement concerning the series of articles you will soon begin to publish from the ever-active and thoroughly honest pen of Brother Hudson Tuttle. He is a farmer, and knows how to plow and sow and reap; a grape-grower, and can discriminate between good and bad fruit. He writes from the fulness of the spirit, and therefore he constantly rises above the clouds of materialism. He is no sophist, no hair-splitting apologist for the loose practices of mankind, and so you may look for the highest and most philosophical statement of the morality from his faithful pen; and the comfort is great when one reflects and knows to a certainty that Hudson Tuttle is no hypocrite, and hence is always personally as good as his written word."—Andrew Jackson Davis.

. . . "The questions he proposes to answer are important and concern us all, and no writer is better qualified to enlighten the world on these topics. I congratulate you on being able to secure the services of this inspired philosopher." . . . —Warren Sumner Barlow, author of The Voices.

The author has steadily aimed to bring his work within the smallest possible compass, and has most admirably succeeded. Though the subjects treated are of the highest importance, Mr. Tuttle has restrained every disposition to dilate upon them, and has thus condensed the book into one hundred and sixty pages. The book is well printed on heavy paper, and altogether is a work that every Spiritualist and Liberalist should own.

12mo. Cloth, 160 pp. Price, in cloth, 60 cents; Pamphlet, 40 cents.

A GOOD PLAN.

The best and most popular plan for operating stocks is that of combining capital of various sums, or pooling the orders of thousands of customers and operating them as one mighty whole in which shares are issued, which has been made so successful by the firm of Messrs. LAWRENCE & CO., Bankers, 55 Exchange-place, N. Y., the profits of which are divided pro rata among the shareholders at the expiration of thirty days from date of certificate. By this excellent plan each investor is placed on an equal footing with the largest operator. For example, within a month you made $2,000 upon an investment of $100, upon $25 the profit would be $500. An investment of $10 would pay $50, making 5 per cent. during the month. An investment of $100 would pay $1,000 profit, making 10 per cent.; an investment of $500 would pay $2,500 profit, making 5 per cent.; and so on, according to the market. The firm's circular explains everything. The editor of the Brooklyn Journal says: "The very satisfactory results made in these combinations by friends led us to order 20 shares, and at the final result we made a clear profit of $101.25 after deducting all commissions and our original investment. The firm is in every respect worthy of the utmost confidence. Send for their explanatory circular." Mr. H. F. Giddings has kindly tendered the firm his experience over his signature, as in no event would they use any of their customers' names without such authority:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 20, 1878.

LAWRENCE & Co., 55 Exchange Place. Dear Sirs:—Your favor containing your check for $1,376.63 at hand for which I thank you, as it is in excess of what I expected. As to your request for an expression in writing from me, I can cheerfully say that the above result is very satisfactory, and I believe I can safely recommend your combined system to everybody. And further, more, I would say that I first saw your advertisement in a N.Y. paper, and sent for one of your circulars, on receipt of which, as you know, I remitted you $300 for 300 shares in Class C in one of your combinations, and by return mail received your certificate for the same, and during the month received five notices of purchases and sales of different stocks, in all amounting to 4¼ per cent., or $1,275 profit on my 300 shares, after deducting your commissions of $198.37, leaving me a net profit of $1,676.63 over and above my investment of $300. Yours truly,

H. F. GIDDINGS,
337 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

An article in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, under date of June 29, 1878, says: "The reports of fabulous profits realized to numerous parties by this plan led us to investigate the matter closely. The system is based on safe business principles, and is the only method by which large operators attain their greatest success. The pools in which their customers are interested are placed on an equality in every respect with the leaders of the street. As the firm's whole interest lies in their commissions, they naturally wish to make their operations aggregate as large as possible. We believe the method of Lawrence & Co. to be the most safe and successful of any that can be found. New combinations and pools are formed every day or two. The firm will send their comprehensive circular, giving full details, to any applicant. One of their old customers, who held a few shares in one of these combinations, after receiving check for his profits, writes: 'Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, N. Y.: Your remittance for my profits, $393.75 is received. I again most heartily thank you, &c.' Numerous testimonials are contained in their circular." New York Illustrated Times says: "A safe method of dealing in stocks.—The great desideratum has always been to discover some method by which a party, operating on limited capital, can stand an equal chance with men like Gould, Vanderbilt or Keene. A plan has lately been adopted by the banking house of Messrs. Lawrence & Co., 55 Exchange Place, that seems to fill the bill completely. The reports of numerous parties who have made large sums of money by this plan, has led us to investigate the matter, and we find the rumors are based on facts. They are also large dealers in all kinds of bonds.

Their circular is truthful and instructive," send for it.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

DOCTOR FELLOWS

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

Gems of Thought.

ENNUI is the ghost of time.

IT is bad to lean against a falling wall.

HE is rich who is poor enough to be generous.

IDLENESS is many gathered miseries in a single name.

LIFE is a pendulum swinging between a smile and tear.

IDLENESS is hunger's mother, and of theft its full brother.

SLIGHT small injuries, and they will become none at all.

IF laughter is the daylight of the soul, a smile is its twilight.

JUDGE not from appearance, lest you might err in your judgment.

TOMORROW is the day on which lazy folks work and fools reform.

NO MAN can be provident as to time who is not careful as to company.

ONE bell serves a parish, and one helpful hand serves many a cause.

APPLAUSE is the spur of noble minds, the end and aim of weak ones.

KNOWLEDGE and timber should not be much used until they are seasoned.

ANYTHING we can love and reverence becomes, as it were, the Sabbath for the mind.

IT is not life to live for one's self alone. Let us help one another.—Menander.

FEW men have a life plan, although many a week, year, youth or business plan.

IN this theatre of man's life it is reserved only for God and angels to be lookers on.

NOTHING can constitute good breeding that has not good nature for its foundation.

TO BE in a passion is to punish one's self for the faults and impertinences of another.

INTERESTED benefits are so common that we need not be astonished if gratitude be rare.

ONE should seek for others the happiness one desires for one's self.—Buddhist Scriptures.

KIND words are better than gold, and the voice of a friend has saved many a man from ruin.

HOW IMMENSELY would our conversation be abridged if all mankind would speak only the truth.

THE superiority of some men is merely local. They are great because their associates are little.

OUR glorious aspirations, which give us life, grow torpid in the din of worldly bustle.—Goethe.

TRUST him little who praises all; him less who censures all; and him least who is indifferent to all.

ABUSE is the penalty levied on the bond of praise, and can be rendered effective only when noticed.

FALSE friendship is like the parasitic moss which feeds on the life of the tree which it pretends to adorn.

TRUE goodness is like the glow-worm; it shines most when no eyes except those of heaven are upon it.

MY DOCTRINE makes no distinction between high and low, rich and poor. It is like water which washes and purifies all alike. It is like the sky, for it has room for all—for men and women, boys and girls, rich and poor.—Buddha.

THE family is the minature commonwealth upon whose integrity the safety of the larger commonwealth depends. It is the seed plot of all morality. We express the noblest longings of the human heart when we speak of a time to come in which all mankind will be united as one family.—Felix Adler.

A WISE man must discharge all his moral duties, even though he does not constantly perform the ceremonies of religion. He will fall very low if he performs ceremonial acts only and fails in the discharge of his moral duties. A religious act which proceeds from selfish views with regard to this world, such as offering sacrifices to obtain rain, or oblations with hope of reward in the next world, are external and selfish. But acts performed with a knowledge of God, and without self-love, are internal and disinterested.—Manu.

THE prayers of the best saints are shaped by the language, and science, and customs around him. In an ignorant age he prays for miracles; in an era of learning he prays more humbly amid the eternal laws, and says, "Thy will be done." Each altar is influenced by the light and liberty, and education, and poetry, as well as by the beam of light divine. When man bows in prayer, all the world repairs with him to the holy place. The poetry of a great era helps him see heaven's beauty, the learning of a great age helps him measure heaven's worth.—David Swing.

YOU are walking through a forest. On the ground, across your path, lies stretched in death a mighty tree, tall and strong, fit mast to carry a cloud of canvas, and bear unbent the strain of tempests. You put your foot lightly on it; and how great your surprise when, breaking through the bark, it sinks deep into the body of the tree—a result much less owing to the pressure of your foot than to the poisonous fungi and foul crawling insects that have attacked its core. They have left the outer rind uninjured, but hollowed out its heart. Take care your heart is not hollowed out and nothing left you but a crust and shell of an empty profession. Shallow rivers are commonly noisy rivers, and the drum is loud because it is hollow.—Gunthrie.

Odds and Ends.

A LADY said of her nose: "I had nothing to do in shaping it. It was a birthday present."

"HERE is your writ of attachment," said a town clerk, as he handed a lover a marriage license.

"CONSTITUENCY, thou art a jewel," as the candidate remarked to the convention that nominated him.

"I COME to ask your hand," said a lover to his sweetheart. "You ask a good deal," replied she, as she proceeded to lay a palm in his two-thirds larger than his own.

WHEN the nurse brought twins to a fond husband in Paris recently, he threw up his hands, shrugged his shoulders, and exclaimed, "Everything has doubled during the Exhibition."

"I WISH you had been Eve," said an urchin to a stingy aunt, proverbial for her meanness. "Why so?" "Because," said he, "you would have eaten all the apple instead of dividing it."

"I'M sitting on your crinoline, madam," said an elderly man in a street-car. "Oh, it's of no consequence," she politely replied. "But I think it is," answered the man, "for it hurts me."

A SUBSCRIBER wrote to a journal to make some inquiries about the next world's fair, whereupon the wicked editor replied that he was under the impression that the next world wouldn't have any fair.

ON being asked why he went into bankruptcy, he replied, "Well, my liabilities were large, my inabilities numerous, and my probabilities unpromising, and so I just thought I'd do as my neighbors do, you know."

HE was almost undressed when his father caught him, but the defense was convincing: "I didn't want to go in swimming with 'em; I only wanted to see the bad little boys who go in swimming on Sunday get drowned."

A GENTLEMAN who recently traveled over a notoriously slow branch railroad declared that it is the safest road in the country, as the superintendent keeps a boy running ahead of the train to drive off the cows and sheep.

AN Irish gentleman found a potato-bug walking over him the other evening, and as his wife came forward to kill the ugly baste wid a broomstick, he exclaimed, "Whisht! ye ould fool! let the baste alone; he thinks I'm Murphy."

AT a popular store, famous for the prompt attention of its clerks, a woman of perhaps thirty years was looking at goods when a young man stepped forward and asked, "Is any one waiting upon you?" "Why, what a question! I've been married these ten years."

LAWYER—"How do you identify this handkerchief?" Witness—"By its general appearance and the fact that I have others like it." Lawyer—"That's no proof, for I have one just like it in my pocket." Witness—"I don't doubt it. I had more than one of the same sort stolen."

"YOU want to brake on this road, do you? Well, you can sit down there. We have no vacancy just at present, but we kill about two brakemen a day, and I dare say in a few minutes I shall hear of some one losing an arm or a leg, and then you can have the job." The man thought he wouldn't wait.

DOG-SELLER—"That 'ere hanimal's the real stock, mum, and dog-cheap at five pounds." Young widow—"It's a sweet, pretty darling, black and white; but in my present state of bereavement you must procure me one entirely black. This will do very well for half-mourning in about six months."

AT one of the Whitehall Sunday-schools a teacher was instructing her class about the prophets. She finally put the question, "Why don't we have prophets now?" and asked the boy who could answer it to hold up his right hand. A little hand of a six-year-old boy quickly went up. "Well, my little man, why is it we do not have prophets now?" "Because, ma'am, my papa says that the times are so hard and so many men have gone into selling goods that profits are knocked higher 'n Gilderoy's kite." The lad was immediately presented with a gumdrop and told to go out and play.

HERE lies an old woman who always was tired,
For she lived in a house where help wasn't hired.
Her last words on earth were, "Dear friends, I am going
Where washing ain't done, nor churning, nor sewing;
And everything there will be just to my wishes,
For where they don't eat there's no washing of dishes;
I'll be where loud anthems will always be ringing,
But having no voice, I'll get rid of the singing;
Don't mourn for me now, and mourn for me never,
For I'm going to do nothing for ever and ever."

THE MODERN GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"George, did you chop down the cherry-tree?"
"What do you soy?"
"Did you chop down that tree?"
"Ax me no questions and I'll tell you no lies."
"George, have you a hatchet?"
"So's a hen."
"You chopped down that tree!"
"Didn't!"
"Young man, commere to me!"
"What do you want?"
"To play hide and seek."
So the old man went out to seek the hide.

The scene which ensued in the woodshed beggars description. It was touching in the extreme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 38. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, September 21, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

"WHITHER thou goest, I ghost," is what Hamlet said to the materialization of his deceased progenitor.

AMONG the convicts at the Auburn Prison are forty-two lawyers, twenty-seven clergymen, and thirteen physicians.

ALTHOUGH ministers are supposed to be truthful men, they seldom fail to give the remains a good notice.—Puck.

ELEVEN thousand women are telegraph operators in Great Britain, and it is said that generally they keep the secrets intrusted to them.

THE Examiner and Chronicle, Baptist, says of Parson Newman that he "would be very profound in thought and very fine in style if he only knew how."

MOST Christians consider the Bible more precious than gold; yet they lock up their silver-ware at night and allow the Word to lie unprotected on the parlor table.

A FAT woman of Corinth, Miss., drank ash-bark tea to make her lean, and she skipped for the better land just two hours ahead of a lean woman who was eating gum arabic to make her fat.—Free Press.

INSTEAD of standing up for thirteen days and swearing to a straight story, Bishop McCoskry fled to Europe, and now there is very little likelihood that he will have many calls to lecture at $200 per night.

FIFTY THOUSAND eucalyptus trees are to be planted about the City of Mexico. These trees grow very rapidly, and in a few years will make a material modification in the rainfall about the Mexican capital.

AN artesian well, 3,250 feet deep, has been bored in Pesth, Hungary. It is the deepest in the world, being nearly twice the depth of that in Paris. It sends up a jet of nearly boiling water forty-two feet high.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Scientific American wants to know how human skin can be tanned. He must have been a remarkably good boy when he went to school, not to have learned that among the other branches.

THE Universalist ministers have agreed to recommend entire abstinence from the use of tobacco. What a fine thing it would be if all the religious denominations would do the same, and then the ungodly follow suit!

IT has long been known how difficult it is to do two things at the same time. This must account for the seldomness with which religious teachers both preach and practice. They do the preaching, allowing others to attend to practicing.

THE Italian Government, on the occasion of the inauguration of a statue to Giordano Bruno, proposes to republish all the works of the philosopher. This turn makes some amends for the great wrongs that have been inflicted by the Church.

A STAFF commander was inspecting an English yeomanry regiment on outpost duty. "What are you doing here, my man?" he asked a vedette. "Mackin' a danged fule of mysel', sir." "How so?" "Why, I should be at hoam carryin' hay." His heart was not in that parade.

"ARE grapes healthy?" asks an exchange, whereupon another answers thus: "As a fruit, opinions differ; George Washington, Christopher Columus, Noah the navigator, Napoleon the First, and Mary, Queen of Scots, ate grapes, and they are all dead now. Draw your own conclusions."

A FASHION item says puffs and false braids are being dispensed with; but when you see a woman drowning, and you reach the spot as she is going down the third time, you want to grab her pretty close to the skull, or you may have seven dollars' worth of false locks and your labor for your pains.

JOSEPH COOK, who has recently finished building himself a beautiful home at Ticonderoga, earns between $25,000 and $30,000 a year by his lecturing. His father thinks the $15,000 which Joseph's education cost a good investment. Thus it is seen that the most arrant blatherskite sometimes makes money.

ACCORDING to the report of the Commissioners in Lunacy, there were in England and Wales, on the 1st of January last, 31,024 males and 26,514 females registered as lunatics, idiots, and persons of unsound mind. This is an increase of 1,902 since Jan. 1.

THE consumption of coal in London is steadily augmenting, both in an arithmetical and a geometrical ratio. Thus, in 1681 the consumption was within 200,000 tons; in 1861 it increased to 3,500,000 tons; in 1861 to 5,073,275 tons; and in 1877 to 9,000,700 tons. For manufacturing purposes alone 1,500,000 tons are used annually in the huge city.

THE lady was leaning on the arm of an elegant and wealthy young man, and leading her little daughter by the hand, when suddenly the child cried, "Oh, ma, ma, look there! See that gentleman that's passing. Don't you know him?" "No-no, my child." "Why, mamma; he was pa last year."—From the French.

AN Iowa temperance lecturer, while crossing a pasture the other day, was chased by a cow with one horn, with which she gave him a most vicious jab just as he was climbing over the fence. "Great and all-destroying specter!" he shrieked, rolling on the grass and rubbing his back; "I shall never like milk punch again."

DURING a recent thunder storm in Silver City, Nev., the dwelling of Mr. Lawson became so charged with electricity that none of the kitchen utensils were of service. When touched they emitted sparks as large as those generated by batteries used for blasting, and upon Mrs. Lawson picking up a fork, she received a shock that caused her to suddenly drop that instrument.

THE two rooms occupied by Voltaire in his chateau at Ferney have been kept lovingly and reverently as he left them. His little sleeping apartment, with its truckle bed and its walls hung round with portraits—among them Milton and Newton—is exactly the same as when he died there a century ago. Unchipped, too, by Cook's tourists' knives is still the black sarcophagus in which his heart is interred.

THE funeral services of a San Franciscan were delayed by the tardiness of the clergyman. "While we are waiting," said one of the mourners, "our friend, Mr. Welters, will perhaps oblige with a recitation." Mr. Welters obliged, reciting "The Raven." The reading of "The Raven" doubtless served equally as good a purpose as the most orthodox sermon, and the rest of the dead was equally as sweet.

TALMAGE AND BUTLER.

"Oh shame!" cries parson Talmage, "shame!
So fallen is the the old Bay State,
She crowns a demagogue with bays
That but befit her good and great."

Cries Butler, with a wicked sneer,
And, maybe, just a little wroth;
"Shame on the pulpit that maintains
A ranter in a parson's cloth!"

THE reason given by Guizot for the prosperity of the French is full of interest: "Habits of prudence have penetrated all classes. There are very few families, even among the lower classes, that spend all their income. A single manufacturer in my town of Sisieux puts by and has long been doing so, 600,000 francs a year. The wealth of France has at least doubled during fifty years; and as the population has augmented during that time by only one-tenth it is obvious that the comfort of the people has increased enormously."

THIS time Edison thinks he has hit upon a perfectly feasible process by which he can and will drive gas out of our streets and houses, and give us the electric light in its stead. The new light, he says, besides being a great deal more brilliant, will be a great deal less expensive than the old one. Moreover, the same wire is to bring power and heat into the house as well as light, and be as available for cooking or for running a sewing machine as for illumination. If Edison is not deceiving himself, we are on the eve of surprising experiences.

THE attention of the Merciful Father is respectfully called to the terrible condition of his suffering children in the South. Many of them are actually starving. If an old-time slave owner should let one of the meanest of his slaves starve to death, or suffer for want of medical attendance, he would be rightly looked upon with loathing and detestation. Jehovah has millions of dollars' worth of untaxed property in this city alone, and yet his children suffer. Now that his attention is called to the matter, we hope he will do his plain duty like a man. "A word to the wise"—but this is irrelevant.

AN effect of the hard times is seen in the selection persons are making of places in which to enjoy the summer. The very wealthy, not feeling the pinch, are in Saratoga and Newport as usual; but those places miss the hundreds of families in well-to-do circumstances who could afford in other years to spend a month there, and upon whom the prosperity of these resorts largely depended. Where are they? They have gone this year to cheaper places, where the price of board is not so high; where fashion does not insist upon such elaborate toilets; where they can pass the summer months without spending so much money. Many a man who has hitherto paid five dollars a day in a first-class hotel, is now in a Connecticut hamlet or a village along the line of the Erie Railway for five dollars a week. The moderate priced resorts are making the money this year, and the second-class houses in them are getting the most of it. Thousands are seeking the snug boarding-houses on Long Island bays, along Lake George, in the Thousand Islands, up the Hudson, at the Water Gap, and elsewhere. Prices are down, social restraint and dictation are unknown, and real pleasure is quite as likely to be found there as in the more fashionable resorts. The American people, too, are becoming more practical every year, and they are beginning to show it in their choice of summering places.

ANOTHER WHO HAS FOUND THE TRUTH.—Following is Rev. J. R. Jones' letter to the congregation of Christ Church, Belleville, resigning the pastorship. "To the churchwardens and members of Christ Church congregation: My dear friends, it is with deep regret that I announce to you my retirement from the Christian ministry. I feel this course to be my honest duty, because, after two years' careful investigation, I have been brought to reject the faith as it is commonly held in the Church, it being manifest to me that the present age of Christianity exhibits but a poor attempt to defend theology against the overwhelming discoveries of science. It has indeed been a terrible struggle for me, and has told with effect upon my mental and bodily health, but I act calmly and dispassionately, and have only now to thank you all, my dear friends, for your great kindness to me during my ministration. Of course I am aware that I sacrifice everything—it may be affections of many friends; but I only had one of two courses to adopt—either to renounce all for conscience' sake, or accept the degrading position of acting out the disgraceful and dishonorable farce of preaching what I did not believe. I have chosen the former. As your clergyman, dear friends, farewell. Sincerely yours, John R. Jones."

THE cattle in a large portion of Bengal are dying at the rate of hundreds a day, and the streams are completely choked with dead bodies. The decrease in the number and the deterioration in the quality of the agricultural cattle all over British India is one of the gravest features to be noted in connection with the general condition of the peasantry. In no respect have the various famines produced a more dangerous effect than in this direction. There is reason to doubt whether either men or animals obtain a sufficient supply of food now even in ordinary times. The consequence is that both succumb with terrible facility to the slightest scarcity or to the mildest disease. Such a state of things tends to perpetuate itself. The quality of the cultivation falls off with the character of the bullocks employed in it. Deep plowing becomes more and more exceptional, while the cost of replacing the dead animals by other beasts tends still further to the impoverishment of the people. In Madras and Bombay the destruction of cattle has been appalling, while in Burmah there has also been a plague. The general condition of the agricultural population throughout India is such as to occasion the gravest uneasiness. Continuous impoverishment bids fair to be followed by continuous famine. There is scarcity amounting almost to famine even at this moment in Madras, Bombay, the northwest provinces, and Bengal. Yet the only remedy proposed is increased taxation.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Helen Nash says, 'Think of it! There is no law to free a sensitive woman from her bondage to a man so wrapped up in his selfish lust as to make himself an object of loathing to his wife, and risk entailing upon his helpless children the curse of abnormal nervous organizations that will send them into all sorts of excesses to render foul and stagnant the sweet springs of existence, and cast over the fair face of nature a clouded vail of tobacco smoke. As well foul the system, and render one's self offensive by the habitual use of onions, garlic, or Limberger cheese, and expect to be tolerated in decent company. No doubt the other side will say that unrestrained tirade is no argument. I know that as well as they. But where centuries of argument has failed to imbue men with a sense of the gross impropriety, not to say evil, of a habit, 'tis time women, who are the victims of the curse, attempt to manifest a tithe of the disgust they feel. I admit I can't find language to express mine. There will have to be a new string of cussin invented before I can convey my detestation of that weed of tophet, tobacco.'

"These are strong words, my friend, but I feel them to my innermost. I have realized just such a disgust as this when forced to inhale the foul breath of some old tobacco-chewer and smoker, and not always that of a man either, for fair woman often smokes, chews, rubs, snuffs, etc., here in the sunny South. Now I will give thee a list of strong reasons for eschewing the weed, which were advanced by a British anti-tobacco society in London. They are so forcible that everyone should read them. Those who use tobacco, that they may realize its evils; those who do not, that they may not form the habit in future, and others should read that they may obtain effective arguments against its use for those who are its victims.

"'The British Anti-Tobacco Society published a short paper, written by a physician of high standing and extensive practice in London, in which is said, "The habit of smoking tobacco has given rise to the following ill effects, which have come under my observation in numerous instances, and that of all the medical men with whom I am acquainted. I shall state the bad effects of this poison categorically, premising that chewing tobacco is the most injurious, smoking not much less so, and snuffing least, although also most decidedly injurious. As smoking holds a middle position of these three injurious habits, or vices, especially when adopted by the young, I shall therefore make it represent the others.

"'1. Smoking weakens the digestive and assimilating functions, impairs the due elaboration of the chyle and of the blood, and prevents a healthy nutrition of the several structures of the body. Hence result, especially in young persons, an arrest of the growth of the body, low stature, a pallid and sallow hue of the surface, an insufficient and an unhealthy supply of the blood, weak bodily powers, and, in many instances, complete emasculation, or inability of procreation. In persons more advanced in life, these effects supervene at last, and with a celerity in proportion to the extent to which this vile habit is carried.

"'2. Smoking generates thirst and vital depression, and to remove these the use of stimulating liquors is resorted to, and often carried to a most injurious extent. These two of the most debasing habits and vices to which human nature can be degraded, are indulged in to the injury of the individual thus addicted, to the shortening of his life, and to the injury and ruin of his offspring, if, indeed, he still retain his procreative powers—a very doubtful result—and the more doubtful when both vices are united in one person.

"'3. Smoking tobacco weakens the nervous powers; favors a dreamy, imaginative, and imbecile state of existence; produces indolence and incapability of manly or continued exertion; and sinks its votary into a state of careless or maudlin inactivity, and selfish enjoyment of his vice. He ultimately becomes partially, but generally, paralyzed in mind and body; he is subject to tremors and numerous nervous ailments, and has recourse to stimulants for their relief. These his vices cannot abate, however indulged in, and he ultimately dies a driveling idiot, an imbecile paralytic, or a sufferer from internal organic disease, at an age many years short of the average duration of life. These results are not always prevented by relinquishing the habit, after a long continuance, or a very early adoption of it. These injurious effects often do not appear until very late in life.

"'4. The tobacco-smoker, especially if he commences the habit very early in life, and carries it to excess, loses his procreative powers. If he have children, they are generally stunted in growth or deformed in shape; are incapable of struggling through the diseases incidental to children, and die prematurely. And thus the vices of the parent are visited upon the children, even before they reach the second or third generation.'

"Dr. Pidduck, in the London Lancet, says: 'In no instance is the sin of the father more strikingly visited upon the children than in the sin of tobacco-smoking; the enervation, the hypochondriasis, the hysteria, the insanity, the dwarfish deformities, the consumption, the suffering lives and early deaths of the children of inveterate smokers, bear ample testimony to the feebleness and unsoundness of the constitution transmitted by this pernicious habit.

"'Nearly every eminent physician and surgeon, both in Europe and America, who, during the last three hundred years, has investigated the effects of tobacco upon the human system, has uttered strong language against its use. Many cases of dyspepsia, diseased liver, congestion of the brain, paralysis of the motor nerves, blindness, nervousness, and insanity have been reported, and many of them have proved fatal. A large number of most loathsome and fatal local diseases resulting from smoking are reported, such as cancerous sores on the lips, mouth, and tongue. From the heat of the pipe or cigar small blisters or wart-like pimples are formed upon the tongue, and become cancerous. In some cases, after several painful and unsuccessful excisions of portions of the tongue and mouth of the most intense sufferers, these victims of a tobacco appetite languish and die.'

"The habit of using tobacco is at war with temperance, for it is really an intoxicant as well as an incentive to drunkenness. It is essentially filthy, no matter how careful one may be in its use. The lips of a tobacco-chewer or habitual smoker are swelled and saturated with a disgusting poison; the gums are spongy and tender, and the whole mouth and throat affected by its use.

"The habit injures the voice. The smoker articulates huskily. The chewer often croaks. The snuffer speaks through his nose.

"The habit is costly. Official statistics show that more money was spent for tobacco in the United States during 1871 than for bread—the staff of life. $350,000,000 for tobacco in its various forms. $200,000,000 for flour within the year.

"The habit often lowers the self-respect of those who practice it. 'I love my pipe,' said a gentleman, 'but I despise myself for using it.'

"The habit disturbs the regular pulsation of the heart. Tobacco users are thus in constant danger. Many fall dead suddenly.

"The habit weakens the mind. It enfeebles the memory, paralyzes the will, produces morbid irritability, diseases the imagination, deadens the moral sensibilities, and is, therefore, an 'assault and battery' on the nervous system, the intellect, and the soul.

"The habit is a rebellion against conscience. Those who indulge in it know that it wastes time, money, strength, and life, and tramples on the laws of nature.

"The habit is as contagious as the cholera. Every mature smoker or chewer infects dozens of youths with a desire to follow his pernicious example. Thus the evil spreads.

"The nicotiana tobacum, the tobacco plant, should be destroyed. It should be razed from the face of the earth. It should be one of the heinous offenses to cultivate it or permit it to grow. It is wholly noxious, teetotally poisonous, utterly useless, altogether villainous, has not one redeeming trait or quality, and its use affords the only positive evidence we have of total depravity.

"Last year 27,000,000 pounds of tobacco and nearly 2,000,000,000 of cigars were smoked, snuffed, and chewed in this country—an increase of about 8,000,000 pounds of tobacco and 50,000,000 cigars as compared with the year previous."

When Edith had written to her friend all these and a great many more arguments against tobacco and reasons why it should not be used, she said, in conclusion:

"Now, my best friend, I hope you will be a friend to yourself and persevere in your efforts to free yourself forever from your worst enemy. I will remain single during my life before I will link my life with any one who is so unfortunate as to have contracted this habit without power to overcome it. But I know you can conquer yourself; so I wait in hope. If one year from to-day you can tell me that not once in the whole twelve months have you smoked or taken a chew, I shall then believe a radical cure has been effected, and will then consent to share your lot in life, for better or for worse. I saw a simple cure in a tiny tract not long since. It may be efficacious, and if not, can do no harm. We all know sweating will cure fever and ague and many other malarious diseases, and even, it is said, mad-dog bites; and why not the tobacco fever? But be sure, if you do sweat yourself, to put a cloth wet with cold water on your head at the time. Here comes the cure:

"'But if you really are so enslaved that you can't break your chains, I will help you a little. Stop to-night; don't use any to-morrow. The first day will not be so very hard. You can get on pretty well the first day, as everybody knows who has been through the mill, as I have been. The second day is pretty bad. In the afternoon of the second day your memory is a little doubtful; you can't exactly say whether it was one brother or three brothers that came over; you can't exactly say whether your grandfather came from the East or the West when he settled here. But be patient the second day. The third morning comes the tug. Now go and take an old-fashioned alcohol sweat. Place an alcohol lamp under your chair, put a blanket over your shoulders, and sweat until your skin is fairly parboiled. Then you will be just as comfortable for one day as you could wish. There is no dryness of the mouth, no disturbance of the secretions. You are perfectly comfortable for one day. The next day you are in trouble again, but not so bad as the day before. Take another sweat; take even a third, or a fourth one. Sweating does not hurt people; sometimes it is good for them. Take three or four thorough sweats, and then you will go off under easy sail, and will have no further trouble from your enemy.'

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

CHAP. XIII.

The revolutionary influence which the Theory of Descent must exercise upon all sciences, will in all probability affect no branch of science, excepting Anthropology, so much as the descriptive portion of natural history, that which is known as systematic Zoology and Botany. Most naturalists who have hitherto occupied themselves with arranging the different systems of animals and plants, have collected, named, and arranged the different species of these natural bodies with much the same interest as antiquarians and ethnographers collect the weapons and utensils of different nations. Many have not even risen above the degree of intelligence with which people usually collect, label, and arrange crests, stamps, and similar curiosities. In the same manner as some collectors find their pleasure in the similarity of forms, the beauty or rarity of the crests or stamps, and admire in them the inventive art of man, so many naturalists take a delight in the manifold forms of animals and plants, and marvel at the rich imagination of the Creator, at his unwearied creative activity, and at his curious fancy for forming, by the side of so many beautiful and useful organisms, also a number of ugly and useless ones.

This childlike treatment of systematic Zoology and Botany is completely annihilated by the Theory of Descent. In the place of the superficial and playful interest with which most naturalists have hitherto regarded organic structures, we now have the much higher interest of the intelligent understanding which detects in the related forms of organisms their true blood relationships. The Natural System of animals and plants, which was formerly valued either only as a registry of names, to facilitate the survey of the different forms, or as a table of contents for the short expression of their degrees of similarity, received from the Theory of Descent the incomparably higher value of a true pedigree of organisms. This pedigree is to disclose to us the genealogical connection of the smaller and larger groups. It has to show us in what way the different classes, orders, families, genera, and species of the animal and vegetable kingdoms correspond with the different branches, twigs, and groups of twigs of the pedigree. Every wider and higher category or stage of the system (for example a class, or an order) comprises a number of larger and stronger branches of the pedigree; every narrower and lower category (for example, a genus, or a species) only a smaller and thinner group of twigs. It is only when we thus view the natural system as a pedigree that we perceive its true value (Gen. Morph. ii, p. 397).

Since we hold fast this genealogical conception of the Organic System, to which alone undoubtedly the future of classificatory Zoology and Botany belongs, we should now turn our attention to one of the most essential, but also one of the most difficult tasks of the "non-miraculous history of creation," namely, to the actual construction of the Organic Pedigree. Let us see how far we are already able to point out all the different organic forms as the divergent descendants of a single or of some few common original forms. But how can we construct the actual pedigree of the animal and vegetable group of forms from our knowledge of them, at present so scanty and fragmentary? The answer to this question lies in what we have already remarked of the parallelism of the three series of development—in the important causal relation which connects the palæontological development of all organic tribes with the embryological development of individuals, and with the systematic development of groups.

In order to accomplish our task we shall first have to direct our attention to palæontology, or the science of petrifactions. For if the Theory of Descent is really true, if the petrified remains of formerly living animals and plants really proceed from the extinct primæval ancestors and progenitors of the present organisms, then, without anything else, the knowledge and comparison of petrifactions ought to disclose to us the pedigree of organisms. However simple and clear this may seem in theory, the task becomes extremely hard and complicated when it is actually taken in hand. Its practical solution would be very difficult even if the petrifactions were to any extent completely preserved. But this is by no means the case. The obvious records of creation which lie buried in petrifactions are imperfect beyond all measure. Hence it is necessary critically to examine these records, and to determine the value which petrifactions possess for the history of the development of organic tribes. As I have previously discussed the general importance of petrifactions as the records of creation, when we were considering Cuvier's merits in the science of fossils, we may now at once examine the conditions and circumstances under which the remains of organic bodies became petrified and preserved in a more or less recognizable form.

As a rule we find petrifactions or fossils enclosed only in those stones which have been deposited in layers as mud by water, and which are on that account called neptunic, stratified, or sedimentary rocks. The deposition of such strata could of course only commence after the condensation of watery vapor into liquid water had taken place in the course of the earth's history. After that period, which we considered in our last chapter, not only did life begin on the earth, but also an uninterrupted and exceedingly important transformation of the rigid inorganic crust of the earth. The water began that extremely important mechanical action by which the surface of the earth is perpetually, though slowly transformed. I may surely presume that it is generally known what an extremely important influence, in this respect, is even yet exercised by water at every moment. As it falls down as rain, trickling through the upper strata of the earth's crust, and flowing down from heights into hollows, it chemically dissolves different mineral parts of the ground, and mechanically washes away the loose particles. In flowing down from mountains water carries their debris into the plains, or deposits it as mud in stagnant lakes. Thus it continually works at lowering mountains and filling up valleys. In like manner the breakers of the sea work uninterruptedly at the destruction of the coasts and at filling up the bottom of the sea with the debris they wash down. The action of water alone, if it were not counteracted by other circumstances, would in time level the whole earth. There can be no doubt that the mountain masses—which are annually carried down as mud into the sea, and deposited on its floor—are so great that in the course of a longer or shorter period, say a few millions of years, the surface of the earth would be completely leveled and become enclosed by a continuous sheet of water. That this does not happen is owing to the perpetual volcanic action of the fiery-fluid centre of the earth. The surging of the melted nucleus against the firm crust necessitates continual alternations of elevation and depression on the different parts of the earth's surface. These elevations and depressions for the most part take place very slowly; but, as they continue for thousands of years, by the combined effect of small, interrupted movements, they produce results no less grand than does the counteracting and leveling action of water.

Since the elevations and depressions of the different parts of the earth alternate with one another in the course of millions of years, first this and then that part of the earth's surface is above or below the level of the sea. I have already given examples of this in the preceding chapter. Hence, in all probability, there is no part of the outer crust of the earth which has not been repeatedly above and also below the level of the sea. This repeated change explains the variety and the different composition of the numerous neptunic strata of rocks, which in most places have been deposited one above another in considerable thickness. In the different periods of the earth's history during which these deposits took place there lived various and different populations of animals and plants. When their dead bodies sank to the bottom of the waters, the forms of the bodies impressed themselves upon the soft mud, and imperishable parts, such as hard bones, teeth, shells, etc., became inclosed in it uninjured. These were preserved in the mud, which condensed them into neptunic rock, and as petrifactions they now serve to characterize the respective strata. By a careful comparison of the different strata lying one above another, and the petrifactions preserved in them, it has become possible to decide the relative age of the strata and groups of strata, and to establish, by direct observation, the principal eras of phylogeny, that is to say, the stages in history of the development of animal and vegetable tribes.

The different strata of neptunic rocks deposited one above another, which are composed in very various ways of limestone, clay, and sand, geologists have grouped together into an ideal System or Series, which corresponds with the whole course of the organic history of the earth, or with that portion of the earth's history during which organic life existed. Just as so-called "universal history" falls into larger and smaller periods, which are characterized by the conditions of development of the most important nations at the respective epochs, and are separated from one another by great events, so we also divide the infinitely longer organic history of the earth into a series of greater and less periods. Each of these periods is distinguished by a characteristic flora and fauna, and by the specially strong development of certain vegetable or animal groups, and each is separated from the preceding and succeeding period by a striking change in the character of its animal and vegetable inhabitants.

In relation to the following survey of the historical course of development which the large animal and vegetable tribes have passed through, it will be desirable to say a few words first as to the systematic classification of the neptunic groups of strata, and the larger and smaller periods corresponding to them. As will be seen directly, we are able to divide the whole of the sedimentary rocks lying one above another into five main groups or periods, each period into several subordinate groups of strata or systems, and each system of strata again into still smaller groups or formations; finally, each formation can again be divided into stages or sub-formations, and each of these again into still smaller layers or beds. Each of the five great rock-groups was deposited during a great division of the earth's history, during a long era or epoch; each system during a shorter period; each formation during a still shorter period. In thus reducing the periods of the organic history of the earth, and the neptunic strata containing petrifactions deposited during those periods, into a connected system, we proceed exactly like the historian who divides the history of nations into the three main divisions of Antiquity, the Middle Ages, and Modern Times, and each of these sections again into subordinate periods and epochs. But the historian, by this sharp systematic division, and by fixing the boundary of the periods by particular dates, only seeks to facilitate his survey, and in no way means to deny the uninterrupted connection of events and the development of nations. Exactly the same qualification applies to our systematic division, specification, or classification of the organic history of the earth. Here, too, a continuous thread runs through the series of events unbroken. We must therefore distinctly protest against the idea that by sharply bounding the larger and smaller groups of strata, and the periods corresponding with them, we in any way wish to adopt Cuvier's doctrine of terrestrial revolutions, and of repeated new creations of organic populations. That this erroneous doctrine has long since been completely refuted by Lyell I have already mentioned.

The asceticism which I have mentioned was frequently followed by the opposite extreme, and the greatest licentiousness prevailed. Love feasts became scenes of drunkenness and debauchery, and as such were kept up for centuries. Commemoration of martyrs became scenes of scandalous dissipation. Thousands of the clergy while professing celibacy kept mistresses in their houses under all sorts of false but pious pretexts. Monks and virgins lived together on terms of closest intimacy, hypocritically claiming that so great was their piety that they could innocently share the same bed. Women deserted their husbands to live with new lovers. Open prostitution was common. "The world," says Hallam, "grew accustomed to dangerous alternations of extreme asceticism and gross vice, and sometimes as in the case of Antioch, it was the most vicious and luxurious cities that produced the most numerous anchorites. . . . Public opinion was so low that many forms of vice attracted little condemnation and punishment, while undoubted belief in the absolving efficacy of superstitious rights calmed the imagination and allayed the terrors of conscience" (Middle Ages, p. 163).

An Italian bishop of the tenth century said if he were to enforce the canons against unchaste people administering the rites of the Church, that duty would be reserved for boys alone; and if he were to extend the canons against bastards, they too would be excluded. At one time the clergy almost universally kept concubines and were systematically taxed therefor. One abbot was found to have seventeen illegitimate children in one village. Another abbot kept seventy concubines. The Bishop of Liege had sixty-five illegitimate children. The nunneries were brothels; infanticide within their walls was common. Incest was so prevalent among the clergy that it was necessary again and again to enact that no priest should live with his mother or sister. Unnatural vice was common, especially among the clergy. Indeed, Mosheim, Hallam, Lecky, and other impartial writers declare that no adequate idea can be formed of the depravity of the times of which I speak. (See Lecky's Morals, vol. ii, p. 348-355.)

I have already remarked that one of the best features of the pagan civilization—religious freedom—was destroyed as soon as Christianity gained an ascendency. "From the very moment the Church obtained civil power under Constantine," says Lecky, "the general principle of coercion was admitted and acted on both against the Jews, the heretics, and the pagans" (Hist. Rationalism, vol. ii, p. 22). Constantine made it penal for any Christian to become a Jew. Any Jew who married a Christian incurred the penalty of death. Arian and Donatist parties were forbidden to assemble, their writings burnt, and many of themselves condemned to death. "'See how these Christians love one another,' was the just and striking exclamation of the heathen in the first century. 'There are no wild beasts so ferocious as Christians who differ concerning their faith,' was the equally striking and probably equally just exclamation of the heathen of the fourth century'" (Hist. Rationalism, vol. ii, p. 39).

Constantine did all he could to extirpate paganism by violence. He prohibited every form of pagan worship. Constantius made additional laws, forbidding the pagans to perform in public or in private the rites of their religion. Under Theodosius—who began his reign in 379—the pagans were deprived of all offices, their worship forbidden, and their temples destroyed. The appeals of the pagans were made in vain. Heartrending indeed are the accounts of the persecutions of the pagans that lived in the country districts remote from the centers of population where the old religion had yet a stronghold. They pleaded that the temple was to them "the very eye of nature, the symbol and manifestation of an ever present Deity, the solace of all their troubles, the holiest of all their joys. If it was overthrown, their dearest association would be annihilated. The tie that linked them to the dead would be severed. The poetry of life, the consolation of labor, the source of faith would be destroyed." But their pleas availed naught; their temples were reduced to ruins and their worship absolutely prohibited. These persecutions were urged on by the Fathers of the Church. Eusebius eulogized Constantine for his edicts against pagan worship. Augustine used all the power of his brilliant mind to fan the flame of persecution. He drew his argument in its favor from the Old and New Testaments alike. Any one who celebrated the rites of the pagan religion in his time, he declared, incurred the penalty of death, and this sentence, he said, was unanimously applauded by the whole Christian Church (Gibbon, chap. xxv).

When paganism was suppressed, the persecuting spirit of the Christian system exhibited itself in the attempt made to extirpate, by violence, every heresy that appeared.

What innumerable multitudes have suffered and perished that the Christian religion might flourish. The transubstantiation controversy, which raged at intervals all over Christendom, cost the lives of between 300,000 and 400,000 human beings. The famous image controversy cost 50,000 lives. During the persecutions instigated in the ninth century against the Manicheans, there fell in Greece, it has been computed, 100,000 persons. The loss of life by the "Crusades," was not less, probably, than 5,000,000. There were seven distinct expeditions. "The European nations," says Mosheim, "were deprived of the greatest part of their inhabitants by these ill-judged expeditions." . . . "Here the face of Europe was totally changed and all things were thrown into the utmost confusion" (Ecc. Hist., vol. i, p. 257). Bernard, whose zeal contributed largely to arouse Europe to the second crusade, says that when the expedition started "scarcely one man was left for the consolation of seven widows."

For centuries the fairest regions of earth were reddened with human blood and strewn with human skulls. The extermination of the Albigenses; the expatriation of the Moriscoes, the unfortunate remnant of the Moorish nation, from Spain; the terrible persecution of the Jews during the middle ages, and their final expulsion from Spain and Portugal; the famous schism which preceded the burning of Huss and Jerome of Prague, and the wars of Hussites that followed (costing not fewer than 150,000 lives); the destruction of 12,000,000 unoffending aborigines by Cortez, Pizarro, and their priestly abettors; the massacre of St. Bartholomew, costing probably 40,000 lives (a low estimate); the killing of 50,000 in the Netherlands, in the reign of Charles V, and thousands more under the reign of his heartless son; the burning of 31,000, and the killing or torturing by other modes, of 290,000 more by the Inquisition, in Spain alone; the burning, hanging, and otherwise destroying of hundreds of thousands, in obedience, as was supposed, to the Bible command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live"; the persecutions in England, Scotland, and Ireland (not to speak of our own country), since the Reformation, are a comparatively few of the enormities that can be appealed to in illustration of the intolerance which has followed the ascendancy of Christianity, wherever it has gained a foot-hold and has prevailed, unchecked by opposing influences. No wonder Baxter exclaimed: "Blood, blood, blood stains every page."

We will consider now as briefly as possible, the attitude which Christianity in the early ages assumed toward learning, and give some of the facts in the history of letters, that the real influence of this system on intellectual pursuits may be fairly seen.

No one will claim that "primitive Christianity" had any sympathy with science. There were, it is true, a few of the Fathers, who, like Justin Martyr, in becoming Christians could not blind their eyes to the merit of the noble literature in which they had been educated; but generally the Christians of the early ages felt only contempt for the learning of the day. Many were for abolishing all philosophy and erudition from the limits of the Church, and hence, as Mosheim says, "The beginning of that unhappy contest between faith and reason, religion and philosophy, piety and genius, which increased in succeeding ages, and is prolonged even to our times with a violence which renders it extremely difficult to be brought to a conclusion" (Ecc. Hist., vol. i, p. 59).

Some Notes on the Index.

BY T. C. L.

The dreamy Index has opened one peeper, and found out that a convention of some kind was recently held at Watkins. It made the discovery by reading in the N. Y. World, three weeks old, some "cynical remarks," which it whips out its scissors and hurries up to copy. It is wide awake for "cynical remarks"—The Index is. Wherever it can hear of a cynical remark it goes for it, so as to forward Liberalism and make things pleasant. It should have been at Watkins and heard Mr. Parton read that stirring and cautionary passage of Scripture, "Beware of dogs."

A subscriber in Bristol, England, has just sent us this little message: "You are right as to the Comstock business. How is it acute American people do not see with you? Best wishes!"

Well, it does seem queer to a "subscriber in Bristol," but this is how it is: The American people are only "acute," while The Index fellows are "cute." The American people, several times more than seventy thousand of them, can't see with those four or five paragons of high culture who run The Index, because in this "blarsted" country they haven't the eyes, you know. Thanks.

The Episcopal House of Bishops have unanimously deposed Bishop McCoskry, of Michigan, on account of his scandalous misconduct and his flight from the country. Similar energy would win for other churches a respect they do not always receive.

But churches differ as much as other folks. Some do and some don't. "Similar energy" sometimes "wins" in families. Some turn an erring daughter out of doors, and some a servant girl. It leaves the rest at home so pure, and wins the "respect" of the applauding neighborhood.

Mr. A. B. Bradford says, in The Index, he "wishes to coöperate with Mr. Abbot in his efforts to thwart the project of the National Reformers." TRUTH SEEKER readers and members of the Liberal League would like to have pointed out specifically what "efforts" Mr. Abbot is making, or has made for a year past, to thwart the project of the National Reformers. On the contrary, when all Liberals were of one mind, moving on with united force and in peace and harmony "to thwart the project of the National Reformers," didn't he call a sudden halt, throw discord and confusion into the ranks as far as it was in his power to do, and proclaim that he didn't want to thwart any more? He evidently isn't thwarting as much as he was.

Mrs. Clara Neyman writes some timely and suggestive admonitions to the editor of The Index. She deprecates "the ungenerous attacks which have circulated through some of our Liberal papers upon the character and integrity of veteran reformers." Yes, Clara, you are right; and you put it none too strong. Here is the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER; as a reformer no one is more "veteran" than he, and no one more brave. A Liberal scout he is, always exploring new realms of opinion, always pioneering a trail through the "spookey" woods, always guiding the Liberal army over rocky defile, through mountain pass, or down dangerous steep. It is easier for the army to march where he has blazed the way. Twice within a year captured as a prisoner, while courageously pressing forward in his path of duty, one would suppose that the whole Liberal host, to the last man, especially colleague leaders, would rush to the rescue of so efficient a servant. To the credit of the army, it did come loyally and grandly to his support. But his peril revealed that, as to the leaders,

> "While our tyrants joined in hate,
> We never joined in love."

and "some of our Liberal papers" circulated attacks "upon the character and integrity" of this "veteran reformer." It is the mystery of mysteries how it ever could have been done, how any one calling himself a Liberal ever had the heart to do it. But there the record stands; and whether it is enveloped in the Unknowable, or whether any light or reason can ever be thrown upon it, only the future can disclose. We can only stigmatize the treason, and await the revelation and history which another age may unfold.

"Once a priest, always a priest." The clerical virus once struck in, can never be struck out. It is as ineradicable as witch-grass or Canada thistle. Liberalism "cannot so innoculate the old stock but it will relish of it." It is the priestly, and consequently the timid, part of the Rev. D. H. Clark—friend of Abbot, another priest, and editorial contributor to The Index—which utters the following concerning the Watkins Convention:

The only unpleasant occurrence in connection with this interesting gathering that we have to record was the arrest of D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, W. S. Bell, and Miss Josephine Tilton, on the charge of vending obscene publications.

While we sympathize deeply with these persons in the annoyance and sense of injury which they are thus made to experience (believing, as we are inclined to, in the purity of their motives), we frankly confess we question the wisdom of their course, and whether there is not equally good service that they may do their day and generation without exposure to such disagreeable consequences, or entailing upon themselves and the cause they represent so foul imputation and suspicion. Believe us, dear friends, you are recklessly expending your valuable energies, and needlessly soiling your good name.

The dead point held up as a terror in this editorial fulmination is "exposure to disagreeable consequences." In Abbot it is "danger," in this man it is "exposure" if you do anything or say anything out of accord with the current creeds. We must down on our knees and humbly ask the pious part, whether they will expose us or endanger us before we dare make a move, speak a speech, or sell a book. New England gentlemen, I presume Puritan or Pilgrim-born gentlemen, at all events cultured, literary gentlemen who make some pretension to be actuated by the spirit of liberty, stay away from the Watkins Convention, never show their faces on the grounds which they sneer at as the Liberal "Mecca," and then "deeply sympathize" with the friends of Mr. Heywood in the danger they incurred and the "exposure to consequences" which they suffered in selling his books, just as Spiritualists sold their books, Shakers sold theirs, TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator Liberals sold theirs, and, almost incredible to relate, as an agent of the Index Association sold theirs. It was a general market day and place for selling all kinds and stripes of Radical books. And you, gentlemen, made "cool-headed" by reading "cynical remarks" in the World three weeks ago, frigidly suggest that there is "equally good service that they may do," etc., "without exposure to disagreeable consequences."

Rev. D. H. Clark and Rev. F. E. Abbot, birds of a feather, arcades ambo, in the sacred profession united, and in a sort of a kind of a half-and-half Liberalism not divided, we will see you cast out over the ramparts of the sensitive, trembling, thinly-settled heaven wherein you now dwell to "die of a rose in aromatic pain" in the extremest circumambient hell which your tender organism would enable you forever and ever to endure, before we will accept existence on the terms to which your low order of courage would submit, and which you so sympathizingly recommend to us. You may keep your sympathy for your companions in alarm; we need none of it.

The Freethinkers' Association of New York.

Friends of Freethought generally, and of New York State in particular, I cordially invite you all to join with me in perfecting this organization. The following are the names of our Executive Committee as appointed at the Watkins Convention:

Cortlandt Palmer, of New York, Chairman; Charles A. Gurley, Pulaski; Sigmond Block, Cape Vincent; David Cosad Jr., Oaks Corners; T. L. Brown, M.D., Binghamton; Clement Austin, Rochester; Clara Neyman, New York.

This is an excellent Executive Committee, and under the supervision of its able and enthusiastic chairman, Mr. Palmer, I am sure we can expect some good work.

The Vice-Presidents who have been appointed in the various counties are the following: Albany, Thomas Dugan, Albany; Allegany, Samuel Latta, Friendship; Broome, T. B. Taylor, M.D., Binghamton; Cattaraugus, A. L. Branard, Salamanca; Cayuga, Helen A. Mitchel, Aurora; Chautauqua E. Mitchell, Jamestown; Chemung, J. V. Mapes, Elmira; Chenango, John Shattuck, Norwich; Columbia, F. W. Evans, Mt. Lebanon; Cortland, Wm. D. Hunt, Scott; Erie, E. C. Hotchkiss, Buffalo; Essex, Dr. Freeman Lyon, Bloomingdale; Genesee, J. D. Richards, Alexander; Herkimer, W. J. Lewis, Ilion; Jefferson, William Estus, Cape Vincent; Kings, A. McAdams, Brooklyn; Lewis, Thomas Bacon, Leyden; Livingston, H. B. McNair, Dansville; Madison, Frederick S. Hammond, Bennett's Corners; Monroe, Moses Hayes, Rochester; New York, A. L. Rawson, New York City; Niagara, J. M. Harwood, Hess Road; Oneida, S. Haag, New York Mills; Onondaga, John W. Truesdell, Syracuse; Ontario, John Peck, Naples; Orleans, Henry Reynolds, Albion; Oswego, W. J. Bradt, N. Hannibal; Queens, Isaac Sherwood, Manhasset; Rockland, Gen. Robert Avery, Nyack; St. Lawrence, J. P. Armstrong, Ogdensburg; Schuyler, G. C. Hebbard, Watkins; Seneca, E. W. Mitchell, W. Junius; Tioga, O. H. Kinney, Waverly; Tomkins, D. B. Morton, Groton.

Vice-Presidents for the following named counties have not as yet been appointed, viz.: Clinton, Delaware, Dutchess, Franklin, Fulton, Greene, Montgomery, Orange, Otsego, Putnam, Rensselaer, Richmond, Saratoga, Schenectady, Schoharie, Suffolk, and Sullivan.

Will some friend from each of said counties send me a good name for a Vice-President? These officers, under our articles of association, are very important ones. It is the duty of each to unite with himself two other persons, and the three form the Liberal County Committee. And I here earnestly request each Vice-President already appointed to immediately appoint his associates; and if there are any of the Vice-Presidents already appointed who cannot at once go to work, I wish they would resign and give place to persons who will, for we must do some good work in the State this year, and now is the time to commence.

The Watkins Convention proved one thing, at least, and that is that we have many able speakers in the Liberal ranks; and they should all be kept in the lecture-field; and that cannot be done without organization. As I have before suggested, we must have one large meeting in every county of the State during the next year, and the speakers that attend should be paid, and not compelled, as many were at Watkins, to get nothing and pay their own expenses in the bargain. The business of getting up these meetings and raising funds to pay the speakers will devolve upon these County Committees.

But right here I desire to impress it upon Liberals everywhere that they cannot succeed where Liberal papers are not taken, and that therefore your constant work should be to increase the circulation of the Liberal papers. I think it would be a wise move for each County Committee to make out a full list of all the Freethinkers in their respective counties, and then employ a good canvasser to see each one and urge upon him or her the necessity of subscribing for some one of our Liberal journals. I have had some experience in canvassing for Liberal papers, and I know that if Liberals would do their duty in this respect more Liberal papers would be taken in the State of New York alone than are now taken in all the States.

Then, friends, send in your names and become members of this Society. It will cost but the small sum of twenty-five cents, and Liberals from any place can do that.

Mr. B. L. Robinson, an energetic, earnest Liberal from McLean, New York, has just sent me seven names of new members from his town, and writes: "I think if I were empowered I might add fifty to the membership of the association in a few weeks. I am in the immediate vicinity of a goodly number of Liberals and Freethinkers. I have always occupied a respectable position among them, and have endured plenty of kicks from the orthodox portion of our section. I have had to leave the principalship of an academy on account of my Infidelity, because the school board were orthodox and believed in the reading of the Bible and prayer in the school, and I would not either read or pray. The influence of the Church is at work against me at present, but I am used to their sneers and care very little how much mud they fling. What I intended to say when I commenced this letter was, it makes me so d——d provoked when I think of the usage of Bennett, Bell, and Tilton at Watkins, that I do not know how to contain myself.

"I have read "Cupid's Yokes," Annie Besant's "Law of Population," etc., and can't see anything in them but what is perfectly proper for any person to read. While I cannot indorse all of "Cupid's Yokes," I think it will do very much good."

Mr. Robinson is evidently an intelligent working Liberal, and I hope Brother D. B. Morton, the Vice-President of Tompkins county, will find a place for him on his county committee. Such men should be placed where they can do the most good.

Dr. T. L. Brown, our worthy President, writes me that he feels that he can do very much more for our association the coming year than he has ever done before, and I know he will help us all he can.

And we can be assured that the western portion of the State will be well looked after by our most active Recording Secretary, E. M. Sellon, and our new Vice-President, E. C. Hotchkiss, Esq., of Buffalo.

Friends everywhere, shall we now go to work and make a strong pull and a long pull for Liberalism in this great Empire State?

I know you will not forget to assist my friend, Mr. Hebbard, of Watkins, and myself, to pay up some unp d expenses of the Watkins Convention. A small sum fr m each Liberal will help us out.

H. L. GREEN,
Cor. Sec'y. N. Y. F. A.

The Omitted Resolutions.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: On reading your brief but comprehensive report of the Freethinkers' Convention at Watkins, N. Y., in a late issue of your paper, I concluded want of space or time prevented you from making a fuller report—omitting, as you did, the following resolutions. They were adopted by the Convention at an early session, and entered into the subject matter of debate between the Presbyterian minister and myself. On inquiry, however, I find the same omission in the report of The Investigator, and infer that the Committee on Resolutions, rather than the editors, are responsible for the omission.

You will oblige me, therefore, and I think carry out the intention of the Convention, by giving them an early insertion in your paper. I send them as corrected by the Committee. Co-operatively yours, J. H. W. TOOHEY.

Elmira, N. Y., Sept. 11, 1878.

PREAMBLE.—WHEREAS, names, nicknames, and party commonplaces are serviceable only in so far as they truly characterize the individualities of nature and specialize the forming, reforming, or deforming tendencies of men and measures in history; and,

WHEREAS, the common use of the words Heretic, Infidel, Atheist, and others of like import only mislead the ignorant and offend the wise; therefore,

Resolved, That their further use be discountenanced and discontinued by the Freethinkers and Liberalists of this and kindred conventions, and that we recommend to reformers everywhere the just use of words in all spoken and written relations of thought, that the righteous and rigorous phraseology of science may take the place of these theologic vulgarisms.

Resolved, That the logic of experience and the verifications of science are our true guides and profitable teachers, and that we recommend the writings of Huxley, Lubbock, Darwin, Spencer, Wallace, Youmans, and kindred thinkers in Europe and America only in so far as they explain facts and interpret nature—ignoring all first and final causes.

Resolved, That the true position of the scientific thinker is agnostic as to theism, not atheistic; and that in dismissing the terms theism, monotheism, polytheism, deism, pantheism, and atheism from the terminology of the scientific and positive schools, our position is logical, not personal; constructive, not destructive; having in mind the future economy of time and thought no less than the unity of philosophy.

A Ringing Letter.

The following excellent letter is from a Western patron to Miss Tilton:

PRIOR LAKE, MINN., Sept. 10, 1878.

MY DEAR SISTER: Pardon my familiarity in addressing you, but I feel like it. I have learned to love and honor the Heywood family above all others, my relatives not excepted; and though I would not doff my hat to a god, I kneel to you in honor in my soul to-night, after reading Bennett's account of your imprisonment. It would be like irrigating the ocean to say, Be brave and true. To go to prison for love of principle, far from home and friends, when the door of freedom stood wide open, for a time, at least, requires a kind of bravery almost unknown in this age of bigotry and intolerance. No! you need no exhortations to stand firm; but proffers of love, respect, and honor may not come amiss. Many hearts are throbbing in sympathy with you to-night, but none more fervently than those in our little home. If our thoughts and feelings could become tangible, your cell would be a palace. I inclose a few postage-stamps and fifty cents in currency, as the only way to materialize my feelings. If this reaches you safely, will write again ere long.

Brave, glorious Josie, good-night.

Ever your friends, MYRA E. MARKLAND,
W. G. MARKLAND.

Figures and Facts about Banking; or, Why Business Does Not Revive.

BY B. M. LAWRENCE, M. D.

The rate of interest on money determines, to a great degree, the amount of the profits of labor which go to support the laborer, and what proportion falls into the hands of the capitalist. Without any interest, only those who work would obtain reward. Capital would get nothing whatever; but with high rates of interest it gets the larger share.

The national banks are an injury to business enterprises, because they demand a double interest on money, and in doing so they have a direct tendency to call capital away from ordinary investments in trade and business to engage in banking, and thus labor is left unemployed. To more clearly understand this, it is only necessary to examine closely the practical and the possible working of the so-called "national" bank system.

The fact that the notes of these banks are good in all parts of the country, and that the note-holder is secure in case the bank should fail, has rendered the system comparatively popular with the masses, and it must be admitted that the old "wild cat" State bank furnished a currency far less desirable than that which is provided by the present banking law. But the following facts and figures will show that a still greater change is required before we can insure financial confidence or expect permanent business prosperity. The bank notes are secured by interest-bearing bonds, most or many of which were originally purchased at less than fifty cents on a dollar. Suppose, then, during the last year of the late war, a capitalist to have $50,000 in coin. With this he could have bought $110,000 in government bonds. With this he could have taken $100,000 stock in a bank, without using the remaining $10,000. Depositing his $100,000 bond, on which he still continues to draw coin interest twice a year, the law now gives him in bank currency ninety per cent on his deposit. He therefore receives $90,000 in bank notes, adding to this sum the $10,000 bond, he could have procured another $100,000 bond, deposited it in another bank, and got another $90,000 in currency, for which he would pay not one penny, while he continues to draw his coin interest twice a year on the $200,000 deposited. All this could have transpired in less than a half hour's time, and a man having $50,000 in gold could have made himself worth $290,000 without once leaving the national treasury building.

Nor does the chances for speculation end here, for the banker has only to buy more bonds and take more stock in other banks, until he could soon have more than a million dollars in bonds drawing him more than $50,000 interest per annum, besides giving him a bank credit worth more to him than the original investment.

To illustrate this still more clearly, suppose he now takes stock, as above described, in twenty-five more of these "national" banks, buying another bond each time with the notes issued on the previous deposit, as shown in the following table:

No. 1	$90,000	No. 14	$21,000
" 2	81,000	" 15	19,000
" 3	73,000	" 16	17,000
" 4	65,000	" 17	15,000
" 5	58,000	" 18	14,000
" 6	52,000	" 19	13,000
" 7	46,000	" 20	11,000
" 8	41,000	" 21	10,000
" 9	37,000	" 22	9,000
" 10	33,000	" 23	8,000
" 11	30,000	" 24	7,000
" 12	27,000	" 25	6,000
" 13	24,000
			807,000
Add the			290,000
			1,097,000
Deduct the first			50,000
			1,047,000

From these figures we see that more than a million of dollars could have been made in only a few days' time with a capital of no more than $50,000. Business is now prostrated because such speculations as these have been encouraged and made possible by unjust legislation. Men who have money to invest see a sure profit, with no risks, in buying bonds and in banking. They favor contraction, because the less money there is, the more purchasing power it is found to possess, for all the property of the country is measured by all the money. Contract the present currency one-half, and each dollar will buy double the amount of property that it will at present; expand, and it will have less purchasing power. They favor contraction because they have money, which brings them no interest, which they wish to exchange for interest-bearing bonds; and further, because, by destroying the greenbacks, there will be a demand created for more national bank currency, on which they will get a double interest.

The bank notes are called "honest money," yet they are not, and never have been, legal tender. They have no other security than the credit of the government; but can the credit of the country be less safe when it issues legal tender notes on which it pays no interest, than while it pays a hundred millions of dollars every year in the form of interest on bonds?

A shipbuilder, near Boston, worked hard for years, early and late; he was never idle. Having saved a few thousand dollars in gold, near the close of the war he bought bonds. Twice a year the gold interest came to hand from the coupons, and he never built another vessel—never employed another laborer. He lived at his leisure. Had he started a bank with his bonds, he might have visited Paris and Palestine, and spent his summers in Saratoga at the Grand Union. The wealthiest farmer in a western town sold all he had, except the homestead, and gave it to the Government for bonds. Now he pays no taxes, lives in luxury, while his poor, hard-working neighbors have to pay for the education of his children.

In order to restore the country to prosperity, prevent the increase of crime and pauperism, and permanently revive business, the National Bank Act must be repealed; the Government bonds must be paid in silver or greenbacks, which must be made a legal tender for all debts, public as well as private; and enough paper money must be issued to meet the demands of the country, subject to no more inflation or contraction; then capital will not fail to furnish plenty of work for the unemployed.
